I returned, and seated myself. "I listen, Monica," I said. She bolted the door inside, and then said in low quick tones, "I have seen my brother Pasquale. He has been about in the hills by Olevano. Two days ago he came to Monticelli, and so he heard I was here. And he came in the evening and waited about and he saw me, and I did not know him at first, but then afterwards, when he spoke a bit, I knew him. He said, 'Don't tell grandmother, because she's old, and she'd be frightened and upset, and let out the secret, or else she'd want me to go and see her, or else she'd try to come and see me. So just hold your tongue.' And I have, haven't I? Only to you, you know. Pasquale said, 'Don't tell any of our people, because I don't know who I can trust.' But then you're a foreigner. You're different. You are different,—ain't you?"

She was evidently a little uneasy at having disobeyed her brother's injunction; but on the whole her trust in me predominated over her uneasiness. For my own part I was by no means pleased to be made the recipient of such a confidence, nor yet at the confidence itself. I heartily wished Signor Pasquale out of the neighbourhood. From all that Monica had told me—and still more from all that she had refused to tell me—when we first talked of her brother, I was convinced that the latter had for years been leading a lawless, if not a criminal, life; and I felt that he was a very undesirable neighbour in any peaceful community. I asked her what had brought him into those parts, and how long he intended to remain there. To the first question she answered that she did not know; that she thought he had friends in the neighbourhood of Olevano; that he might be looking for work, for aught she could tell. To the second she replied that Pasquale was going away from Monticelli (a tiny townlet on the summit of an isolated hill not far from Tivoli) almost immediately;—perhaps to-morrow, perhaps even to-night. This was a welcome assurance to me, and I willingly gave Monica the promise she craved for, that I would reveal to no one the fact of her brother's visit to Tivoli. Thereupon she became quite cheerful, and even boisterously gay; began to dance a salterello to the accompaniment of her own finger and thumb loudly snapped in rhythm, asked when we were to make our promised excursion to Monte Gennaro, remarked that she had seen "that Englishman" in the town with Professor Santi, announced in a trenchant style that he was ugly and she didn't like him, and then burst into a peal of wild laughter.

I had to check this ebullition of high spirits, and bid Monica take her departure. She did so with undiminished good-humour, kissing my hand violently, and saying, "Ah, how right I was to tell you! The weight is gone from my heart! It makes bad blood for me to keep a secret. But now I shall always tell you everything—everything!" And with this dismaying announcement she ran off down the street, singing at the full pitch of her strong strident voice.

IT WILL STOP ITS FALLING, AND INDUCE A HEALTHY AND MOST LUXURIANT GROWTH. USE NO OTHER PREPARATION WITH IT, NOT EVEN OIL OR POMADE.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S

TO RESTORE GREY HAIR.

BECAUSE IT IS MADE FROM THE CHOICEST MATERIALS, AND PREPARED WITH THE UTMOST CARE AND SKILL. OVER FORTY YEARS THE FAVOURITE PREPARATION. ENJOYING BY FAR THE LARGEST SALE, IT MUST BE THE BEST. IT DOES NOT DYE THE HAIR, BUT STRENGTHENS IT. GREY HAIRS SOON DISAPPEAR. BY ITS GENTLE TONIC ACTION THE ROOTS ARE STRENGTHENED, THE SOFT AND SILKY TEXTURE OF HEALTHY HAIR FOLLOWS ITS USE.

Sold by all Chemists, Perfumers, and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

"GOLDEN STAR"

BAY LEAF WATER

THE FAVOURITE TOILET WATER

OF THE AGE.

"GOLDEN STAR"

BAY LEAF WATER,

TRIPLE DISTILLED from the FRESH LEAVES of the BAY TREE (Myrcia Acris).

The crowning value of Golden Star Bay Leaf Water, and its acknowledged superiority over Eau de Cologne or other perfumed waters, are in its cooling and delightfully soothing properties, when applied to the skin, removing all redness or roughness, and all disagreeable results of the action of salt water or of the sun after sea bathing.

"GOLDEN STAR"

BAY LEAF WATER

Removes, and by its continued use prevents, all roughness of the skin from the effects of changes of temperature (heat and cold)

The unpleasant effects of profuse perspiration are entirely obviated by its use, while it imparts to the skin an agreeable coolness, which, together with its delightful and refreshing aroma, have gained for it its high reputation and immense sale.

"GOLDEN STAR"

BAY LEAF WATER

For the BATH it is most highly recommended. The pleasure and benefits of a bath are increased a hundredfold by the addition of a small quantity of Golden Star Bay Leaf Water.

"GOLDEN STAR"

BAY LEAF WATER.

Intimate reciprocal relations exist between Health and a pure state of the Skin. Cleanse the Skin thoroughly by a medium which is not irritating. When the pores are opened, the skin becomes a vehicle to carry off diseases, instead of a trap to catch and hold them. A most luxurious Toilet Article is Golden Star Bay Leaf Water.

THE AUSTRIANS IN BOSNIA.——The Porte has been much blamed for its dilatoriness in coming to an agreement with Austria, but its course has been exactly what ought to have been anticipated. Austria was commissioned by the Congress to occupy Bosnia for a time, and the Sultan is fully within his right in insisting that he shall be told how long it is proposed that the occupation shall last. After all, however, the difficulty does not rest with him; the Begs of Bosnia form the real obstacle to the advance of the Austrians. Whether the Porte is willing to see its subjects severed from it or not, they are by no means willing to go. Their obstinacy is said to be explained by their fondness for ancient abuses, but this certainly does not exhaust the question. The Mahomedans of Bulgaria have had small reason to congratulate themselves on the triumph of the Christians. Savage Bulgarians, encouraged by equally savage Russians, have been inflicting on the unhappy Turks of that province the most horrible cruelties; the evident design of Russia being to exterminate, if she can, the Turkish population. We do not believe that Austria would adopt any such barbarous policy. She is a civilised State, and will not disgrace herself by cold-blooded brutality. But the Bosnians may be excused for having no such confidence. The supreme fact for them is that the Austrians are Christians, and Russia has made the very name of Christianity hideous and loathsome to them. Of course there can be no question as to the way in which the struggle will end. Austria must win, let her victories cost what they may; and she will not now even pretend that the occupation is to be temporary. She will claim Bosnia as her own by right of conquest, and the Begs will have to get on as they best can under her rule. For our part, we have little doubt that her settlement in this new province will ultimately be for the advantage both of Bosnia itself and of Europe, since Russia will clearly understand that she cannot make another move towards Constantinople without reckoning with Austria. But the scheme has been badly executed. Austria should have come to an understanding with the Porte while the Congress was sitting; and the army of occupation ought to have been so powerful that resistance to it would have been obviously hopeless.

INCORRIGIBLES.——What is to be done with Ann Smith and Margaret Malcolm? The former, aged sixty-five, has just been convicted at the Liverpool Borough Sessions of stealing, and it appears that since the year 1839, when she was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for a similar offence, she has spent almost the whole of the last forty years in undergoing various sentences. As the Recorder said, "She would probably be always before the Court, for as soon as she got out of gaol she began committing an offence of precisely the same description as before." The latter lady, a married woman, aged forty-five, was brought before the magistrate at the Westminster Police, a few days ago, on the charge of being drunk and disorderly, and it was stated that she had been in custody something like fifty times for this offence; her husband, a hard-working man, having paid little less than 200*l.* for her in fines during a course of years. She had joined a teetotal society some little time ago, but soon relapsed into her old ways. It is no libel to say that these two ladies belong to the "incorrigible" class, on whom fines and imprisonment have no more effect than pouring water on a duck's back. Surely society ought to be able to do something to protect itself permanently against such persons, and to protect them from themselves. With all respect to what is called "the liberty of the subject," we are strongly of opinion that the only way to deal with them is to withdraw them from society altogether. This, of course can only be done by fresh legislation, and we can see no good reason why this should not be effected. For this class of persons institutions, which should be something of a cross between prisons and workhouses, might be established, and a certain number of convictions be the qualification for internment therein. We do not say that internment for life should be the sentence, but "during Her Majesty's pleasure," in the reasonable acceptation of the phrase. Certain privileges might be accorded to prisoners after a certain period of probation and unmistakeable evidence of reformation. The inmates of such institutions would, in most cases, be eventually happier in themselves, and their cost to society would probably not be greater than it now is through the expense of repeated prosecutions.

MIDDLE CLASS SCHOOLMASTERS.——A good many people have been giving their opinions this week as to the propriety of submitting middle-class schools to inspection. The majority of schoolmasters seem to object to the suggestion; and they are probably right. As inspection is not deemed necessary in the case of the other professions, it would tend to lower the position of the higher class of teachers, and to prevent men of independent character from adopting the calling. At the same time, middle-class schoolmasters ought to remember that lawyers and doctors are placed under restrictions from which they are at present free. Society insists, and very properly insists, that before a man becomes either a doctor or a lawyer he shall give evidence of fitness for the duties. Anybody, on the other hand, may become a schoolmaster. It is true that of late years the general character of the middle-class schools has been greatly improved; perhaps some of those recently founded will compare favourably with similar institutions in any part of the world. But there are still many schoolmasters who have started schools, not because they have much love for this kind of work, or special aptitude for it, but because they are unable to make their way in any other mode of life. The results are, of course, disastrous. Boys entrusted to such men are not really educated; they receive a smattering of knowledge without intellectual discipline, and no attempt is made to raise their moral standard above a certain dull respect for the proprieties. This state of things ought to he no longer tolerated. A teacher's work is in every respect as important as that of a lawyer or a doctor; and it should be a grave offence to undertake it without adequate preparation. If charlatans were excluded from the profession by a series of rigid examinations carried on by competent authorities—examinations adapted to a properly graduated system of instruction—there would, we believe, he no necessity for subsequent inspection. The tone of the whole class would be raised; and the active competition which goes on between rival schools would keep most of them up to a fair level. We do not think there would be much difficulty in arranging for some such test as that for which we argue. The materials for a thoroughly satisfactory system already exist; they only need to be efficiently organised.

GLEANING.——This is a seasonable topic, but of late years unfortunately the system of modern agriculture has come into conflict with the old custom of gleaning which has prevailed more or less among all nations since patriarchal times. The Mosaic law, which among its injunctions and precepts contained many provisions in favour of the poor, enjoined the farmer not "to gather the gleanings of his harvest," but to leave them for his needy neighbours, and from time immemorial this has been the custom throughout the country. The introduction, however, of reaping machines has raised a question as to the rights of the poor, or, at least, as to the propriety of the farmer dragging his wheatfields with a horserake before the gleaners are admitted. The poor and their champions maintain that such dragging is an invasion of their time-honoured, and, as some hold, their legal, privileges; but there are really no substantial grounds for the complaints made. Many of the reaping machines, though they do their work expeditiously, scatter twice and thrice the number of ears the hand-reapers do after the olden and almost exploded fashion, and consequently the farmer must needs have recourse to the rake. Whether this be a hand-rake or a horse-rake, against which latter the gleaners and their advocates raise such an outcry, matters not; the farmer must get in what he can, or rather what pays him, of his crop. As to the legal or common law right of gleaners, simply they have none, as was decided years ago before Lord Loughborough and other learned judges after a long argument. It is simply on sufferance that they enter the farmer's fields. This is how matters really stand. We are not wanting in sympathy for the poor, and should regret if the old custom of gleaning were to disappear. It is part of the poetry of the harvest, which we cannot afford to dispense with in this prosaic age. The poor families in a parish often manage to realise some pounds' worth of corn during the gleaning season, though against this must be set a considerable wear and tear of clothes, to say nothing of occasionally getting wet through to the skin. On the other hand, as those conversant with life in country parishes are aware, the gleaning season has a tendency to encourage lawless habits. Women in herds become unusually bold, and raids into fields before the corn is carted are of common occurrence. Hence farmers in many districts have threatened to exclude the gleaners from their fields altogether.

SOLDIERS AND SOCIETY.——An interesting controversy has been going on as to the manner in which soldiers are treated by English society. They assert that their uniform subjects them to insults from which they would be exempt if they wore plain clothes, and we fear there is a good deal of truth in the complaint. Privates and non-commissioned officers are not allowed to sit in the stalls of a theatre, and we believe they are forbidden to walk within the sacred precincts of a certain Metropolitan Bazaar. The Chaplain to the Household Brigade at Windsor declares that even in church the soldier is sometimes made to feel his inferiority. A non-commissioned officer in the Blues—a "most respectable, well-connected man"—was on one occasion, "with some hesitation," shown into a pew already occupied by a butcher and his wife. The soldier was accompanied by his wife and child. This invasion was too much for the feelings of the worthy butcher, who, with his better half, instantly got up and rushed out. Perhaps the prejudice is to some extent due to the fact that the army was at one time drawn from the lowest strata of society; we suspect, however, that it is also caused by the snobbishness of the British public. It is well known that, as a class, soldiers are now as well-behaved and worthy of respect as any other section of the community, but it pleases Englishmen to regard them as holding lower "rank" than shopkeepers. A more egregious blunder could not be committed. It is impossible for this country to have recourse to the conscription; so that our only chance of having a good army is to make the service as attractive as possible. Yet we do our utmost to convey the impression that only a scapegrace or a downright rascal would degrade himself by donning the national livery. The French, the Germans, and the Russians adopt a very different policy; and if our pride would allow us, we might take a useful lesson from them without having the least desire to imitate their general military system. It has been suggested that if officers wore uniform in private life the uniform of the men would soon be more respected. We are inclined to agree with this view, and the Commander-in-Chief might do worse than take the proposal into consideration.

SWIMMING BATHS——The Hon. Secretary of the London Swimming Club, which has done so much of late years to promote the practice of swimming by giving gratuitous lessons in the art, has called public attention to the lamentable lack of open-air baths and swimming facilities in the metropolis. The baths, in most cases connected with washhouses, established by parochial authorities under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, are generally but poor affairs, and in summer, when a dip in the water is most attractive, are so laden with hot and, in some instances, impure atmosphere, that even those most anxious to learn to swim shrink from using them. We quite agree with Mr. J. G. Elliott that what are wanted are open-air baths; and these might easily be provided in the waters of our public parks, such as Regent's Park, Hyde Park, St. James's Park, and Victoria Park, to say nothing of floating baths on the Thames, after the fashion of those on the Seine at Paris, the Neckar at Heidelberg, and other Continental rivers. They would not disfigure the water on which they were placed, if a little taste were exhibited in their construction; and, after their original cost, a penny per head from the bathers would probably cover the working expenses. Years ago we were promised floating baths on the Thames, but practically nothing has been done to supply them. Open-air gymnasiums have very properly been provided in most of the parks, but for the convenience of bathers little has been done, as the limited accommodation on the Serpentine and in Victoria Park is so curtailed by restriction as to hours as to become almost useless. On the Trent at Nottingham there is a bathing shed which is sometimes used by two thousand persons at a time; and in London such arrangements could he increased twentyfold. In the recent debate on the Education vote Mr. Hubbard suggested that each school receiving State aid should have a swimming bath attached to it. This would undoubtedly be a move in the right direction.

THE AMERICAN NATIONALISTS.——Now that General Butler has deserted the Republicans and gone over to the Nationalists, the latter party is likely to attract rather more attention than has hitherto been given to it. The General, if not a man of much intellectual ability, has plenty of energy, and he is as unscrupulous as any of the famous demagogues of history. A party with which he associates himself, therefore, is sure at least to make some noise and to excite a little temporary alarm. The leading principles of the Nationalists are that public debts ought to be repudiated, and that a Government acts shamefully that does not issue an unlimited quantity of greenbacks. These dogmas do not, however, exhaust the creed of the party, many of whose members think that workmen have a clear right to be virtually maintained by the State, and that production ought to be artificially regulated for their benefit. The movement is essentially the same as that which is now giving the German Government so much trouble; but we shall be greatly surprised if it becomes as dangerous in the United States as it is in Germany. The circumstances of the two countries are altogether different. German workmen are so accustomed to see the State interfere with private life that they may be excused for thinking that, if it chose, it might make everybody well-off; but in America the State has so little to do, and does that little so badly, that no important class can ever wish vastly to extend its functions. Then, while the German Socialists will be forced henceforth to carry on their propaganda in secret, all parties in America are encouraged to give full expression to their grievances. Thus American revolutionists are constantly exposed to argument and banter; and in a free country both methods of attack are certain sooner or later to exercise a powerful influence. What is still more important, the tremendous military system of Germany weighs heavily upon industrial energy, so that there is but little hope of a return of prosperity during the present generation. The Americans have unlimited land at their disposal, and there can be no doubt that in a short time trade will once more be in a flourishing condition. In these circumstances Socialism must be regarded as a natural growth in Germany, but as an artificial product on the other side of the Atlantic. It will continue to worry Prince Bismarck and his successors; Mr. Hayes and those who come after him will probably never be seriously disturbed by its manifestations.

THE POOR CLERGY.——The recent annual meeting of the supporters of the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation reminds us of the lamentable state of things which still exists in the Church of England in consequence of the large number of small benefices, which, though called "livings," are only so by a figure of speech and on the well-known lucus e non lucendo principle. Those below the value of 250*l.* per annum are still reckoned by thousands, notwithstanding the various agencies at work for their augmentation. The people of England almost unanimously hold that a married clergy is preferable to a celibate; and it is evident that the clergy themselves endorse this view. The result, however, is the existence of hundreds of families of highly educated and sensitive gentlemen scattered throughout the land attempting to live on an income which hardly suffices for first-class mechanics, and the frequent involvement in the cares and heart-breakings connected with straightened means. It is little less than a national disgrace that hundreds of the clergy of the National Church should annually be compelled to seek aid of such a Society as that mentioned, and even accept parcels of old clothing which friends kindly send to the offices of the Corporation in Southampton Street, Strand, for distribution. What the number of the clergy is that thus seeks relief from the Society every year may be gathered from the fact that in the last twelve months the sum of 6,565*l.* was distributed in grants varying from 5*l.* to 25*l.* each, the average being, we believe, from 7*l.* to 10*l.* This is a sad revelation, and should lead the lay members of the Church to take more urgent steps than they have yet taken to rectify the crying evil. When we consider the wealth of the country there ought to be no great difficulty in raising the value of every living to at least 300*l.* per annum. In the meanwhile charitable persons cannot do better than contribute to the funds of the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation, which we are glad to notice has received an extra amount of support during the past year. Canon Farrar endorsed the claims of it at the meeting in question, when he said "He knew no instance of any Society which was supported at such small working expense, or with so small a means of appealing to the public." It is on these grounds among others that we willingly advocate it.

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS

WE have here some more sketches from Larnaca and its neighbourhood. In the first a couple of cavalry men, accompanied by a native guide, are scouring the district in search of suitable camping ground for the little army of occupation. The place ultimately chosen was Chiflick, distant from Larnaca about five miles, and the gallant 42nd settled down at once, regardless of the mosquitoes, sand-flies, and other insect-pests which there abounded. The published statements respecting the healthiness of the spot, and indeed of the whole island, are of such a contradictory character that we can only hope that the brighter side of the picture may prove the most truthful. The construction of the "Duke's Pier," so called because the work was carried on under the immediate superintendence of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, was effected very rapidly, a number of the timbers being bolted together on the shore and afterwards floated into position and fixed to the piles upon which the superstructure rested. The disembarkation of the men and horses, an operation of some difficulty as the transports were fully half a mile from the shore, was also conducted by the Duke of Edinburgh, and was performed in such a thoroughly efficient manner as to evoke special commendations from the chief authorities.

KHELAT

WHAT is popularly known as Beloochistan includes a large tract of country about 400 miles long and 350 wide, which has Afghanistan for its northern, the Arabian Sea for its southern, Scinde for its eastern, and Persia for its western boundary. It is a region of undulating mountains, wide sandy plains, and narrow fertile valleys, through which run two great lines of communication known as the Bolan and Malla Passes. For sixty or seventy miles from the sea the general level rises very gradually, but afterwards more rapidly, until it attains an altitude of over 3,000 feet. In winter the cold is as intense in these highlands as is the heat of summer in the plains. Kelat is the capital. The whole commercial and political importance of Beloochistan is owing to the passes running through it between India and Central Asia. There are eleven altogether, but the Bolan is the chief of all. It is the shortest route from Candahar and Herat to India, and is the natural outlet to the ocean of the great and growing trade of Central Asia. It is perfectly practicable for artillery, and its western entrance is so narrow and precipitous that it could be readily defended against vast odds by a few determined men. The significance, therefore, of the closer relations which have been drawn between the Government of India and the Khan of Khelat will be readily understood. A British force will henceforth occupy Beloochistan; and the engraving which we give of the Fort of Khelat will convey to our readers more vividly than any written description an idea of the great strength of one of the positions it will have to hold. Except that Alexander passed through it, and that Nearchus sailed along its coasts, Beloochistan has no connection with the history of the development of the world's civilisation; nor even any annals of its own until the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But now that a railway to the foot of the Bolan is on the point of construction, and a line of telegraph has already been constructed to Quettah, Beloochistan is sure at last to be roused out of the deep sleep in which for centuries it has been plunged.

THE VOYAGE OF THE "NAUTILUS"

THIS little vessel which has just traversed the Atlantic in forty-five days is manned by two brothers, named Andrews, respectively a pianoforte maker and a joiner, who have never been to sea before, but have only undertaken coasting trips in fishing boats. Although not the smallest boat which has performed the voyage—that honour being claimed by the City of Ragusa—the Nautilus only measures some nineteen feet in length, is a little over six feet in breadth, is two feet three inches in depth, and draws six and a half inches of water. She is decked throughout, with the exception of a small aperture for entrance, and was ballasted with fresh-water casks, which were filled with sea-water as they became emptied. The Nautilus and her adventurous crew left City Point on June 7th, but next day were obliged to put back to Beverley, owing to the damage sustained through a heavy gale. On June 12th, however, the little vessel fairly started on her voyage which, although arduous, was altogether not unenjoyable, though, as the elder brother remarks in his log, "Keeping your eyes on the compass throughout a foggy night and watching for lights, blowing fog-horns, wet and cold, without relief, watching the seas as they follow you, thinking now and again you might strike a log which would make a hole through your half inch cedar, is a novelty not altogether to be desired." Heavy weather and fogs were encountered during a great portion of the voyage; but several vessels were spoken with—the captain of an English schooner insisting upon the two brothers dining with him. On July 28th a storm drove the Nautilus up the St. George's Channel, and in the evening Bishop's Rock was sighted. Next day the two brothers attempted to weather Lizard Point, but failed, owing to a strong north-easterly wind, so they put back into Mullion Cove, and, for the first time, landed on British soil. The Nautilus has now gone to Paris—the original intention of the brothers Andrews being a visit to the Paris Exhibition.

THE GEORGE MOORE MEMORIAL BUILDINGS

THESE buildings have been recently erected at Pinner in connection with the Commercial Travellers' School, with which they have been designed to harmonise, and in memory of the late Mr. George Moore, the well-known philanthropist, who was the treasurer, and who took great interest in the Institution. The view shows the new buildings and additions only, which comprise an infirmary of two floors, as distinct as if they were separate buildings; a large laundry, in which water is the motive power instead of steam; and a fine swimming bath. New dormitories occupy the whole of the centre of the main building; but the principal feature is the central gable of the infirmary, which contains a bust of the late Mr. Moore, surrounded with a floral border, beneath which is a panel and bas relief representing Mr. Moore distributing prizes to the children, the whole executed in Della Robbia ware, and set in a black marble moulded frame, with panels right and left containing the arms of Mr. Moore and of the Institution, and fauna and flora of the neighbourhood. The architect is Mr. Thomas Ed. Knightley, of Cannon Street, City. We must not forget to add that the appeal for funds made by Mr. Hughes (the present treasurer), Mr. Moore's partner, was answered by 17,000*l.*, a most unprecedented sum.

LOCUSTS IN SOUTHERN INDIA

"THE famine is virtually over," writes the artist, "most of the rice crops are reaped, but Southern India is visited by a plague of locusts. In the districts of Madura, Tinnevelly, Mysore, and on the Neilgherries enormous flights of locusts have appeared; but as yet they have confined their ravages to the pastures and young paddy. According to an Arabian legend a locust said to the Prophet Mahomet, "We are the army of the great God, we produce ninety-nine eggs; if the hundred were completed we should consume the whole earth;" and as they require less than one month to deposit and hatch their ninety-nine eggs, what an utter wilderness the most luxuriant lands would be reduced to, when they are said to occupy a country from three to seven years, and to live on the leaves and bark of the bitterest trees, after everything else green has been devoured. The only hope for the poor distressed land is, that before the three or seven years are completed the monsoon will destroy the whole army.

After having eaten all the green crops in the Madura district, flights of locusts appeared on the grass hills of the Western Ghauts. Towards the middle of March, on a still sultry day, cries were heard of "They are coming! They are coming!" from the herdsmen, and seeing the cattle rushing about in all directions, it was supposed that a tiger had caught a cow; but on going out of doors, a thick mist was seen creeping up over the grass hills; it fluttered down like a fall of snow in silver flakes into the valley. Millions and millions of locusts seemed to be trying to force their way northwards, but a slight breeze springing up, drove them southwards; for an hour and a quarter they flew over the valley in countless numbers, clouding the light of the sun, and filling the air with the rushing sound of falling water. This swarm must have been two miles in length,

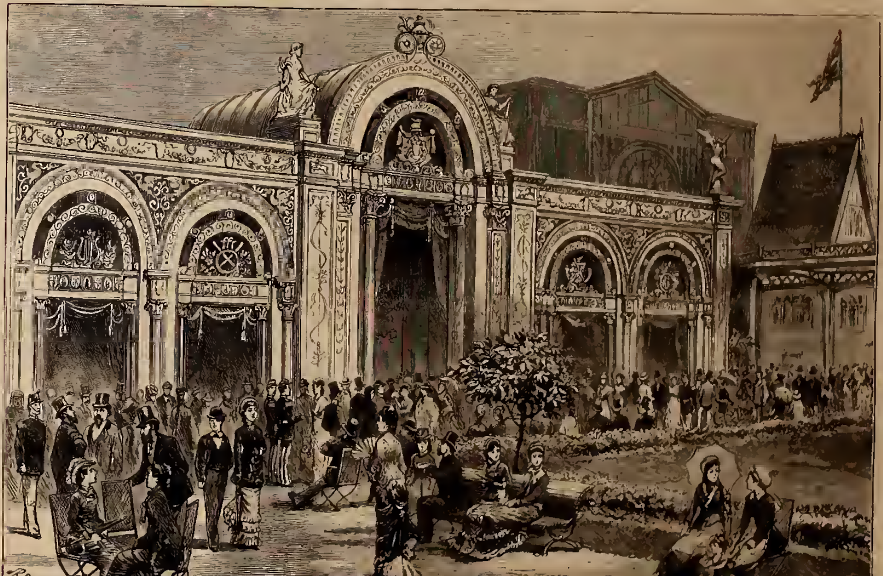
THE PLAGUE OF LOCUSTS IN SOUTHERN INDIA



THE PARIS EXHIBITION—ITALIAN FAÇADE IN THE "STREET OF ALL NATIONS" the locusts flying so close together that there did not seem to be space enough for them to use their wings; along their course the whole ground was turned to a dull brown colour by the numbers which fell out of the ranks to rest on the way. While they rested they were far from idle, but fell to hunting in the parched grass for any green blades that had managed to keep alive during the hot weather. In my first sketch the locusts are struggling with each other for any green morsels that could be found in the centre of the tufts. In Sketch No. 2 coolies are driving the locusts out of a coffee plantation with tom-toms or native drums and sticks; the coffee being in bud, it was feared that should the flight settle there would be little chance of any of the flower spikes escaping. The noise of seven tom-toms and of about fifty coolies shouting and howling, while they beat the bushes with sticks, drove off the stragglers which rose in clouds before the line of men, and joined the great swarm, as the wind drifted it southwards over the hills. Firing a gun, loaded with fine sand, into the line of flight of the locusts, killed hundreds and often made them change their course."

THE PARIS EXHIBITION—THE ITALIAN FAÇADE

THE sample of Italian architecture in the International Street of the Paris Exhibition can hardly be termed so successful as many of the other façades—as, for instance, the Austrian and Belgian constructions. Still, as a whole, the effect is not wholly unpleasing, the façade being composed of one large arch flanked by two smaller ones on either side, supported by green and white marble columns, and embellished with various mosaics and terra-cotta decorations.

TROUT-FISHING—THE FIRST CAST OF THE SEASON

AT this holiday season, when half the London world is taking its holiday on the moors, by the sea-side, or on the banks of well-stocked trout or salmon streams, our engraving of "The First Cast of the Season" will recall to many of our piscatorial readers the discomforts, and yet the intense delights, of that brief spring holiday which enthusiastic disciples of the rod rarely fail to afford themselves, when the close season comes to an end, and they are once more free to visit their old river-side haunts and tempt the wary "monarch of the stream" with a March Brown. Indeed, to many a man his spring holiday is infinitely more enjoyable than his autumn leisure, and so evidently thinks our artist, who writes:—"What sunny memories we corner in the month of April! The cold east winds have ceased to blow for awhile, the primroses and anemones are all in bloom, there is a balminess and freshness in the air, and the sap of life mounts quickly in our veins. Books, easels, pictures, the companions of the winter's cold—no more of them. Let us take down the fishing-rod from its dusty shelf, the reel and fly-hook from the drawer. We will don our wading-stockings, all stiff and creaky from disuse, sling on a pannier, and hie us to the stream. As we wend our way, the cuckoo, though mute yet, plays across our path, and surely yonder is a swallow flitting round the ash-tree at the gate; beyond that sandy bank covered with stiff blossoms of the meadow-dock is the stream, and now we stand upon its brink and watch the waves of liquid amber pouring over the stones—the weeds, the misery of later months, telling in their germ-like stains of green upon the gold. Now then, like good fishermen true, no hurry or impatience, but a pipe, 'dulce est decipere in loco,' a pipe of contemplation and hopeful anticipation, of observation keen and workmanlike as well. The blue dun is up, but he sails quite unmolested on his way; and yet we heard a tinkling splash under the willow like the rise of a heavy trout. What is the reason? Ah! we have it now. There goes a March Brown, sitting jauntily upon the water, his wings cocked up like the sails of a tiny felucca. We said there; but where? He is clean gone and out of sight, sucked under, no doubt, and swallowed. Now for it, we have had pipe enough, and he who means to work must work without a pipe. We have had what is called in racing slang the straightest of straight tips for our 'first cast of the season.'"

THE NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD

THE review of the Particular Service Squadron, which was held last week in the presence of the Queen, though marred as a public spectacle by the prevalence of rain and haze, was none the less an event of significant importance, and naturally attracted many sightseers. All along Southsea Beach and Haslar Wall there was a thin fringe of spectators, while the water around the Fleet was thickly dotted with yachts and other vessels of all sorts and sizes. The number of vessels to be reviewed was not large; there were twenty-six in all, and they were drawn up into two lines, called respectively the Port and Starboard Divisions, the former consisting entirely of vessels of the turret and monitor class, whilst the latter was composed exclusively of broadsides. The Squadron, which was under the command of Admiral Sir Cooper Key, was manned by gallant fellows almost exclusively drawn from the Coastguard, and the entire fleet was ready, if need be, to go to sea on "particular service" at a moment's notice. The proceedings of the day commenced with the embarkation, on board the Euphrates, of the members of both Houses of Parliament, who were brought from London by special train, and the simultaneous embarkation of the other privileged visitors on board the various ships to which they had been invited. Most of these, after leaving the harbour, had time to inspect the wreck of the Eurydice before the hour at which Her Majesty was expected to leave Osborne. At noon a Royal salute was fired from all the vessels at Spithead and in the harbour, and the ships were dressed, those about to proceed outside with masthead flags only, while the vessels which were to remain stationary dressed in rainbow, with the flags extending from masthead to masthead.

Her Majesty left Osborne about three o'clock, and as she stepped on board the Victoria and Albert from the Royal barge the Royal Standard fluttered at the masthead, and the answering salute of the Fleet, though inaudible at that distance, was visible in the flashes of fire from the guns and the smoke, which floated away in magnificent clouds towards the east. The Victoria and Albert now steamed away towards the fleet, while in her wake followed the Royal yacht Osborne; then the Enchantress, with their Lordships the Commissioners of the Admiralty; then the Fire Queen, with the Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Fanshawe, flying his flag at the main; then the Euphrates, with the Lords, Commons, and a large number of peeresses and lady commoners; then the Vivid, with the foreign representatives, and the Dasher and Britomart, with half-pay naval officers and officers of the garrison. In this order the little flotilla passed between the two divisions of the fleet, the crews of the broadsides manning yards, and those of the turret ships and monitors the turrets, and decks; and cheering lustily as Her Majesty passed by.

Until the Victoria and Albert had almost reached the flagship it was still doubtful whether the fleet would or would not be ordered under way. Everything was in readiness, steam was up, the signal to undress the ships in the event of proceeding to the eastward was prepared for hoisting, and men were told off to let the cables slip at a moment's notice. Just as the Royal yacht, however, approached the Hercules a signal was made to "negative slip" in consequence of the weather, and a second signal announced that Her Majesty would not steam between the lines on her return. The flotilla now proceeded round the Warner lightship, the Victoria and Albert making a wide circle in order to allow the Euphrates to get round easily. The flotilla of yachts was followed by a magnificent fleet of yachts in full sail, steamers, and dockyard craft.

As the Royal yacht approached, the Queen made the following signal to Admiral Key—"Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen is much pleased, and regrets extremely that the bad weather has prevented the evolutions." There was more manning yards and saluting as the Victoria and Albert steamed away towards Cowes, Her Majesty herself making the signal to fire. The ships undressed at nine o'clock at night in the midst of a downpour of rain. The whole fleet was brilliantly illuminated, the masted vessels burning long lights at the lower and topsail yardarms, and on the bowsprit and taffrail, sending up six rockets simultaneously; and the turret ships burning eight long lights, one at the bow, another at the stern, and the remainder at conspicuous positions, ending with a discharge of rockets. One of the most interesting features of the review was the performance of Messrs. Yarrow's torpedo boats, which went rushing about in all directions at an amazing speed. They are built of steel, and are each 35 feet long by 11 feet beam. They carry engines of 420-horse power, of which every part is made hollow for the sake of lightness, and their maximum speed is twenty-one knots an hour. They were originally built for the Russian Government, and are constructed to carry only spar, or outrigged torpedoes.

NOTE.——Our Dublin Supplement. We omitted to state last week that our artist desires to express his thanks to Sir Bernard Burke, the Lord Mayor, Dr. Shaw, of Trinity College, and Mr. L. Pearson, for the great courtesy and assistance he received from them during his stay in Dublin.

CORRECTION.——Colonel Henry Basevi writes to us as follows:—"In your sketch of the life of the Right Hon. Lord Beaconsfield, K.G., you have made one small error which I shall feel much obliged if you will correct. You say 'Isaac Disraeli married in 1802 a sister of George (Joshua) Basevi, the well-known Hebrew architect, to whom Cambridge is indebted for the fine Fitzwilliam Museum.' Isaac Disraeli married a sister of George (Joshua) Basevi, who lived at Brighton, and was a deputy-lieutenant for Sussex, and father of the George Basevi, the architect, whose son I am proud to be."

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——The Session is over, and all the Ministers have left town. The Earl of Beaconsfield has been to Osborne on a visit to Her Majesty the Queen.—On Wednesday Mr. Cross, Lord Sandon, and Colonel Stanley were entertained at a banquet given by the Mayor of Liverpool, in recognition of the fact that three representatives from Lancashire have seats in the Cabinet. Mr. Cross defended the foreign policy of the Government, and said that not only had our honour been maintained, but there was every reason to believe that our strength and position were now appreciated, and that peace would be permanent. Colonel Stanley, responding for the army, praised the readiness with which the country and the colonies had offered their services in the event of their being required.—Under the title of "The Berlin Treaty and the Anglo-Turkish Convention," the Liberal Central Association have republished Mr. Gladstone's speech in support of Lord Hartington's motion in the House of Commons.—The Eccleshall Conservative Association have sent an address to Mr. Roebuck congratulating him on his appointment as Privy Councillor, and expressing their admiration of the "manly, patriotic, and honourable course he has pursued on the Eastern Question, which it feels has materially assisted in bringing the matter to a pacific conclusion, whilst, at the same time, it has upheld the dignity and position of Great Britain."—At a Home Rule demonstration, at Glasgow, on Saturday, resolutions were enthusiastically adopted to the effect that no concession but a National Parliament in Ireland would be accepted; that it was contemptible policy to release Irish rebels only when dying from inhuman treatment in prison; and that the Irish of all creeds should unite to obtain Ireland's rights.—On the same day Mr. Joseph Arch addressed a meeting of Liberals at Dudley, and replying to certain strictures which Lord Dartmouth had passed on him at a Conservative banquet recently held in the neighbourhood, said that he had never written to The Times speaking of revolt if the farmers ever introduced more machinery. "Instead of being a Republican, as he had been charged with being, he was the best Conservative subject Her Majesty had, for he wanted the rights of working men as well as of other people conserved, and he wanted to see the peace, welfare, and happiness of England conserved." A resolution was passed condemning the Anglo-Turkish Convention as being unnecessary for the protection of any legitimate British interest, and as indefinitely increasing the already great responsibilities of the country without any adequate compensation; and declaring that the Eastern policy of the Government has been the cause of an expenditure which is lavish and oppressive, and which ought to be reduced.—A meeting in support of women's Suffrage was held in Dublin on Saturday under the presidency of Lord Talbot de Malahide. One speaker said that the time would come when women would hold seats in Parliament, but another declared that there was no connection between the question of allowing women to vote, and that of permitting them to sit in Parliament, although he believed that their presence there would greatly add to its life and animation.—It is rumoured that Miss Helen Taylor will be a candidate for Southwark at the next election. Of course she would not be admitted even if returned, and it is doubtful whether the returning officer could legally accept the nomination.—The nomination for the Argyleshire seat vacated by the Marquis of Lorne took place on Tuesday, the candidates being Lord Colin Campbell (L.) and Mr. J. Wingfield Malcolm (C.)—On the same day Mr. S. Rathbone Edge (L.) and Mr. C. Donaldson Hudson (C.) were nominated for the vacancy at Newcastle-under-Lyme.—Mr. John De Morgan, the Tichbornite and Commons Rights agitator, is anxious to become a candidate for Leeds. On Tuesday he attempted to address a meeting on Woodhouse Moor, but in some way offended the mob, by whom he was so roughly handled that he had to fly to the police-station for shelter.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION IN DUBLIN.——The sectiona work of the meeting began on Friday, Professor Ingram discoursing on "Economic Science;" Dr. John Evans on "Geology, and the Theory respecting the Probable Effects of a Change in the Position of the Earth's Axis;" and Sir W. Thompson in the Geographical Section. The chief items of Friday's proceedings were Professor Huxley's lecture on "Anthropology;" Sir J. Lubbock's interesting account of the "Habits of Ants;" and a remarkable lecture by Mr. Romane on "Animal Intelligence." On Saturday little work was attempted, the majority of the savants joining the excursions. One party visited Malahide Castle and the Earl of Charlemont's seat, Fairview; another went to Bray Head and lunched with the Earl of Meath; others to Maynooth Catholic College, and Carton, the seat of the Duke of Leinster, Phœnix Park, Howth, Dublin Bay, and Glencree. In the evening the Lord Mayor of Dublin gave a banquet in the Round Room of the Mansion House, his lordship being supported on his right by the Lord-Lieutenant, and on his left by Mr. Spottiswoode, the President of the Association. On Sunday special services were held in the cathedral and in most of the churches. The Bishop of Derry and the Dean of Norwich preached in the recently-opened Christ Church Cathedral; Archdeacon Reichel preached twice in St. Patrick's Cathedral; Mr. Griffiths in the York Street Congregational Church; and Dr. Mullens at Kingstown. In the evening the usual devotional service, with which Dr. Gladstone's name has so long been associated, was held. Monday opened with a breakfast at the Zoological Gardens. Mr. Robert Harley read a curious and learned paper on "The Stanhope Demonstrator, or Logical Machine;" Captain Burton one on the "Land of Midian;" and Mr. E. Preece discoursed on "Telegraphy." On Tuesday honorary degrees of LL.D. of Dublin University were bestowed on Mr. Spottiswoode and twelve other members of the Association, a temperance meeting was held, and in the Sections various subjects were dealt with, the most interesting being Major Wilson's paper on "Cyprus," and Dr. Rae's on the "Best Route to Attain the North Pole." The day closed with a soirée at the Royal Irish Academy. On Wednesday the final meetings took place, and Thursday and Friday were devoted to more excursions. Next year's meeting is to be held in Sheffield, and Dr. Allman will be the President.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The bronze medallion of the Royal Humane Society has been awarded to Miss Fanny Helder, the young lady whose daring rescue of a drowning girl we last week alluded to in our "Topics."—The thirty-fifth annual congress of the British Archæological Association is now in session at Wisbeach.—The Eurydice is still lying on her starboard side, and, as soon as weather permits, an attempt will be made to shift her over, so that the remaining leakages may be caulked. Seventy-nine bodies have been recovered from her, and it is expected more will yet be found between decks.—On Saturday an iron ship, lying in the London Docks to receive cargo, suddenly capsized and sank, carrying down with her three barges which were lying alongside. Fortunately no lives were lost, but twenty men were thrown into the water. She now lies on her broadside with half her keel visible, and is being dismantled preparatory to being raised by derricks. The accident is remarkable, especially as the vessel is stated to have had on board twenty tons more ballast than usual.—The despatch-boat Lively appears determined to distinguish itself. On Saturday, in Portsmouth Harbour, she collided with a small boat which got entangled with one of her paddles, but at last got free without much harm being done.—On Friday last Lieutenant Von Zubovitz, of the Hungarian Army, performed a novel feat in the Thames. Mounted on horseback, with an india-rubber saddle inflated with air, he swam down the river from Westminster to Limehouse. The saddle, which is his own invention, keeps the rider dry above the waist, and is intended for crossing wide and rapid rivers where no bridges exist.—Mr. Girling and her community of Shakers are again in trouble, having been turned out of the field in which they have been allowed to camp since 1876. They and their goods are now upon the roadside, but the police have given them notice to move on.—The poll which is to be taken at Manchester upon the Thirlmere Water Scheme is expected to cost 1,600*l*.—Professor Baynes, editor of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and his wife narrowly escaped being killed at St. Andrew's on Friday last. They were returning from a drive, and were at a steep part of the road when a runaway horse and cart ran into the carriage. The carriage was wrecked and the driver seriously injured, but Dr. and Mrs. Baynes escaped with a severe shaking.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——We are still in the by-weeks of racing, though what is called the old-fashioned meeting at Stockton has produced some excellent sport, and the running on the Port Meadow at Oxford has been by no means dull. At the former gathering Lord Zetland, as became a Yorkshire magnate, was to the fore, and the Aske banner was borne to victory not a few times. His lordship won the Biennial named after his house with Allegra, the Cleveland Stakes with a Speculum-Mysotis colt (how these Speculums are winning!), and the Wynyard Handicap with Necklace. Lord Durham supplied a surprise in Datura for the Tradesman's Handicap, to the discomfiture of Mars and Constantine, the favourites in a small field. Tiger Lily, not blessed with the best of tempers, followed up the success of last week by taking the Great Northern Leger, while Coromandel II. scored in the Lambton Plate and Lantern Fly in the Harewood Plate. The Hardwicke Stakes, another two-year-old contest, fell to the favourite, Falmouth, Mr. R. C. Vyner, who had but bad luck at the meeting, running second with Mausoleum. Cleopatra, who has recently scored something like half-a-dozen victories, added yet another by winning the Selling Stakes on the second day.—The St. Leger begins to get very interesting as regards market operations, Beauclerc having been backed within the last few days for a heap of money at a little over 4 to 1. If he can stand his preparation up to the day, it requires no prophet to intimate that half the price, and perhaps less, will be taken on the 11th of next month. Still, let it be noted that the knights of the pencil seem to have plenty of money to lay against him. Brown Bread, a rare stayer in his time on the turf, has joined the majority. It will be remembered that in 1865, as a three-year-old, he won the Northumberland Plate carrying 6st. 2lb., the famous Caller Ou, who was then "aged," being second with 9st.—Kincsem, which being interpreted we believe means "Darling," the heroine of the Goodwood Cup, won her thirty-eighth successive victory in the Deauville Cup on Sunday last.—Mr. George Payne, one of the veterans of the English Turf, has been lying dangerously ill for some days, but at the time of making this note is reported better. There would be a general rejoicing in racing circles were he to recover and once more appear on the scene in which for so long has been a chief figure.

THE NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD—FIRING

HE ROYAL SALUTE FROM H.M.S. "HERCULES"

Cricket.——There has been plenty of activity in the cricketing world since our last. One of the most interesting matches has been that between Gloucester and All England at the Oval. Last year it may be remembered that the county won, but on Saturday last the verdict was for England (hardly a representative team) by six wickets. With the exception of Mr. W. W. Read's 43 (not out) for England there were no large scores. By a curious coincidence Gloucestershire scored exactly the same number in both innings—viz., 118, Mr. W. G. Grace making the highest figures, 25 and 29.—The Australians take but little rest, and they must be a "wiry" lot of men to get through so much cricket and so much hospitality as falls to their lot. Again they have shown themselves superior to a crack county, their match with Lancashire at Old Trafford having been drawn considerably in their favour.—We are glad to see that the Parisians have not given up cricket, as Paris in a single innings match is recorded to have scored 71 against the 75 of the Anglo-Parisians.—To return, however, to inter-county cricket, which attracts most attention, a notable defeat of Yorkshire by Middlesex at Sheffield is to be recorded. The Northern County scored 94 and 110, but the Middle-Saxons with the substantial aid of Mr. A. J. Webbe's 94 and Mr. T. D. Walker's 59, to say nothing of Mr. Pearson's 41, put together 298, and won the match in one innings by 94 runs.—Derbyshire is not making the headway it promised a few years ago, and has had to succumb to Notts by seven wickets.—At the Oval, Kent was in great form both in batting and bowling, 211 and 244 being the figures of the two innings. Surrey marked 159; but the match was eventually drawn, though greatly in favour of Kent, which has perhaps shown the best cricket among the counties this season.—At Cheltenham, where there is a vigorous attempt to establish a cricket week like that at Canterbury, Gloucestershire made short work of Sussex, winning in one innings by 24 runs. The Sussex men in their first attempt only managed to mark 29, of which Charlwood got 15.

Yachting.——The regatta of the Royal Victoria Yacht Club concluded on Saturday last, the Vol-au-Vent winning the forty tons race, with the Old Arrow second, and the Vanessa, the thirty tons.

It is not perhaps generally known that whip cracking is a recognised sport and field of rivalry in some districts. It has, however, its heroes and champions, and evidently James Giddings is one of them, for he publicly announces that he "will crack any man that may come into the Uppermill Square on Saddleworth Wakes, on Saturday, August 24th, for 5*l.* a side, the best of fifty-one strokes. A twenty-one foot whip to be used."

THEATRES

Mid-August is the period of the year when the stream of theatrical enterprise has attained that almost stagnant point which is known to navigators as the slack of the tide, and this is the point at which we have now arrived. Already there are signs of the forthcoming season. One theatre has even the courage to announce a new piece to be produced next week, and Mr. Sothern has ventured to return in his old immortal character of Lord Dundreary. Some weeks, however, must yet elapse before the business of entertaining the public by theatrical performances will begin in good earnest, and we may, therefore, take advantage of this opportunity to glance back at the productions of our dramatists and the achievements of our managers during the past twelve months.

Unhappily the retrospect yields no great ground for consolation to those who are anxious for the time when our drama, once pre-eminent, shall regain something like a respectable position. One such play, however, as Mr. Wills's Olivia, and one such interpretation of a worthy work as that which Mr. Hare, by the aid of his own good taste and the talents of his company, has afforded, ought to go a long way towards redeeming our theatrical credit, or at least towards reviving our hopes of better days. Thoroughly dramatic, admirably acted, and put upon the stage with rare art and exquisite judgment, Olivia is likely to be even more important from its influence upon dramatic and histrionic art than from its own inherent claims to admiration. Lord Lytton's posthumous drama, The House of Darnley, produced at the same house early last season, unfortunately failed to establish equally high claims; though its subject, wanting as it was in freshness, was treated with all the skill of its distinguished author. The Prince of Wales's Theatre has unfortunately relinquished, not perhaps without good excuse, that search for good English comedies in which in other days it was not altogether unsuccessful. Adaptations from the French like Diplomacy are not, it must be confessed, quite satisfactory, except perhaps from the purely mercantile point of view. A certain unreality attends every attempt to convert a piece of M. Sardou into a story English life; and the adaptors of Dora have not escaped, and perhaps could not possibly escape, this difficulty. Any way, the success of Diplomacy has no great bearing on the question of the condition of the English stage. At the Princess's last autumn, Mr. Byron produced a melodrama entitled Guinea Gold, which comprised too many offences against common sense for lasting success; though Mr. Wills's Jane Shore, which was absurd enough, has enjoyed here a large measure of success; and a more wild and disconnected melodrama still, entitled Queen's Evidence, seems at this moment to present attractions that are proof against the depressing influences of a summer season. Between the production of these two pieces Mr. Ross Neil's Elfinella was brought out on the same stage, but the work was too delicate and poetical for a successful result, at least without a more refined and generally adequate interpretation than the piece unfortunately received.

The Adelphi Theatre has not done much of late to sustain its old reputation as the house of romantic drama. Mr. Paul Meritt's Golden Plough lacked interest in its story, and was not redeemed by any power of creating character. Mr. Burnand's version of Une Cause Célèbre was deservedly more successful. Proof is, indeed, a very good dramatic play, and, since Mr. Neville has succeeded to the part of Pierre Lorance, the representation leaves little to be desired. At the Haymarket Mr. Rowe's American comedy-drama, appropriately entitled Brass, established nothing but the over-weening assurance of the author, who was also the representative of its leading character. Mr. Gilbert's Engaged, on the other hand, was a thoroughly original and amusing, though somewhat extravagantly whimsical, piece. This year Mr. Sothern has appeared at this house as The Crushed Tragedian, an impersonation which in his hands did not please English audiences. He was more successful in Mr. Byron's comedy, The Hornets' Nest—a work of no very great merit, but certainly not dull. Miss Neilson's Shakespearian performances at this house can hardly be regarded as dramatic events, for though the histrionic genius of that lady is unquestionable, they have been little more than "star" performances. No failure so complete as that of Messrs. Wills and Fitzgerald's Vanderdecken has perhaps occurred on the Lyceum stage since Mr. Irving's name was first associated with that house; but the causes of the disaster were unhappily only too manifest in the palpable melodramatic arts and the pretentious literary claims of the play. Mr. Irving's really fine performance of Louis XI., however, deserved greater popularity than it achieved. Jingle in "Pickwick" was but a poor refuge for Mr. Irving's talents. On the whole, the Lyceum system seems to be breaking down; and some decent attention will therefore probably have to be shown at this house to that uniform standard of excellence which is beginning to be appreciated by English audiences. The Olympic Theatre has not, on the whole, been flourishing of late. Mr. Wilkie Collins's Moonstone, in spite of its boasted observance of "the unities," was a poor and trivial, not to say absurd, production. Mr. Gilbert's Ne'er-do-Weel prospered neither under this name, nor under the revised and amended title of The Vagabond. Mr. Reade's Jealousy—a version of an old piece of M. Sardou's, and Messrs. Taylor and Merill's Love or Life, founded on one of Crabbe's tales, were equally unsuccessful. Nor can the public verdict in these instances be questioned. Madame Beatrice's recent appearance here in the Woman of the People marks a slight improvement, the drama, which is adapted from the French, being a good one of its kind, and fairly acted. At the Opera Comique a Lancashire drama, by Messrs. Hatton and Matthison, entitled That Lass o' Lowrie's, showed some faculty for dramatic writing, and introduced a very fine piece of acting in Miss Leclercq's impersonation of the heroine. An elaborate spectacular drama, entitled Russia did not help to raise the somewhat fallen fortunes of the Queen's; a version of M. Sardou's gloomy drama Patrie and the Omadhaun were hardly less unfortunate; and Mrs. Rousby's subsequent appearance in the play of Madeline Morel, by Mr. Bandmann, though heralded by a squabble and an examination in the adjacent Police Court, failed to excite the least enthusiasm.

A passing mention will serve in the case of Mr. Frank Marshall's Family Honour, at the Aquarium; Mr. Burnand's Family Ties at the Strand; and Mr. Wills's Nell Gwynne at the Royalty; but something more is due to Mr. Burnand's Our Club, an ingenious and amusing comedy, brought out with success, and likely one day to be revived at the Strand. Mr. Byron's A Fool and His Money, supported by Mr. Toole, also afforded genuine amusement to audiences at the Globe.

Beyond these pieces, and the burlesques and extravaganzas, which are confessedly of an ephemeral character, there is really nothing deserving of notice in the past twelvemonths' theatrical record. Our two "patent" houses—Drury Lane and Covent Garden—though still enjoying special privileges, on the plea of their important influence on dramatic art, have really done nothing deserving even of an allusion. Pantomimes or spectacular dramas, and these of a poor kind, have been the staple of entertainments at Drury Lane and Covent Garden; though the latter theatre being now only reckoned among playhouses, by virtue of a short season during the Opera vacation, may fairly claim to be exempted from a portion of this reproach.

Astley's.——The management of this theatre have introduced some changes in the representation of the equestrian drama Mazeppa, Miss Josephine Fiddes (succeeding Miss Lisa Weber in the principal character) and a "fiery untamed steed" from the Ukraine forming the new attractions. Rookwood has also been revived, the enlivening scenes of Dick Turpin's famous ride to York being represented in a manner entirely to the taste of a large audience. A very gracefully performed skipping ballet, by the Sisters Rosa, is introduced into Mazeppa.

Polytechnic Institution.——The directors, as is their wont, seizing upon current events of interest as means of instruction and amusement combined, have just made some important changes in their programme. Mr. W. H. Golding delivers a very good lecture on the island of Cyprus, sketching its history from its first occupation by the Phœnicians to the present time. It would be as well, however, if Mr. Golding were to reserve his Turcophobist outbursts for a more fitting occasion. The wreck of the Eurydice gives Mr. J. L. King an opportunity of illustrating by a series of very admirable views the peculiarities of the coast of the Isle of Wight, and the method by which the ill-fated ship was raised. Some interesting experiments in blowing up sunken vessels by electricity, and raising them by means of air pumped into them, are shown in the tank with the assistance of the diver—much to the astonishment of the seal, who looked as though he didn't like it. The directors are about to make an important alteration in the Science Department. Whilst Popular Science will not be neglected, it is intended to establish a high-class school of Practical Science in all its branches. For the occupancy of the Laboratory the Directors have selected Dr. Edward B. Aveling, who intends forthwith to establish classes for practical instruction in all the science subjects required for the University, Government, and other examinations.

The Canterbury Hall.——The mimic siege of Plevna, which met with such great success at this elegant and comfortable place of entertainment, has at last been withdrawn to make room for a Fairy Sketch, entitled The Night Dancers, by Mr. F. W. Green, a morçeau half ballet half burlesque, with an extremely slight plot, which reminds one of the story of Lurline. Miss Nelly Power, as Prince Rupert of Rheinstein, displays her versatility as singer and dancer; and Madlle. Bartoletti, who appears as Coraline, the Queen of the Night Dancers, is an accomplished danseuse and figurante, and is supported by a troupe of ballet ladies of more than average ability. Mr. Bertram, too, deserves praise for making as much as possible of the very small part of Peppitypop, the Prince's dumb valet. Among the other attractions are another ballet, called Northern Stars, several popular vocalists, Benedetti, the marvellous sword-swallower, whose interior economy must be very different from that of an ordinary man, and Alexandrini, a muscular gentleman, who executes plate spinning à la Mr. Maskelyne, and performs some wonderful balancing feats with balls, sticks, bottles, and other things.

The Medallion of Temple Bar, which is to be presented to each member of the Corporation, will be about four inches in diameter, bearing round the rim the inscription, "Temple Bar, erected 1672, demolished 1878. This effigy of it was struck from the lead formerly on the roof." On one side of the medallion appears a representation of the structure, Strand side, the gates being closed. The name of Sir Christopher Wren appears at the base of the "bar" upon a scroll.

Scraps

Windsor Castle.——Until the return of Her Majesty from Scotland in November the State apartments will be open to the public on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays. The Albert Memorial Chapel is open every Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

A New Scientific Expedition is to be despatched to the South Pacific, and the Alert, one of the Arctic ships, is now fitting out in the Medway, and will shortly be ready to commence her voyage. She has already been commissioned by her old commander, Captain Sir George Nares, K.C.B.

Bristol has paid a Tribute to the memory of the late Miss Mary Carpenter by erecting a handsome marble tablet, surmounted by a large-sized medallion profile of the great lady philanthropist, in the Cathedral. The memorial has an inscription recording Miss Carpenter's labours in England and India.

London Mortality decreased last week, and 1,517 deaths were registered against 1,674 during the previous seven days, a decline of 177, being 59 below the average, and at the rate of 22.1 per 1,000. There were 9 deaths from small-pox (a decline of 5, a lower number than that registered in any week since last November), 268 from diarrhœa (a decline of 83, being 28 below the average), 190 of which were infants under one year of age, 10 from measles (a decline of 4), 27 from scarlet fever, 11 from diphtheria, 60 from whooping-cough (a decline of 17), and 17 from different forms of fever (a decline of 15). There were 2,421 births registered, exceeding the average by 21. The mean temperature was 62·2 deg., or 0·3 deg. above the average in the corresponding week for the 60 years, 1814—73. The duration of registered sunshine was 41·1 hours, the sun being 102·3 hours above the horizon.

Water Boots are the last means by which adventurous Americans elect to cross the British Channel, and on Monday afternoon a gentleman named Fowler, a resident of Bordeaux, landed at Sandgate having, according to his own statement, crossed over from Boulogne in this convenient foot gear, which he terms a podascophe. It consists of a pair of small skiffs about 15 ft. long and a few inches in width, composed of indiarubber cloth, which are inflated with air, joined together by light iron stays, leaving a space of about 6 in. or 8 in. between them. In the centre there is a small piece of board, on which Mr. Fowler stood and paddled. He performed the journey in 11h. 30m., the sea being tolerably calm. He was accompanied by a steamer, the Petrel, and with the exception of a little bread and coffee took no nourishment. On arriving at Sandgate he appeared to be considerably fatigued, but recovered sufficiently to return to Boulogne by that evening's boat.

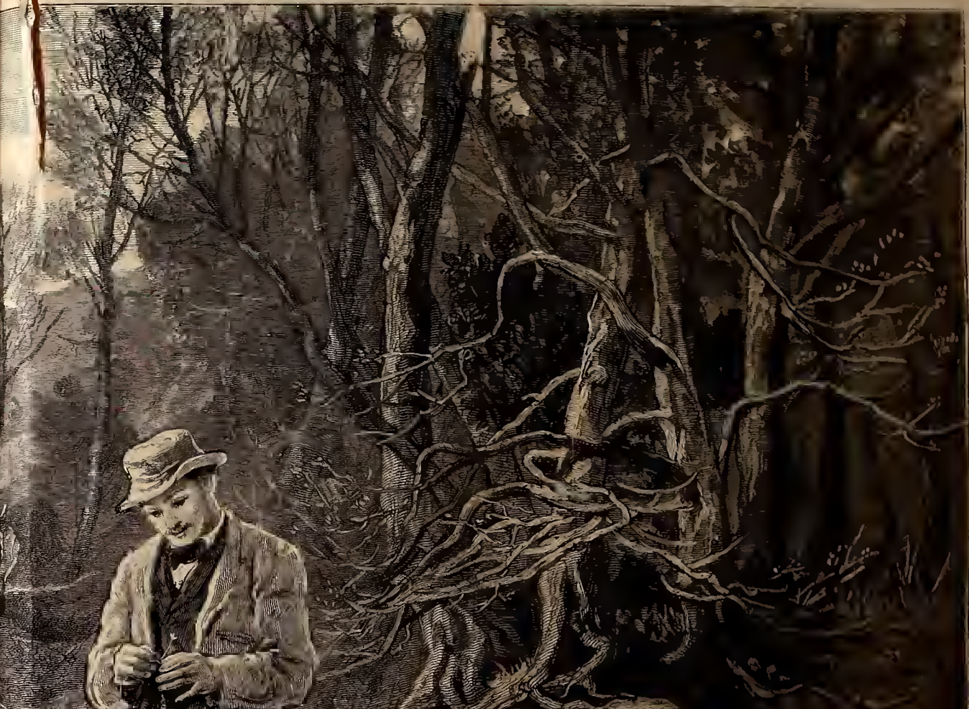
A Very Simple Calculating Machine was described by Mr. Spottiswoode in his opening address to the British Association, which has been constructed by Professor James Thomson. This instrument, by means of the mere friction of a disc, cylinder, and ball, is capable of effecting a variety of the complicated calculations which occur in the highest applications of mathematics to science. By its aid it seems that an unskilled labourer may in a given time perform the work of ten skilled arithmeticians. The machine is applicable alike to the calculation of tidal, of magnetic, of meteorological, and perhaps also of other periodic phenomena. It will solve differential equations of the second and, perhaps, of even higher orders. And through the same invention the problem of finding the free motions of any number of mutually attracting particles unrestricted by any of the approximate suppositions required in the treatment of the lunar and planetary theories is reduced to the simple process of turning a handle!

A somewhat objectionable Colony of Baboons is reported by the Times of India to exist in a village only eight miles from Calcutta—Augurpara, on the Barrackpore Road, about three miles north of Cossipore. A colony of two or three hundred baboons took up their quarters in the village some six or eight months ago, and have made it almost uninhabitable. They are great brutes, we are told, four feet high, and as savage as wild beasts. They attack children, and even full-grown women without fear, and have set up a reign of terror over the people, going in and out of their houses as they please, and levying free rations upon the plantains, guavas, mangoes, and other fruit growing in their gardens. The people are afraid to shoot them, as the whole colony would attack them instantly. The police will not interfere, and the village is not merely robbed to death by these apes, but is in such a state of insecurity from budmashes that the miserable villagers have sent a deputation to Calcutta, imploring that their condition may be represented to the Government.

Type Setting in China and Japan must be somewhat arduous labour. In our own and most other countries of the world, except China and Japan, the language is written by means of an alphabet of separate letters. Among the Celestials and their next-door neighbours, on the other hand, each word has a distinct character. The compositor's difficulties in either instance are obvious almost at a glance. In setting up this note, he has the letters conveniently arranged before him in what is known as the "case." But in Japan, according to a contemporary, a full fount of type comprises 50,000 characters, of which 30,000 are in constant use, and for 20,000 more there are frequently calls! Instead of being compactly arrayed before him the type is disposed about the composing room on racks, and the unfortunate compositor has to wander up and down the room setting his "copy" and stretching his legs. It is for this reason that it is impossible to apply the system of single character words to telegraphy that that inestimable boon is denied to the inhabitants of Japan and China.

The Telegastrograph is the last electrical novelty reported from the United States. By means of this instrument—at least, so asserts the inventor—people can eat and drink at a considerable distance from their actual food. The modus operandi, as detailed by the Globe, is very simple. A dainty dish is placed in a receptacle connected with a powerful battery. To this latter wires are attached equal in number to the expected guests, and of sufficient length to reach to their respective abodes. At whatever hour is appointed for dinner each guest places his wire in his mouth, and forthwith tastes the full flavour of the plat at the other end. The same is the case with wines, which convey their alcoholic effects through the wires, along with their distinctive flavour. The best point of all remains, however, to be mentioned. No sooner are the wires disconnected from the battery than the surfeited recover their appetites, the intoxicated return to their sober senses, and the feast remains nothing but a happy memory. It is not stated whether the viands and liquids disappear during the meal.

TROUT FISHING—THE FIRST



CAST OF THE SEASON

FOREIGN

The Eastern Question.——Turkey's delay in carrying out the Treaty of Berlin is arousing universal discontent, and the English, French, and German representatives at Constantinople have been obliged formally to remind the Porte of the necessity of immediately fulfilling her engagements. This delay acts most unfavourably upon Austria, for the Bosnian insurrection is evidently still supported by Turkey, notwithstanding her professed pacific messages to her Bosnian subjects. The Austro-Turkish Convention has not yet been signed, and the Austrians declare that unless Turkey rapidly alters her attitude no one will hear of an eventual restitution of Bosnia. In Hungary also there is considerable excitement about the heavy losses sustained by the Hungarian regiments in Bosnia, and the Pesth press even accuses the "Vienna Camarilla" of sending the Magyars to the slaughter with the object of securing their extermination. It is plain that the Austrians had not expected so much resistance to the Bosnian expedition; Marshal Philippovich did not obtain the full number of troops he demanded, and it has only now been decided at Vienna that extraordinary measures shall be taken for the prompt extinction of the insurrection. Meanwhile Serajevo has at length been occupied, but the worst part of the task still lies before the Austrians, as the country south of Serajevo is most unsuited to regular warfare, and the bands of insurgents scattered over the south-eastern portion of the province are strong and desperate. Marshal Philippovich had a very severe but successful engagement on Friday week at Han Belalovac, on the road to Visoka, where Marshal Tegetthoff subsequently defeated the Bosnians on Sunday, and on the following day Marshal Philippvoich captured Serajevo after a fierce struggle, in which women and the wounded fought furiously, the Austrians being fired upon from the houses. The inhabitants of Serajevo had been commanded by Hadji Loja to blow up the town rather than admit the Austrians, but they did not execute the order, thus showing that the Christian population received the troops gladly enough. As to the Mussulmans the insurgent chief had evidently warned them to expect no quarter, and they accordingly resisted to the utmost, contesting the city street by street. The insurgents retired southwards, and amongst them Hadji Loja, who has ordered his followers to hang every Austrian commander they may capture. The other divisions of the Austrian troops have had their share of the conflict. General Szapary, defeated last week at Tuzla, was obliged to retire to Doboj, on the Bosna, where he has been repeatedly attacked, but has managed to repulse his assailants. Banjaluka was also attacked, and was only saved by the arrival of reinforcements from Gradiska, while there has been a skirmish before Livno, in which both sides claim the victory, and a serious engagement at Liubinje, near Stolatz, in the Herzegovina, which resulted in a decided Austrian defeat. Nothing has been heard of Marshal Jovanovic at Mostar, and it is supposed that the insurgents have intercepted his communications. There are rumours that the Christian inhabitants have taken up arms under their old leader, Peko Paulovich, but this rising is believed to be due solely to the severity of Marshal Philippovich at Maglai, as the Christians in general are most favourable to the Austrians, and loyal demonstrations took place at Berbir, Banjaluka, and other towns, on the Emperor's birthday. The two bordering Principalities are acting most circumspectly at present. Prince Nikita has recommended the Herzegovinian chiefs to submit; while Servia has issued stringent prohibitions to her subjects against assisting the insurgents, and even avoided the concentration of two army divisions for the Independence festival on Wednesday, lest she should be laid open to suspicion. This festival was kept with great rejoicings, and Prince Milan issued a proclamation recapitulating the events of the Servian war and declaring the Independence of the Principality.

The Russians have not yet left San Stefano, but the British fleet will start immediately for Gallipoli when General Todleben withdraws from Tchataldja, retiring still further to Besika Bay when the Russians quit Adrianople. A farewell review was held by General Todleben on Sunday, at which numerous Turkish officials and the Diplomatic Body were present; but the ceremony was marred at the close by the attempt of a young Greek to shoot General Todleben. The General escaped unhurt, and the Greek was captured; but the event created a very painful impression, following, as it did, the assassination of the Russian Chief of Police at St. Petersburg two days previous. General Mesentzoff was stabbed in the street by two persons, who got off in the confusion and, less fortunate than his predecessor General Trepoff, died the same evening. This assassination is a further significant proof of the disaffection existing throughout Russia, and which is particularly manifested at Odessa, where disturbances have arisen owing to a recent Nihilist trial. The Czar is going to visit Odessa.

Returning to Turkey, the European Commission which is to organise the Government of Eastern Roumelia meets at Constantinople on the 13th prox., and the Commission for Bulgaria will assemble on the same day. The Rhodope Commission has returned with a sad list of atrocities practised by the Bulgarians and Russians on the Mussulman inhabitants of Bulgaria, and there can be little doubt that the accusations are well founded. The Rhodope insurrection continues.—Matters are no better in Asia, where the Lazis reiterate their refusal to give up Batoum and have formed four strong entrenched camps. The Turkish Governor has, however, told the inhabitants that the Russians will enter on the 27th inst., and that vessels will be ready to take away all those who wish to leave.—Greece continues to look anxiously for the Turkish answer respecting her frontier alterations, and Turkey has sent a Note to the Powers, virtually rejecting the Greek demands, alleging that no really national insurrection has broken out in Thessaly and Epirus since 1829, and that Greece's professions of moderation in the late war ill accords with her negotiations with Russia during the campaign.

The reports of fever among the troops in Cyprus appear after all to have been well founded. The fever is of a light and not dangerous nature, but it has been severe among several of the regiments, the soldiers being predisposed to illness by the excessive heat, which has been specially felt in the bell tents used by the forces. The Indian contingent will probably be despatched finally by the 20th inst.

France.——The Republicans have scored another triumph by their success in the Councils-General, which assembled on Monday. They now command a majority in fifty-five out of eighty-five departments—a striking mark of progress since last autumn, when they had a majority in thirty-nine only, and an earnest of success for the Liberals in the January Senatorial elections, which, as we have repeatedly mentioned, are materially influenced by the Councils-General. Another feature of these elections is the defeat of the Bonapartists, as the Constitutionalists, changing their tactics, gave their votes to the Republicans rather than to the Imperialists. Indeed, in the Department of the Oise, where the Duc d'Aumale is president, and Liberals have hitherto been unable to obtain a place, the Republicans are now in the majority. The Conservatives are still thoroughly disunited, although they have constituted a central Conservative Committee, in which Bonapartist influence preponderates, but they have entirely given up their idea of a manifesto on the Senatorial elections, as the sections of the Right could not agree upon its terms. Accordingly they will concentrate their energies on a series of small local committees, and are likely to be easily beaten on this ground by the Liberals, who have a superior organisation. The Ministry, also, is paving the way for victory by instituting extensive public works to prove the value and stability of the Republic. M. de Freycinet's tour round the seaport towns has resulted in grandiose schemes for improvements and enlargements of the ports and railways, the creation of canals and roads, and the reclamation of waste lands, which will charge the country with an annual outlay of 20,000,000*l.* for ten years, while enemies to the present régime whisper that these plans are but baits to dazzle simple provincials into Republican ways of thinking. M. de Freycinet is to lay the first stone of the Boulogne New Deep Harbour on Sept. 3rd, in commemoration of the anniversary of M. Thiers' death; and a further mark of respect to the late statesman has been paid by the Minister of the Interior, who has put off an official dinner he had fixed for that day. The Government were not so complimentary to the memory of Lamartine, as they sent no one to the unveiling of the poet's statue at Mâcon last Sunday. The Académie, too, was unrepresented, much to the annoyance of the Mâcon public; but the ceremony went off very well nevertheless, there being the usual processsions, speeches, illuminations, wreaths, and banquet.

In Paris the Exhibition continues the centre of interest, owing to a yet further influx of tourists, and the arrival of deputations of teachers and students from the provinces. The Festival of the Assumption—one of the chief Parisian holidays—brought 111,995 visitors. The Palais de l'Industrie is being prepared to hold 23,000 persons for the distribution of the Exhibition prizes on the 18th inst., the Salon having closed on Monday. There will be fêtes on the three following days, including a review, illuminations, concerts, and a display of the Versailles fountains. The Anthropological Congress is the latest opened at the Trocadéro, and the Peace Congress begins on the 26th, while the Monetary Conference is still sitting. A Museum of Decorative Art has been opened in the Palais de Flore at the Tuileries. It contains some fine ancient and modern pictures lent by amateurs, and is to remain open till October, the proceeds being devoted to founding a permanent institution for decorative art on the plan of the South Kensington Museum. Some curious acoustic experiments have been made with the captive balloon, some musicians having been sent up while the rest of the band played below, and the strains from the balloon were found perfectly distinct.

Germany.——Hodel was beheaded on the 16th inst., his execution being the first which has taken place since 1865. Up to the last moment it was thought that the sentence would be remitted, and Hodel himself certainly expected imprisonment, not death, but he died with characteristic coolness. The severity of the Government Socialist Bill is condemned by most moderate people. Prince Bismarck will personally defend the Bill in the Reichstag, where, by-the-bye, the number of Socialists reaches 9, being 3 less than in the last House. Meanwhile some United Social Democrats and Guelphs have been creating disturbances during the elections at Harburg in Hanover.

Italy.——The Italians are still grumbling at their treatment by the Berlin Congress, and the journals are full of sympathy for Greece, the Opinione urging the Government to support the Hellenic claims. One party asserts that the Italians should endeavour to extend trade with Cyprus, while others recommend the Government to look at home and develop the unnoticed resources of Sardinia before speculating abroad.—There has been a fanatical rising in the province of Grosseto, where an ex-Garibaldian carter, Lazzareti, has been preaching a new religion, declaring himself the embodiment of Christ entrusted with human redemption. A Republican demonstration which he organised caused the interference of the police, and Lazzareti was killed.

India.——The English mission to Afghanistan is entirely occupying public attention, and there is a general feeling that the quiet unaggressive policy of the Indian Government, instead, as had been intended, of impressing Shere Ali, has made him despise the British and favour the Russians, whose display of military power in Central Asia has probably induced him to contemplate a Russian alliance. The Ameer's reply to the British proposal to send the Mission is now being awaited, and Sir Neville Chamberlain, a good linguist and excellent tactician, seconded by Major Cavagnari and an escort of 300 sabres, is ready to start from Simla. Their departure will, however, probably be delayed, as the Heir-Apparent of Cabul has died suddenly. The last important mission to Cabul was that of Sir Alexander Burnes in 1837, when the British Envoy returned unsuccessful, leaving the Russians in favour with the Ameer; but it is currently believed that Sir Neville Chamberlain will persuade Shere Ali to listen to reason, and induce him to sanction the establishment of a permanent British Embassy at Cabul. If successful, the mission will return by Quetta and Candahar. On their side the Russians have published a semi-official denial that their movements are in any way threatening to England, declaring that the mission had only been despatched when war was considered imminent with England. There is no news, nevertheless, of the four Moscow divisions now in Central Asia abandoning their advance, and Lieut.-Colonel Maeff has accomplished a thorough survey of the Hissar district in the south of Bokhara, being the first European who has visited the province, while in Turkestan the Kirghiz have sent a flattering address to General Kaufmann, the Mussulmans showing their loyalty by subscribing to the volunteer fleet and the Red Cross Society, and the official journal noting that "fresh testimonials of goodwill have been elicited by the probability of a rupture with England and an advance into Afghanistan." In India proper the heat continues specially severe, the trains in Scinde being compelled to run at night, while eighteen persons died of sunstroke in one week.

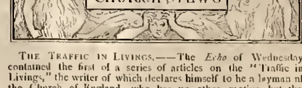
Miscellaneous.——In Belgium the King and Queen kept their silver wedding on Wednesday. There were great fêtes at Brussels, the great event being the presentation to the Queen by the women of Belgium of a diamond crown bought by a 2½*d.* subscription. The King and Queen have also been to Bruges to unveil a statue of Jan van Eyck, when there was a slight disturbance by the Clericals. A bad accident through the bursting of a dock-gate has occurred at Antwerp, four persons being killed and numerous vessels destroyed.—Yellow fever is devastating Louisiana, and the mortality exceeds any yet known from that disease in the United States. The epidemic is especially virulent in Grenada, where few recover, and the inhabitants are leaving the city in flocks. Whole families are swept away, and there is little medical attendance. New Orleans, Memphis, and Vicksburg are also suffering terribly.—In South Africa the insurgent Chiefs Gongabele and Umfanta have been sentenced respectively to death and penal servitude for life.

THE COURT

The Queen and Princess Beatrice were to leave the Isle of Wight yesterday (Friday) evening for Dunbar, whence Her Majesty will go to Broxmouth to stay with the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe until Monday, and then proceed to Balmoral for her usual autumnal visit. In the mean time the Isle of Wight has been the resort of nearly all the members of our Royal family, together with the King and Queen of Denmark. The Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse, the Hereditary Grand Duke and the Princesses Alix and Marie of Hesse, arrived at Osborne at the close of last week, and on Saturday afternoon the Grand Duke and Duchess drove out with Her Majesty and Prince Leopold, while the Princess Beatrice drove to Carisbrooke Castle with the Hereditary Grand Duke and the Princesses of Hesse. On Sunday Divine Service was conducted at Osborne House by the Rev. Canon Prothero in the presence of Her Majesty and the Royal Family. In the afternoon the King and Queen of Denmark, the Princess Thyra, and the Prince and Princess of Wales visited Her Majesty. On Monday morning the Queen and Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, the Grand Duke, Duchess, and Hereditary Grand Duke of Hesse witnessed a series of torpedo experiments in Osborne Bay, Admiral Fanshawe, C.B., Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, and Admiral Sir A. Cooper Key, K.C.B., being in attendance, as also Commander Arthur Wilson of H.M.S. Vernon, the torpedo school-ship at Portsmouth, who conducted and explained the various operations. In the afternoon the Queen, with the Grand Duchess of Hesse and the Princess Beatrice, drove to West Cowes and visited the King and Queen of Denmark, and in the afternoon the Earl of Beaconsfield, who had arrived from Hughenden, had an audience of Her Majesty, and subsequently joined the Queen's dinner party. On Tuesday morning the Queen walked out, and the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse and their children took leave of Her Majesty, and left in the Alberta for Portsmouth on their way back to Eastbourne—the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold accompanying them to Portsmouth. Next day the Earl of Beaconsfield left Osborne. According to a telegram in the Pall Mall Gazette Her Majesty will visit the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh at Coburg next month.—The Queen has sent the Ladies' Order of the Star of India and the insignia in diamonds to the Queen of the Belgians by Lord Torrington on the occasion of the King and Queen's silver wedding, and the Prince of Wales has been represented at the wedding by the Marquis of Hamilton.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have been entertaining the King and Queen of Denmark and the Princess Thyra, who reached London yesterday (Friday) week, being met at Charing Cross by the Prince of Wales. After staying the night at Marlborough House, the Prince and his royal visitors went down to join the Princess in the Isle of Wight. The Princess of Wales met them at Portsmouth, and the whole party crossed over to the island in the Osborne amid a Royal salute from the flagship and the garrison battery, and the guardship at Cowes. The King and Queen of Denmark are staying at Lisburne House. On Sunday morning the King and Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales attended Divine Service on board the Osborne, where they remained to luncheon, after which they visited Her Majesty at Osborne House. On Monday, the King and Queen and the Princess went to see the torpedo experiments mentioned above, and the Prince of Wales went on board No. "419," one of Messrs. Yarrow's torpedo boats, and carefully examined all the machinery, going down himself into the somewhat cramped engine-room, braving with every appearance of real enjoyment the showers of spray thrown up by the vessel when driving at full speed against wind and tide.—On Tuesday the Royal party went out for a sail in the Prince of Wales's yacht Hildegarde.—The Prince of Wales is trying the experiment of introducing grouse on the moor at Sandringham, apparently with a fair chance of success.

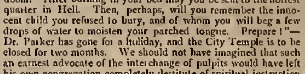
The Duke of Connaught has gone to Potsdam in order to attend the wedding of the sister of his betrothed, the Princess Marie of Prussia and Prince Henry of the Netherlands.—The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh are still at Coburg, where the Duchess is expecting her confinement, and where Dr. W. S. Playfair, F.R.C.P., has gone to be in attendance.—The Duke of Cambridge and the Princess Louise and her husband are staying at Kissingen.



CHURCH NEWS

The Traffic in Livings.——The Echo of Wednesday contained the first of a series of articles on the "Traffic in Livings," the writer of which declares himself to be a layman of the Church of England, who has no other motive but the advancement of that Church, and the purging it of a system that has been already condemned by half a dozen of the Bishops, in language quite as strong as any that could be used by her enemies. He says that the information which he purposes to give was not sought for any idle purpose, or merely to find matter for a newspaper article. "It was gained with the intention of exposure, and with the hope of doing my little towards spoiling the market of a detestable traffic. That a very considerable portion of the Church, and the advanced High Church party to a man, heartily abhor the system cannot be denied; but it is equally true that the canker of spiritual merchandise has eaten deeply into the vitals of the Church, and continues to spread year by year. The reason that there is so comparatively little indignation on the subject is, that the whole system is smothered up in semi-secrecy. It is in the hope that daylight may help to put to flight those unhallowed practices that this account is penned. A Royal Commission is about to sit upon the whole subject of the sale of livings. Several Churchmen have agreed that they shall have no excuse for being unacquainted with the extent and details of the business, and, as a proof of the bonâ fide nature of the statement here made, it may be mentioned that the original of every letter, document, and list will be placed in the hands of the Secretary of that Commission."

VARIOUS.——The City Press says that the churchwardens of St. Vedast, Foster Lane, are about to resume their prosecution of the Rev. T. P. Dale. The Bishop of Exeter has been appointed under the Queen's sign manual to take up the case, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London being unable, as the patrons of the church, to act in the matter. The "representation" consists of thirteen lengthy statements, accusing the rector of making unlawful additions to the ornament and furniture of his church, of using unlawful decorations, and of failing to observe the ordinances of the Common Prayer-book.—A very large congregation assembled at St. James's, Hatcham, last Sunday, but no incense was burnt, and the service was not in any way interrupted. A strong body of police kept order outside the church.—On Monday the Rev. Arthur Tooth entertained about 1,000 members of the Church of England Working Men's Society, with their friends, at the Orphanage, Croydon, and in replying to an address alluded to his recent visit to the United States where, he said, the Catholic movement in England was watched with great interest. If success came it would not be so much because they were in the right, as that the other side was wholly and hopelessly in the wrong. With the repeal of the Public Worship Act they would get rid of the aggrieved parishioner, and then, perhaps, peace, if not success, would crown their efforts.—The Record announces that a liberal friend of the Church Missionary Society, well known for his previous gifts, has offered to transfer to the Society a capital of 35,000*l.*, the interest to be used for special objects in the development of the native Church of India.—24,000*l.* of the Metropolitan Hospital Sunday Fund has been apportioned by the Distributing Committee amongst seventy-nine hospitals and sixty-two dispensaries. The balance of the sum collected, which was about 25,000*l.*, will be carried over to next year's account.—The Glasgow Protestant Missionary Society have petitioned the local magistrates to enforce the laws against begging by "Sisters of Mercy." They affirm that "it is a public scandal, and outrage upon the very idea of fair play, that poor, naked, hungry, shivering women should be driven away from the door and taken to the police office, while well-fed, well-clothed women attended by a servant should be permitted to beg."—The Brighton School Board has lost its only lady member, Miss Caroline M. Ricketts, who is about to visit China as a evangelical missionary. She has been presented with a testimonial consisting of a handsome writing desk and a purse of 60*l.*—The Vicar of Stoke, who recently declined to read the Burial Service over the body of an unbaptised child, and who contends that the Rubrics give him no option in the matter, says that the published accounts of the "scandal" are exaggerated, and complains of the receipt of a number of anonymous letters, of which the following is a specimen:—"Monster!—This is to give notice that when you least expect it your house will be burned while you are in it! This warning is given only that you may prepare for your eternal doom. After burning in your bed may you be sent to the hottest quarter in Hell. Then, perhaps, will you remember the innocent child you refused to bury, and of whom you will beg a few drops of water to moisten your parched tongue. Prepare!"—Dr. Parker has gone for a holiday, and the City Temple is to be closed for two months. We should not have imagined that such an earnest advocate of the interchange of pulpits would have left his own congregation completely destitute of spiritual instruction for so long a period.



New Music

MESSRS. METZLER AND CO.——An operetta of the very lightest material both as regards the libretto and the music is The Spectre Knight, written and composed by Messrs. James Albery and Alfred Cellier, at the same time it is admirably adapted to the purpose for which it was intended, namely, to pass away an hour pleasantly. We can conscientiously recommend it to the attention of our musical readers who are at a loss to amuse their young friends during the autumn in a country house. The cast requires one soprano, two mezzo ditto, a tenor, baritone, bass, and no chorus; the scene a haunted glen; time "the educated will perceive, the uneducated will not require to know," so say the author and composer. This operetta was first produced at the Opera Comique, London, last February, and achieved a fair success.—Moderately good specimens of their species, well adapted for the schoolroom, are the first three Nos. of "Six Pensées Dansantes" for the pianoforte by Alfred Cellier; Nos. 1 and 3 are the best of the group.

MESSRS. WITT AND CO.——Of a series of very cleverly written pianoforte pieces by Heinrich Hofmann, "Album Leaves," two charming little bits entitled "Träumerei" and "Am Bache" are the best, both are so fresh and original.—"Akrostichon in May," "Dreaming," and "Rivulet," are almost as pleasing.—Two "Valses Caprices" are halting and unworthy the pen of a German composer who has done full justice to a second series of "New Hungarian Dances."—Brilliant and showy enough to please the general public is "Satanelle," a pianoforte piece, by Mortier de Fontaine.—"Eglogue," by R. Fuchs, is a short and tuneful morçeau for the pianoforte.

MESSRS. SIMPSON AND CO.——"Simpson's Easy Method of Playing the German Accordion or Melodion," professes to "enable any persons to teach themselves to play, although utterly unacquainted with music." This little work contains several popular hymn and song tunes, and will materially assist would-be executants on the above-named instruments.—No. 1 of "Simpson's Flute Gems," a series of favourite melodies, operatic selections, &c., arranged for the flute by Benjamin Wells, A.R.A.M., contains admirable arrangements of "Home, Sweet Home" and "Where the Bee Sucks," both with variations.—W. T. Wrighton has brought out a new edition of "The Waggoner," with an extra verse.—"The Cyprus March," by J. Meissler, is the first, and probably the best, of a series to come, good, bad, and indifferent.

MESSRS. DUFF AND STEWART.——A very pleasing melody and poetical words are combined in "Tell Her I Love Her So," a tenor song of medium compass, written and composed by F. E. Wrotherly, M.A., and P. de Faye.—Two well-written pianoforte pieces for school use are "Sanctuary," and "Still Waters," by Charles Oberthur. They are styled "Musical Illustrations Suggested by Pictures in the Royal Academy."

MISCELLANEOUS.——"Seven Hymn Tunes" (with words), composed by W. Greenwood, are of unequal merit. Nos. II. and VII., settings of "Sun of My Soul" and "Far from My Heavenly Home," are the best of the group; the others are but replicas of worthier models (Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.).—A bombastic song, which will find but little favour beyond the limits of the 38th Middlesex Volunteers, to the colonel of which regiment it is dedicated, is "The Volunteers' Motto: 'Peace if We May; War if We Must,'" written and composed by Dr. Guy, F.R.S., and J. W. Elliott (C. Jefferys).—Tuneful, though wanting in originality, is "Turkish Retreat March," by Wm. C. Levey (Joseph Williams).—"Hochzeits Walzer," composed by Count Beust in honour of the silver wedding of the King and Queen of Saxony, are very much above the average of music composed for special occasions (F. Ries, Dresden).—The same cannot be said of "The Pavilion Waltzes," by J. Cooke, jun., which are commonplace in the extreme (Messrs. E. Donajowski and Co.).—"My Darlings Three," written and composed by Messrs. Clement Scott and C. Levey, has already won public favour when sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, and is sure of a warm reception whenever and wherever it is well sung (Messrs Boosey and Co.).—By the same collaborateurs is a graceful narrative song, "The Broken Rose," compass from C below the lines to E on the fourth space (Messrs. Enoch and Sons).—The words of "Romance and Reality," by M. A. B., are so poetical that they should have inspired Mr. C. Levey to something better than the hackneyed music to which he has adapted them (Lyon and Hall).

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

THE author of "Feuillemorte, and Other Poems," by Percy Gordon (Longmans), shows a considerable amount of feeling, and some little pictorial power, but has yet much to learn of the technical part of his art. His metres often seem to be more than he can manage—e.g., in the dedication, and still more in "The Voyage Home," in which latter one must also take objection to such a cockney rhyme as "shores" and "draws!" The principal piece contains some pretty descriptions of Thames scenery, and seems to have been composed under the influence of the Poet Laureate's "Maud;" but "My Tower" is little more than a poor imitation of "The Palace of Art." One or two of the smaller pieces, such as "Dee-side," are better, because less ambitious.

"The Romance of Love," by Robert Miller (C. Kegan Paul and Co.), does not, as a whole, rise above mediocrity, but contains here and there some melodious, if not very original, songs, of which perhaps the best is one at page 59, "When Lucy I to love began." It is intended to illustrate "the course of common life's love," so that the absence of any positive story may be more easily condoned than the use of so hackneyed a line as that of Cowper's at page 74, without quotation marks! To be sure the adjective is altered, so that it has some claim to originality.

The tragedy which forms the opening piece in "Guzman the Good, The Secretary, and Miscellaneous Poems," by R. J. Gilman (Victoria Press), is founded on an incident in Spanish history which, pathetic as it is, is scarcely strong enough to sustain the interest through five acts of rather poor blank verse. The story is the old one of Alonzo de Guzman's defence of Tarifa against the Moors, and the murder of his only son through the treachery of Don Juan. The treatment is not strong; and the same must be said of the second play, which is a domestic drama of the time of Charles II. of England. Of the minor pieces, "Love-song," at page 216, is very pretty; and the verses on the burning of the Goliath training-ship deserve notice as having originally appeared in Punch, illustrated by Mr Tenniel.

If "The Exchanged Identity," by W. A. Chandler (E. W. Allen), be not a bad joke at the public expense, it is difficult to see what end could be answered by the publication of such trivial jingle embodying so preposterous a story. The author seems to have had curious and unusual experiences of critics.—The intention of "Stones of England," by Winslow Boulding (Bemrose and Son), is excellent, and the writer has attained to very tolerable management of the Spenserian stanza. The poem is a sort of apotheosis of the many celebrated men and women who are buried in Westminster Abbey, with incidental references to others who might be thought entitled to tombs therein. The historical views are not much in advance of Goldsmith and Pinnock, and one would be curious to know where the author has met with men who called Shakespeare "obscene." They must have been strange mortals. Otherwise it is a meritorious little work, and not too pretentious.—The "Selected Poems of Matthew Arnold" (Macmillan) will be welcomed by admirers of his verses, since the volume contains some of the author's best-known pieces, such as "Tristram and Iseult," "The Forsaken Merman," the fine ballad of "Saint Brandan," and some of the best of the sonnets. It makes an elegant little book.—"The Diver: with Notes," by the Rev. Frederick K. Harford, M.A., Minor-Canon of Westminster (Bickers and Son), is another attempt, and far from an unsuccessful one, at an English rendering of Schiller's glorious ballad. Personally, we prefer the late Lord Lytton's version. The German text is appended, and the introduction and notes are most interesting and show careful research; whilst the genealogical tables will be useful and curious to historical students.

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.——These entertainments are being carried on in the same spirit of enterprise with which they began. The pledges of the prospectus are maintained to the letter, and the public has every right to be content. The third of the Beethoven Symphonies, the immortal Eroica—which was to have been "Buonaparte," but from which we are told that, upon hearing the news of Napoleon's having taken the purple, the composer indignantly tore away the title-page, exclaiming, "He shall not have my symphony!"—was just as admirably executed, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, as its two precursors, in C and D. Again the times of each movement were so judiciously taken by the conductor that clearness and precision were as noticeable in the performance as unflagging spirit. Although this great work takes up no less than three quarters of an hour, it was listened to with marked interest by a crowded audience, the promenaders for the most part appearing to be quite as much pleased as the tenants of stalls and boxes. At the third "classical night" (Wednesday) the symphony was Haydn's famous old "Military," which, though time has dealt with it less leniently than with either of the other grand symphonies in the same key (G), can never be unwelcome, when so effectively rendered as on the present occasion. At the same concert Madame Montigny-Rémaury, who had already added the second and most difficult concerto of Mendelssohn (D minor) to her successes, was quite as happy in the A minor concerto of Schumann, which she played magnificently, accompanied by the orchestra in perfection. No applause could have been more genuine and unanimous than that which greeted the conclusion of the performance. On Monday the fourth Symphony of Beethoven (B flat) is to be the conspicuous feature of the orchestral selection.

NOTES FROM PARIS.——M. Lecocq's comic operetta, Le Petit Duc, has passed its two-hundredth night at the Renaissance. The receipts for the two hundred performances amount to 851,234 francs. Meanwhile La Folle de Madame Angot has been reproduced at the Folies-Dramatiques for the delectation of visitors, native and foreign, to the "Exposition Universelle." Hamlet has been revived at the Grand Opera, but—much to the detriment of M. Ambroise Thomas—with no Faure for Hamlet, no Christine Nilsson for Ophelia. M. Bouhy, as the one, and Mdlle. Daram, as the other, seem, nevertheless, in a certain degree to satisfy the public, while there is but one opinion about the excellence of Mdlle. Bloch, in the character of Queen Gertrude, which she looks well, sings well, and acts well. The operas at present alternating with Hamlet are L'Africaine, and M. Massenet's Roi de Lahore. Organ "recitals" are now the chief sources of musical attraction at the Trocadero. Not only M. Guilmant, but M. Eugène Gigout and M. de Lange, Professor at the Cologne Conservatory, have performed on the new grand organ, built by Cavaillé-Coll, which, the more it is heard, the more emphatically are its fine qualities proclaimed. The programme of M. de Lange's first "recital" was decidedly superior to anything that had preceded it, comprising not only examples from Bach and Handel, but from Mendelssohn's admirable six sonatas. That the organ music of Mendelssohn, who combined the contrapuntal mastery of the old school with all the charm of modern fancy, all the devices of modern ingenuity, carried away the palm, even in the face of Bach and Handel, is admitted on every side. In fact, Mendelssohn, the greatest organ-player of his period, was also the greatest composer for the organ. How he also contrived to become the greatest pianist, as well as the greatest composer for the pianoforte, in the course of his too brief career, it is difficult to explain.

WAIFS.——Our gifted countryman, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, has been elected a correspondent member of the "Société des Compositeurs" in France—a distinction which was communicated by the President in a highly complimentary letter.—The Hamburg Philharmonic Society is about to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its existence by a grand musical festival to last three days. The programme is selected from the works of Handel, Bach, Mozart, Cherubini, Weber, and (let us hope, although the name is not mentioned) Mendelssohn, who was born at Hamburg, the then great, free Hanseatic town, on the 3rd February, 1809. The dates of the musical performances are fixed for the 25th, 26th, and 28th of next month—a hint for visitors to the Continent who may be taking their holiday at that period. Madame Montigny-Rémaury, the accomplished French pianist, her engagement with Messrs. Gatti having expired, quits London for Paris to-day. Her stay here has been so agreeable to all whom she has charmed with her playing, that its brief duration gives the greater cause for regret. She will doubtless return to a country where her merits have been so warmly recognised, and if she is not heard at the Monday Popular Concerts this coming winter, Mr. Arthur Chappell is hardly the far-seeing director we have always taken him to be, and in fact which, for some twenty years, by his able and spirited management, he has proved himself.—It is, we believe, now certain that M. Guiraud's Piccolino, should Mr. Carl Rosa (as all amateurs hope) give a series of performances at one of our London theatres next spring, will be the leading novelty.—The committee of the Glasgow Orchestral Concerts seem to be at a loss for a conductor. Dr. Hans von Bülow, according to the Glasgow Herald, "does not see his way" to accept the post; and if that be the case he shows wisdom in declining it. The committee are now in treaty with various foreigners, as if there was no such thing as an English conductor. Of course Dr. Sullivan could not under any conditions again accept the place he once so honourably filled; and Mr. Weist Hill, "our English Costa," as he has been justly styled, would hardly enter into the heads of the Glasgow burghers. Herr Richter, of Vienna, the great Wagnerian conductor, has been invited, and so has Sir Michael Costa (fancy Sir Michael!); but both turn a deaf ear to earnest solicitations. The matter now rests between Herr Max Bruch and Herr Tausch, who, the Glasgow Herald informs us, "is a gentlemanly musician." Does that convey a sly admonition to the occasionally over-energetic Dr. Hans von Bülow? Signor Randegger, we understand, will go to Glasgow to direct a performance of his cantata, Fridolin. "Qui va et loin y reste" (Who knows?)

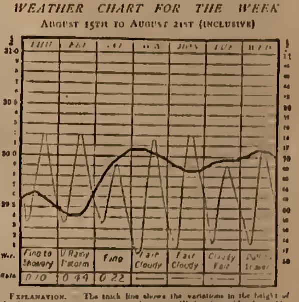
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

AUGUST 15TH TO AUGUST 21ST (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The weather during this week, as far as the south-eastern parts of England are concerned, has been cloudy and rather [illegible] Thursday and Friday, the 15th and 16th, were wet and thundery [illegible] Saturday, the 17th instant, showed a considerable improvement, and [illegible] south-west winds prevailed on all these days. On Sunday, the 18th [illegible], however, a change occurred; the wind shifted to the eastward, the sky assumed a very rainy appearance, but the rain did not fall. [illegible] remained in this state until Wednesday evening, the 21st instant, when a slight shower fell in some parts of London, but soon passed off. [illegible] has been cool, and Saturday, the 17th instant, and Tuesday, [illegible] instant, were even cold for the time of year. The barometer was highest ([illegible] inches) on Sunday, the 18th instant; lowest ([illegible] inches) on Friday, the 16th instant; range, 0·[illegible] inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest ([illegible]) on Thursday ([illegible]), Friday ([illegible]), and Monday ([illegible]); lowest ([illegible]) on [illegible]day morning, the 18th instant; range, [illegible]. [illegible] Total fall in the week, [illegible] inches on three days. Greatest fall in one day, 0·44 inches, on Saturday, the 17th instant.

I was surprised and mortified to see her eyes closed and her head drooping—in a word, she had fallen asleep.

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

CHAPTER XV.

Monsignor Chiappaforte called to see me that afternoon just before luncheon time. I say, advisedly, to see me, for he was aware that Lucy was out. He told me he had seen her going to the Villa d'Este.

"I am come to bid you farewell, Signorina," he said. "I leave Tivoli to-day."

I felt no regret at this news, and affected none. Monsignor, however, did not intend that his adieux should be very brief, for he set down his well-brushed ecclesiastical beaver (such a contrast to the dust-laden head-gear of Don Gregorio!) on the table, and seated himself in an arm-chair. I had no choice but to sit too.

"I was glad," he began with an amiable air, "to see our dear Lucia looking cheerful and like herself, as she passed me this morning. She seems to have quite recovered her spirits, eh?"

"I cannot relieve the Princess Corleoni's conscience—still less her son's—so far as to say that, Monsignore."

Monsignore's compassionate tone was belied by a certain twinkle of satisfaction in his eyes. I was convinced that, for some reason unknown to me, he preferred Lucy's sadness and depression to her smiles and cheerfulness. After a second or two, finding that I did not speak, he proceeded:

"The old man with her looked like an artist—a painter, I suppose?"

"Professor Alessandro Santi, Monsignore."

"Oh, really! Dear me! So that was Santi, eh? Aha! A man of great talents, I believe."

"I wonder you did not recognise him, Monsignore."

"Recognise——? I am not aware that I ever had the honour of Professor Santi's acquaintance. I don't easily forget my friends, either. Does he say he knows me?"

"Oh, he certainly knows you. And he imagines you know him; but he never said you were friends."

"Oh! Ah, yes, yes; I think I remember that in the '59 we were brought into contact once, respecting a—a—political matters. At—Perugia, I fancy?"

"At Perugia, Monsignore."

"He is a Perugian, Monsignore."

Then Monsignore dropped that subject: the events which liberal Italians speak of as the "massacre of Perugia," and faithful Churchmen, I suppose, deem a creditable page in the history of the Papal Army, did not furnish an agreeable topic to discuss with heretical me. He resumed airily, "And the other gentleman—evidently an Englishman—is he by any chance your brother come to pay you a visit?"

"My brother is in South America, Monsignore."

"So I understood from our dear Signorina Lucia; but it was possible he might have arrived unexpectedly, you know. Ah! The gentleman is not your brother? No; I see. Not your brother."

"Not my brother, certainly. Lucy left the house with Signor Sandro. He is like a father to us both, the kindest and most benevolent of men."

"Ahem! Really? Ay, ay, that is very pleasant for you. So you don't know who the Englishman was who was walking with them towards the Villa d'Este? Indeed, he went into the gardens with them. Don Gregorio chanced to see them, and happened to mention the fact to me. He has a great regard for Lucia, has Don Gregorio. Poor man—an excellent, well-meaning person, and in his way I don't know a more valuable priest for a country parish than Don Gregorio. So you cannot at all tell who this English stranger might be, eh?"

I could scarcely restrain a smile, although I was irritated too. "Oh, Monsignore," I said, brusquely, "if you are anxious to know, I can in a measure satisfy your curiosity, but only in a measure, for the gentleman is a stranger to me. The Englishman whom you saw with my master and my sister, and whom Don Gregorio watched into the Villa d'Este, must have been a certain Rutherford, who is fond of art, and has bought a picture of Professor Santi, and has come to see Tivoli in his company. Now you have all I can tell you about him."

"Bought a picture of Santi, has he?" returned Monsignor, without manifesting the least discomposure at my uncivil bluntness. "Aha! he must have money, our friend the Englishman! What you tell me is really very interesting. Well, Signorina, I must say farewell. I shall be in Rome this evening, and shall see the Princess Olympia either to-night or to-morrow morning."

He stood waiting, hat in hand, and looking at me as if he expected me to speak, but I did not.

"The Princess will ask me about Lucia, I know. In spite of what has passed, I am sure the Princess cannot divest himself of her great interest in Lucia. I shall explain to her that our sweet little girl erred in ignorance and inexperience. You will not agree with me, perhaps, but——"

"Pardon me, Monsignore! In that opinion I entirely agree with you."

"I am delighted to hear it, Signorina, and not at all surprised, for I have unbounded faith in your sagacity and good sense, when you allow them fair play."

He looked greatly surprised, nevertheless, and scrutinised my countenance with a quick disturbed glance from his eyes, whilst his mouth was at "set fair," as usual.

"Ignorance of evil and inexperience of treachery lead people to err in their judgment of such men as Don Vittorio Corleoni. Lucy so erred. We have all to expiate mistakes as well as faults in this world. Her expiation has been somewhat severe."

"Ah, well, well, your bitterness is perhaps not unnatural. My dear Signorina, believe me there is but one antidote to such bitterness, but one effectual balm for angry and resentful feelings. Our dear Lucia has sought that antidote not in vain. It lies in the teachings and the consolations of our holy religion."

"It is a pity, Monsignore," said I, "that the antidote was not applied to the bitter and angry feelings of the Princess Corleoni before she outraged my sister."

He flushed a dark, angry red, and answered with an appearance of being flustered, which I had never seen in him before, "The cases, Signorina, are widely different. There is no comparison, there can be no comparison between the Princess Corleoni doing her duty as becomes a mother, and—and—a woman of elevated rank, and the disappointment and chagrin of—persons in your position."

"No comparison whatever, Monsignor. Only I should have thought your antidote ought to be efficacious in all possible cases—even in an 'elevated rank.' However, as to that, you are perhaps the best judge."

"You—you speak with a scoffing tone which is highly irreverent—nay, irreligious. I cannot discuss the matter with any one who adopts that tone. It is wicked, absolutely wicked, to talk so!"

"That, Monsignore, closes the discussion, as you say; although in truth 'discussion' is not the right word for our talk. In such cases your Reverence will always have the advantage; since, although you may have nothing to advance against your opponent's arguments, it will always be open to you to declare with the authority of your calling, that those arguments are wicked."

"I could not have believed," said Monsignor, almost stammering with anger, "that any young woman in a respectable position could have been so—so audacious—so lost to all sense of veneration and modesty! This is the teaching of your liberal friends—of Signor Alessandro Santi and his peers. Mercy of Heaven, it is frightful to think of young minds being poisoned by such doctrine! I speak of Lucia, not of you; for I fear you are too hardened and self-sufficient already to be made worse even by the communications of such a rebellious and irreligious man as Santi. A firebrand he always was. He has been marked as a disaffected and dangerous fellow for the last thirty years. And if right were done he would be in the galleys at this moment! No wonder that young women forget the modesty of their age and sex, who keep the company of such a character."

"Well, Monsignore," said I, coolly, "whatever I may have forgotten, your Reverence's memory has been wonderfully and suddenly refreshed as to Signor Santi. It is not many minutes since you professed to know nothing about him."

But I was not to enjoy my sex's prerogative of the last word. Chiappaforte, having once given his temper the rein, allowed it to run away with him entirely, and seemed rather to enjoy the gallop. He scolded, he stormed, he anathematised me, and Signor Sandro, and a great many other persons, in very choice Italian, declared that he could not have believed that any one—still less a young woman—would have ventured to speak to him with such unparalleled insolence and brazen audacity, and after a warm panegyric (which, unlike his praises in general, I must own appeared to be thoroughly sincere) on his own talents, virtues, and hierarchical dignity, he marched out of the house, with his round face fiery red, and his keen eyes sparkling with fury.

"Well," thought I, "Monsignore has thrown away the scabbard with me, at all events. I don't believe he will ever again think it worth while to disguise his antipathy towards me; and that is one thing gained!"

In truth, Monsignore's wheedling smoothness was far more distasteful to me, and made me far more uneasy, than his open enmity. And I cared so little for anything he could say to or of me personally, that I was able to receive Signor Sandro and Lucy with a quite unruffled brow when they returned.

Instead of sitting down to partake of our simple fare, as I asked him to do, my master brought me an invitation which he begged me to accept. It was from Mr. Rutherford, who sent his respects, and hoped the ladies would do him the honour to eat their luncheon as his guests, out at the Villa of Quinctilian. He had sent on a donkey with a basket of such fare as the inn afforded, and he thought it would be pleasant to take our meal there under the olive-trees.

I hesitated. "I don't much like accepting this kind of invitation from a total stranger," said I. "It's very well to make our excursion in Mr. Rutherford's company; but to put him to any charges in the matter is quite another thing. And—in short, I don't like it."

"Nonsensical pride!" cried Signor Sandro. "It's merely a very natural and proper attention on Rodolfo's part."

"I object to accepting favours to which I can make no return," I said.

"Favours! A bit of bread and meat and a glass of white wine. Yet you gave me my coffee this morning, and expected me to take it as a matter of course. What would you say if I were to begin reckoning up the cost?"

"Ah, that is altogether different, Master; and you know it. If Mr. Rutherford were a poor artist like myself, I should not hesitate a moment."

"Per—Giove Capitolino! you are the most perverse creature! If a man has to count every soldo, take his hospitality as a matter of course. When you're quite certain that he will never feel the difference whether two people or ten eat at his board,—oh, then we mount on our high horse, and 'cannot accept favours.'"

"I think, Catherine," put in Lucy, timidly, "that it would look rather overstrained to refuse Mr. Rutherford. It is such a simple matter after all, and no doubt he would like to eat his luncheon out there, and he could scarcely do so whilst we sat by and looked on and refused to partake of it—could he?"

"Oh let her alone, piccina!" said Signor Sandro, "once she takes a thing into her head, she is as obstinate—I know nothing obstinate enough to compare with her."

"Come, come," I answered, "it is not worth expending so much powder and shot about; if you would like it, Lucy——"

"Yes, dear, I should."

"Then let us say, 'Yes, please,' instead of 'No, thank you.' I don't want to seem proud or pedantic."

Lucy kissed my cheek, and turning smilingly to Signor Sandro, said, "Ah, you don't know Catherine when you call her obstinate; she is only firm in a good cause. As for me, she spoils me, and has spoiled me with kindness all my life."

She seemed so cheerful that I determined not to cloud her newly-returned brightness by telling her of my interview with Chiappaforte. The day was brilliant; sweet, fresh, and yet soft, with the delicious softness of a Roman spring. The little change, the break in the monotony of our lives, apparently even the society of this stranger (although, as I have said, Lucy was usually apt to shrink shyly from strangers), combined to raise my sister's youthful spirits. She was outwardly the gayest of the party when we set out, and only one who knew her as profoundly, and watched her as anxiously, as I did could have detected the occasional fits of abstraction, the wandering eye, the unconscious sigh, the mournful droop of the mouth, which came ever and anon to chequer the smiling serenity of her mood. Still, to see her alert and interested in anything, even fitfully, was unspeakably delightful to me; it presaged the complete return of her old joyous, happy temper.

Lucy rode on a donkey, and although the driver of the beast, a ragged boy who was an old acquaintance of mine in Tivoli, accompanied us, yet Mr. Rutherford walked the greater part of the time beside Lucy, holding her donkey's bridle, and every now and then stopping him at a peculiarly fine point of view in order that Lucy might enjoy it. For, as he truly observed, the main object of both steed and driver was to scuttle along to the end of their journey, and both had a mechanical routine way of performing the jaunt which it required some strength of will and arm to interrupt at unaccustomed places. Signor Sandro and I walked on soberly side by side; now before, and now behind the others. And whenever we were out of earshot my master took occasion to exult in his own sagacity, and to point out to me how pleasantly Lucy was chatting and smiling with 'Rodolfo,' and to inform me that the latter had already confided to him (Signor Sandro) that he thought Miss Lucy, one of the sweetest and most interesting-looking creatures he had ever seen.

"Ah, Master," said I, gravely, "let us beware lest we do mischief where we mean to do good. Such sentiments as you want to encourage ought never to be interfered with by a third person unless on very strong and tangible grounds. I should be sorry if Mr. Rutherford were to be deceived into fancying that Lucy's manner towards him means anything more than the natural simple sweetness which she shows to every one. Believe me, however smiling she may look, however blithely she may speak, the old wound is not healed. It would quiver agonisingly at the slightest touch."

"Humph! Caterina mia, I like our piccina. She's a dear little girl. But—all women are not as steadfast, and—let us say obstinate, eh?—as yourself."

"But, Master——"

"No, no; not many of them are as obstinate as my self-willed pupil," interrupted Signor Sandro, at the same time patting my shoulder tenderly. "And as to Rodolfo, let him take care of himself. He's no fragile blossom to droop at a young lady's frown. Men's hearts are pretty tough nowadays, I fancy."

I looked at Mr. Rutherford, towards whom we were advancing during this conversation. The donkey had, for some private reason of his own, suddenly mended his pace, and carried Lucy and her squire some distance ahead of us. They now paused for us to rejoin them, and as I saw the Englishman's strong, sturdy figure, his cheerful, frank face, and general air of self-reliant vigour, I owned to myself that he did not look much in danger of pining in love-sickness. And I told myself, moreover, that it would be indeed a foolish and overstrained punctiliousness which should make me anxious about his peace of mind, at all events as yet. So I cast care to the winds, and, exhilarated by the loveliness of the day and the scene, determined to enjoy the passing hour with a thankful spirit.

CHAPTER XVI.

After we had wandered about the ruins of the villa, peeped into the tiny church dedicated to the Virgin, and called La Madonna di Quintiliolo (an odd reminiscence of Horace's Pagan friend!) climbed a little up the slopes behind it, and gazed at the magnificent view from all these points, we sat down under some secular olive trees, whose roots descended into the marble vaults of the ancient mansion, to eat our luncheon. It was a very good luncheon, we thought; but Mr. Rutherford's North Country notions of hospitality were by no means realised. He complained of its being but a poor kind of snack, although when we had all eaten heartily there was enough left to furnish an abundant meal for the donkey boy and for the man who had driven out another donkey, a sort of sumpter beast laden with the hamper full of good cheer.

It was not only in providing food for us that Mr. Rutherford had shown his thoughtfulness, however. He had brought a couple of stout plaids for us to sit on, and insisted on rolling up his own great coat into a cushion to support Lucy's shoulders as she leant back against the trunk of an olive. Then he asked if a cigar would be disagreeable to us, and receiving our ready permission to smoke, he stretched himself on the coarse herbage, resting his elbow on a little hillock all overgrown with wild flowers, lit a very fragrant cigar, and declared himself to be quite comfortable. For a while we talked in Italian; but presently Signor Sandro got up, and strolled away, saying that he should take another look into the church. Mr. Rutherford offered to accompany him, but Signor Sandro opposed his doing so, and finally confessed that feeling somewhat sleepy, he should take a short nap within the shelter of the church, as he was afraid of falling asleep in the open air. "If I don't appear before, call for me when it's time to turn homewards, which I suppose will be in about half-an-hour or so," said Signor Sandro. And he walked away, carrying his voluminous cloak in readiness to wrap himself up when he should leave the genial sunshine of the outer air for the chill gloom of the little church.

"It's odd how afraid the Italians seem to be of the open air," observed Mr. Rutherford. "I should have thought that the Professor might have enjoyed his nap better here in the sunshine, with his cloak for a pillow."

"Ay," said I, "but when open air means bad air, mal 'aria, as it does here too often, you cannot wonder at their dreading it. You have probably no experience of the malady called Roman fever?"

"Nor personally of any other fever, so far as I know," he returned, smiling, and knocking off the ash of his cigar. "But I have seen the effects of a cognate malady to Roman fever, belonging to an elder branch, though, what you might call the head of the fever family, in South America. And a very ugly customer he was. By the way, Miss Lucy, hadn't you better wrap that plaid a little closer round you? The great precaution is to avoid getting chilled, I believe."

"Oh, I am quite well taken care of, thank you," said Lucy. "No fear of that not being the case where my sister is."

I thought this not a very gracious way of receiving Mr. Rutherford's well-meant attention, but he seemed to take it with perfect good humour, merely casting a quick look at me, and smiling a little to himself.

"Never mind wrapping me up—I give quite trouble enough as it is—but tell me about South America. How long is it since you were there?"

"Five years."

"Ah, then you cannot have come across our brother. He is in Brazil. He went there two years ago. But tell us about the places and people there. We can fancy him among them."

Mr. Rutherford good naturedly began to comply with Lucy's wish. He talked of his travels in South America and the scenes he had witnessed there, and the people with whom he had been brought in contact. I was struck not only by the good sense exhibited in his discourse—for that I should have been prepared—but by the vein of poetic feeling and fancy which ran through it. Nothing beautiful or romantic seemed to have appealed to him in vain. Despite his simple exterior and homely accent it was impossible not to recognise that he possessed a poetic imagination, and that, moreover, he had cultivated it by very extensive reading. Whenever he warmed to his subject—as, for example, in speaking of the natural beauties of those luxuriant countries—he poured out innumerable quotations from poets old and new (most of whom I only knew by name, and many not even so), not with the slightest air of pedantry, but as if those were the most appropriate words to express his thoughts, and as if they rose to his lips spontaneously. I listened with the greatest interest; and turning my glance on Lucy at one point of Mr. Rutherford's description of a Brazilian forest, was surprised and mortified to see her eyes closed and her head drooping—in a word, she had fallen asleep. His eyes met mine, he ceased speaking, and I felt my cheeks grow red and hot.

"Hush! never mind, Miss Wilson," he said, in a low voice. "She is tired, poor child—excuse me, but she seems so like an innocent, gentle child! More than ever now that she is sleeping. My palaver has soothed her like a lullaby. Don't disturb her for the world. Let me throw the corner of the plaid over that branch to shade her face from the sun—so! Now we will move just a yard or two off lest our voices should awaken her."

It seemed to me that Mr. Rutherford must either be extraordinarily benevolent and sweet-tempered, or else really inclined to be in love with Lucy. For certainly it was rather trying to be commanded to narrate adventures and make descriptions, and then in the very midst of a glowing period to find your audience nodding to sleep instead of being absorbed in listening. "But when a man is in love I suppose he finds everything that his idol does well done and charming. And on the hypothesis of his cherishing a little tender sentiment for Lucy is his unruffled good humour to be accounted for, very easily."

Thus ran my thoughts—swiftly, as thoughts will run. And yet at the same time I struggled to resist the conclusion they pointed to, being ashamed of the influence which Signor Sandro's matchmaking project had already gained over the tenour of my speculations.

"She is not strong," said Mr. Rutherford, speaking under his breath, and looking over at Lucy.

"She has been ill lately," I answered; "but formerly, although not robust, as you see, she always had good health."

"Do you think the climate of Italy agrees with her—with you both?"

"Yes; I think so. For myself I believe any climate would suit me."

"What, even the rugged north? I fancy you would find England bleak after this Roman sky."

"You speak as if I were an exotic needing a hothouse. You forget that I am an Englishwoman born and bred, and that it is but two years since I have been living under alien skies."

"Cœlum, non animum, mutant," murmured Mr. Rutherford. "You keep an English heart, Miss Wilson."

"I own I love my own country better than any other."

"In short you are a prejudiced Briton, eh?"

"Perhaps. But I have noticed very often that those who affect cosmopolitan principles, and declare that 'one country is as good as another—and better!' are tolerably indifferent to everything but their own individual ease and comfort. Citizens of the world and universal philanthropists I look upon with suspicion."

"You think that charity ought to begin at home, and stop there!"

"I think that the charity which is reared at home will be stronger on its legs and have a chance of travelling farther than any other sort."

"Well, I have been travelling and knocking about the world pretty well ever since I was eighteen; and I have found good and bad everywhere. As the Italians say, 'Tutto il mondo è paese.' But yet I own that whenever I thought of my bleak Cumberland fells something seemed to tug at my heartstrings. And when I went back to my old home last year the first sound of the rough Northern tongue brought the tears into my eyes."

"And you would not part with those feelings, although they may have cost you many a melancholy hour, to enjoy the most philosophical immunity from prejudices in favour of your own kith and kin."

"Kith and kin!" echoed Rutherford, rather sadly. "I have few of my kith and kin left to be prejudiced for. Very near to me, none. An old great-uncle, my grandfather's younger brother, still lives a bachelor on the farm he inherited nearly sixty years ago, and of Rutherfords who call cousins with me there is no lack. But father, mother, and sisters are all dead and gone. You cannot think, Miss Wilson, what a delight—not altogether unmixed with sadness—it has been to me to be admitted to the society of my countrywomen this afternoon. You cannot tell how grateful I am to you and your sister for consenting to come. I love travel and the excitement of new scenes as well as most men; but to one who has once known the sweetness of women's influence in his home, 'tis but a dreary business to lounge from coffee-house to coffee-house, from inn to inn, hearing nowt but gruff voices, and seeing nowt but bearded faces."

When Mr. Rutherford spoke with any emotion—as he did now—his North-country dialect came out strongly; and I fancy that as he became more at his ease with me, he ceased to keep any watch over his accent. To my ears it was not unpleasing, but had something hearty and homely in it which I liked. He asked about my brother, what his business was, and how he was prospering, and gradually, as we talked, I was led to tell him our simple history—barring always any allusion to poor Lucy's love story. That was her secret, and I felt bound to keep it sacred. A shadow fell across the grass at our feet, and a loud voice called out, "Corpo di Bacco! Why, if I had not waked of myself, it seems we might have stayed here till sundown, and all died of fever. Come, come, march! Where are those lazy donkey boys and their beasts?"

Signor Sandro's voice wakened Lucy with a start, and then my master began to scold us all round for allowing her to fall asleep in the open air, and to prophesy dire consequences from our carelessness, at which, however, Lucy laughed incredulously. "Signor Sandro," said she, "I don't believe a word of your croakings,—not one word. What, up here on this hill side, with the air so sweet and pure, and the grass as dry as if it had been baked in a lime-kiln; to talk of fever and malaria! And, besides, I was only just dozing; I had not closed my eyes five minutes when you came up."

Rutherford, who was behind her, gave me a comical look with raised eyebrows, when she said this; but, at the same time, laid his finger on his lip as a hint that we were not to undeceive either Lucy or Signor Sandro as to the duration of her slumber. Whilst he bustled off to see after the donkeys, and whilst Signor Sandro was insisting on pinning a warm shawl more closely round Lucy's shoulders before she mounted, I looked at my watch. To my amazement it marked four o'clock. We had been sitting under the olive trees more than an hour, then.

Our progress homeward was made in the same order as in the morning. Mr. Rutherford walked by Lucy's bridle, and my master and I trudged along side by side. Signor Sandro was full of "Rodolfo's" praises as we walked. Was not he a good fellow,—frank—honest—kind—sensible? A pearl of Englishmen! And without that coldness which was well known to be a British characteristic. Rodolfo had enthusiasm!

"And why not?" returned I. "Enthusiasm! There's no lack of that amongst my countrymen, as I've often told you, Master."

"Yes; you have often told me so, Caterina mia!"

"Well, and what does your own observation tell you? Trust to that, and never mind the cut-and-dried commonplaces which people repeat one after another, like parrots."

"Ah, child, I own that Rodolfo has warmth of feeling; but he is an exception. Look at the hard, cold phizzes of half the Englishmen you meet in Rome. Eyes like steel, and mouths that seem to shut with a spring."

This was an old dispute of ours, and we carried it on till we were close at our own door, where, indeed, Lucy had already arrived, and was being lightly lifted from her saddle by our new friend.

"Listen, Caterina," whispered my master, plucking at my shawl to detain me. "You ought to ask Rodolfo to come and drink a cup of tea with you this evening, in the English fashion. It would only be right and becoming."

Under other circumstances I should not have needed the hint; but Signor Sandro's unlucky project with respect to this stranger made me shrink from any appearance of hunting after his company. I hesitated, saying, "Oh, I think the poor man has had enough of us for one day." But as soon as we reached the doorway, where Lucy was awaiting us, she said to me, "Oh, Catherine, I have made Mr. Rutherford a promise which you must help me to fulfil. I have told him that if he will come here about eight o'clock, with Signor Sandro, he shall have a cup of good tea,—what the Italians call 'English tea,'" she added, turning to Mr. Rutherford with a smile; "but I warrant you it was grown in China. We brought it with us from Rome. It is, I think, the sole luxury Catherine allows herself."

Of this speech Signor Sandro only caught the word "tea," which he understood, and repeated with an imitation of the English pronunciation, lengthening out the vowel, "Tee, tee, yes; it is very good, your tee,—not that I ever drink it."

I was half inclined to be vexed with Lucy for her over-zealous hospitality; which was unreasonable on my part, for if any hint of that which was in my old master's mind had reached her, I well knew that the cordiality of her behaviour to the Englishman would have been frozen to death in a moment. Mr. Rutherford stood for a second looking at me, and then said, "Oh, no; thank you. I think I had better not intrude on you this evening. Miss Wilson looks a little tired, and Miss Lucy, too, may need rest."

"Rest! I have been resting whilst you others were walking, and I am all the better for the sweet, fresh air. No, you must come! Must he not, Signor Sandro?"

"Certainly, certainly. I will bring him."

"But Miss Wilson does not seem to—to—approve," murmured Rutherford, in what certainly seemed a disappointed tone. Thus appealed to, I could do no other than add my personal request to my sister's invitation, and so we parted, with the agreement to meet again in a few hours.

"Why, Catherine, I never saw you so inhospitable," exclaimed Lucy, as soon as she and I were alone in our sitting-room. "The poor man looked dreadfully mortified that you did not second me by a word."

"Well, you see, dear,—I hope I have not been inhospitable, but—there's no use in being too lavish of your company to a total stranger. Besides, he might not think it polite to refuse our invitation, although he might not particularly care to come."

Lucy stared at me. "I don't understand why you should think so, Catherine," she said. "He seemed most pleased and grateful when I first asked him. And all the way home he has been telling me how he had enjoyed the afternoon, and what a delight it was to him to have some ladies' society. He's a good, simple-hearted man. I like him very much. And why should we not all be sociable and pleasant together, Catty dear?"

"Well, darling," I answered, kissing her fair forehead, "we will be sociable together, then. And as pleasant—as circumstances will permit."

THE SESSION OF 1878

The Parliamentary Session which came to a close with last week will live in history not only as one of the longest, but one of the most important. Its importance was achieved, however, rather by what it witnessed than by what it accomplished. It has lived through a settlement of the Eastern Question, and assisted at the ratification of a "peace with honour." The preliminaries of this peace have formed the subject which has mainly occupied the attention of Parliament, and the principal subject of controversy between the two sides has been the somewhat unusual manner in which the Government have dealt with Parliament. The habit was formed of taking decisive action upon momentous topics, and when all was done, coming to Parliament ostensibly to ask for its appproval, but really to obtain what in older political times was known as a Bill of Indemnity. By this process was accomplished the vote of credit of six millions, a considerable portion of which sum had already been expended. In this way the Fleet was sent to the Dardanelles, in this way the secret agreement was entered into with Russia, and in this way Cyprus was annexed, and England pledged to establish good government in conjunction with the Turk in Asia Minor. These matters, as they arose in succession, had led to animated debates in both Houses of Parliament. The Opposition had protested, and Mr. Gladstone has outshone his most brilliant fame by the speeches he has delivered, more particularly the one which illumined the dulness of the debate on the last series of Lord Hartington's Resolutions. But argument and eloquence have proved of no avail against a substantial majority, and party contests in Parliament have been a series of crushing defeats for the Opposition, and of increasing triumphs to the Ministry.

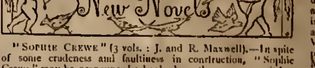
One peculiarity of the Session has been the turning of the tables by the House of Lords in the matter of comparative attractiveness as a debating assembly. The departure of the Prime Minister from the House of Commons immediately invested the House of Lords with a strong popular interest. Lord Beaconsfield has always, under all circumstances, been interesting, and he has lost none of this attribute since he became a Peer. His speech, on his return from the Congress, was admittedly a failure. But it is no new thing that Lord Beaconsfield should fall short of expectation when he comes to deliver a great speech. His forte is the delivery of a few brilliant remarks interspersed in the debate. He is always heavy when weighted with facts, or when he feels in particular degree the burden of responsibility. In addition to the normal attractiveness bestowed upon the House of Lords by the accession to its ranks of the most brilliant politician of the day, circumstances have combined to centre public interest on the Upper Chamber. It was the House of Lords that furnished both the British Plenipotentiaries at the Berlin Congress, and in addition to the presence in the Upper Chamber of the Prime Minister, there was to be found there the Foreign Secretary. The Marquis of Salisbury possesses, though in considerably less degree, that peculiar quality of arousing personal interest which is exceedingly rare. The noble Marquis is sure to say something pungent when he speaks, and there is nothing more agreeable to the House than pungency. Here again accidental circumstances have combined to increase the interest felt in Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury. The defect of two Cabinet Ministers, rumours of which disturbed the earlier portion of the Session, came to a crisis with the resignation of Lord Carnarvon, and the excitement was renewed and increased when this was followed by the severance of Lord Derby from the Ministers with whom he had been so long and so prominently associated. The personal statements of the two secessionists created the profoundest excitement, and filled the House of Lords with an eager throng of listeners. In fact, all the dramatic interest of the Session is centred in the House of Lords, and the House of Commons has suffered accordingly.

One of the facts accountable for this phenomenon has been that the unexpected is now never looked for in the Lower House. The element of surprise has been wholly absent from its debates. It has been generally known beforehand who would speak, and pretty generally guessed what he would say, whilst the result of the division was a foregone conclusion, being safely predicted within ten or a dozen votes. The speaking has been of the usual kind under similar circumstances. Hon. members have felt bound to deliver speeches which nobody cared to hear, and dreary hours have been wasted night after night pending the coming of the proper epoch of the sitting when the stars of debate might appear. Among these latter the brilliancy of Mr. Gladstone's eloquence shines in unrivalled splendour. It is generally admitted that his speech on Lord Hartington's resolutions, made at the close of the Session, has not in modern Parliaments been excelled, even by himself. No new speaker has come to the fore in these debates, and, indeed, the Session, as a whole, has not been productive of fresh aspirants to fame. The only man who has made any marked success is Mr. Stanhope, who, by the shifting of the Ministerial cards, has found himself placed in the position of the Under Secretary for India, where he has acquitted himself in a manner to raise the highest expectations. But on neither side has any new star shown itself above the horizon.

The Irish members opened the Session with their accustomed liveliness, and upon extended lines. Last Session they ran the risk of finding themselves in dangerous contact with the rules of the House, by attacking particular Bills and prolonging their opposition beyond all bounds. This Session they determined to evade authority by exaggerating the privilege of members to discuss at great length all questions that come before the House. This they did with a success that greatly aggravated the Government, and seriously obstructed the progress of business. Up to the end of June they pursued these tactics, with the result that many of the most important Votes in Supply were postponed, and no one could say when the Session might come to an end. At this epoch, however, a change came over the scene. The Government devised a scheme of Intermediate Education in Ireland, which was baited with the magnificent bribe of a million sterling, to be taken out of the Irish Church funds, and appropriated to the encouragement of education. This scheme met with an unexpected amount of approval at the hands of the Irish members. They at once accepted it, and abstained from further obstruction. The last weeks of the Session have proved almost uneventful, the House being recalled from absolute monotony by the Major, who, just before leaving for Ireland, managed to defy the Speaker, snap his fingers at the Chancellor of the Exchequer, roar down the speaker, and, generally to bully the House—all which he retracted next day.

As to business actually accomplished, this is the pennyworth of bread to the intolerable quantity of sack. Parliament has passed a Cattle Diseases Bill, which is very unlike the measure introduced by the Government. A Highways Bill has also been added to the statute book; but the County Government Bill and the Valuation Bill, which Mr. Sclater-Booth had hoped to run with it, were abandoned. The same fate awaited the Bankruptcy Bill and the Criminal Code Bill. The Factory Acts Amendment Bill, the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, the Intermediate Education Bill, the Scotch Roads and Bridges Bill, and the Bishoprics Bill comprise the main results of the long and laborious Session.

On the whole the Session has been one of Speeches of Members rather than of Acts of Parliament.



"Sophie Crewe" (3 vols.: J. and R. Maxwell).—In spite of some crudeness and faultiness in construction, "Sophie Crewe" may be pronounced a book above the average, as it has the merits of taking us a little off the beaten track of novels, and of introducing us to some characters who, though none of them excite much sympathy, and one or two are eminently disagreeable, are yet drawn with naturalness and vigour. As to the plot, it would take quite a column to set forth its complications, even if thus we could hope to make clear to others what we must admit we imperfectly understand ourselves, so we must be content to leave the reader to unravel it by his unaided efforts. Not a few of the incidents we come upon strike us, we must say, as far-fetched and improbable. It is at any rate contrary to received notions that a young mother, who has for some weeks had the care of her own baby, should suffer another child to be substituted for it by the nurse without detecting the difference. Then Ellen Foster's flight, from the husband for whom she has as much affection as it is in her to have for any one, with the man for whom she has no affection at all seems without sufficient motive, and a most unlikely step for such a woman to take; nor is the subsequent intensity of remorse for her folly, which kills her off in the course of a few months, by any means in keeping with the conception we had been previously led to form of her character. We should have expected, also, that the eminent London solicitors who had been instructed by the millionaire, Reuben Hurford, to prepare him a new will, and had forwarded it to him in the country only a day or two before he came by his end, would, on his sudden death, have communicated the fact to his family, as they must have supposed that the document they had drawn up was to supersede previous testamentary dispositions. We might find fault, too, with the occasional hardness and levity of character which somewhat blunt the edge of our interest in Sophie Crewe, the heroine; but this criticism, perhaps, is hardly legitimate, as it may have been no part of the author's intention that she should be regarded as anything but an imperfect specimen of her sex. But, with all its shortcomings, the tale has an attraction in that it deals with other sides of a man's life besides his love affairs; its interest is well sustained, and the reader's attention is not suffered to flag. Altogether, it is a book with so much promise of future power that we shall look for its author's second performance with some little curiosity.

"Sebastian," by Catharine Cooper (Macmillan).—There is some very excellent workmanship in this story, though the humour which the author undoubtedly possesses has rather a tendency to degenerate into mere foolishness and broad caricature. Prebendary Jellicoe, or "the Bishop," as he is called by his intimates and worshippers, the godfather whom it is poor little Sebastian's hard fate to have held up before him as patron and model, is a personage fortunately as impossible as he is unpleasant, and the author's treatment of him is far from happy. But the picture of the Gould household—the poor, stunted, and wholly unlovely lives of the Rev. Amos and his wife, burdened by many cares and narrow means, and the little Sebastian growing up a repressed and misunderstood child, with his poor childish brain overweighted, and his natural bright growth of fancies kept in check, by that load of book-learning which it is beyond his strength to grasp and assimilate—is drawn with skill and truth of feeling, so that we cannot help entertaining a liking for "little Amos," as the parson is styled by his brother clergymen, poor creature as it must be owned he is. Sebastian's love-story, too, when the time arrives for him to have one, is interesting and prettily told, even if some of the incidents in connection with it make large demands upon our credulity. The book is one that may be read with considerable enjoyment; all the more so because Miss Cooper has had the good sense to confine herself to a single volume.

"In a World of His Own," by Mrs. F. G. Perkis, author of "Disappeared from Her Home" (3 vols.: Remington and Co.).—We are here made to follow the fortunes of one Llewellyn March, who is introduced to us as "artist, poet, musician, and sculptor, possessing all outward gifts of beauty, all inward gifts of mind and soul: honoured by men, beloved by women, and heir to a large estate and half a million of money"—and, we may add, with certain peculiar views as to a future life which would have qualified him to take part in the recent discussion provoked by Canon Farrar's sermons. But things rapidly begin to "go contrairy" with this seemingly favoured personage. He resigns the estate and the half-million, which do not seem rightfully to belong to him, and by so doing loses the lady-love who has no fancy for living on 300*l.* a year; and then, having joined the French as a volunteer, is very nearly losing life itself at Gravelotte. How in the end, after much suffering, and many perils and hair's-breadth escapes, he succeeds in winning the true wife for him, and the estate and half-million of money to boot, we must leave the reader to learn, if he feels that way inclined. The tale is put together with a fair share of ingenuity, and, as novels go, is readable enough.

"Roy's Wife," by G. J. White-Melville (2 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—Major White-Melville's new story is slight, but readable and fairly entertaining, as his tales nearly always are. We should have thought, however, that when a sensible man approaching middle life, like John Roy of Royston Grange, had made up his mind to take to wife such a woman as Nelly Burton, who, beautiful, affectionate, and full of natural refinement of soul as she is, is not exactly a lady by birth, has for many years been assisting her aunt in the management of an hotel, and receives the declaration of his passion with a "Lor!" he would not have been so unreasonable as to take deeply to heart such matters as his wife's ignorance of the rules of social precedence, and deviations from the conventional ways and phrases of society. How, from such causes as these, an estrangement grows up between the pair long before they have been married a year; how Roy is led to cherish unworthy suspicions of his wife's fidelity, and insults her by proclaiming them; how she leaves his house, and he meditates obtaining a divorce; and how, partly through the interposition of judicious and warm-hearted friends, the misunderstanding is cleared up, and the husband and wife are made happy in each other, there is no occasion for us to tell in detail here. The author's pictures of fashionable life are drawn with all his wonted skilfulness and happiness of touch, and the loves of Hester Bruce and Lieutenant Collingwood Brail, R.N., form an effective and interesting bye-plot, even if we think the lieutenant somewhat over-nautical in his speech for an officer of Her Majesty's Navy of these days when enjoying his leave on shore.

"Eliot the Younger: a Fiction in Freehand," by Bernard Barker (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley). This book impresses us as the work of a shrewd, thoughtful, and well-read man, with a good deal of genuine humour, but with much yet to learn with regard to the right method of telling a story. Dick Eliot's father, the man of intellect and wit, who is married to the most uncongenially literal-minded of women, and lives in the midst of a rural society to whom his quiet sarcasm is an unknown tongue, is a very natural and well-executed conception, reminding us not a little of some of the personages we come upon in Miss Austen. Very good, too, are Oscar Dale, the able man who wishes to pass for a mere idler, the cynical Oglevie and his daughter Margaret, and—not least—the five Draycott children, playing "at amphitheatres, and gladiators, and early Christian martyrs ('in the reign of Diocletian,' put in Dora, glibly)." For Dick Eliot, the hero, we must confess that we do not care much at any time; and the history of his self-chosen destitution in the streets of London is but a variation on a theme somewhat overworn long ago. We must say, too, that some of the details of Miss Phoeba Langham's London life are given with a minuteness that is hardly edifying, and that here and there in his jokes Mr. Barker sails a trifle too near the wind. Of jokes, indeed, of one sort and another, the book is full, and we may pretty well apply to the author himself the description he gives of one of his dramatis personæ:—"Continuously punning, he said many good things, and many more indifferent ones." But, in spite of some forced fun and clumsiness of construction, the novel is decidedly an amusing one, and leads us to think that the author may do much better on some future occasion.

"Both in the Wrong," by Mrs. J. K. Spender, author of "Mark Eylmer's Revenge," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett). Mrs. Spender continues to make steady progress as a novelist, and in strength, interest, and judicious self-restraint on the part of the author, her new story seems to us even superior, perhaps, to "Mark Eylmer's Revenge," which was itself a marked advance upon those earlier tales in which she certainly laid herself open to some unfavourable criticism. The worst that can be said of the novel is that it is rather two stories than one, and we like the Elmore family, who play so prominent a part in the earlier chapters, so much that we cannot but regret that they should virtually vanish from the scene with the close of the first volume. It is with the second that the real interest of the piece commences, and this turns on the curious courtship and married life of the couple who, as husband and wife, are so decidedly "both in the wrong" in their action towards each other. The history of their jarring moods, fierce quarrels, and final reconciliation is for the reader to learn, and we shall content ourselves with saying that both Harry Walsham and his wife, Hermine, seem drawn with vigour and fidelity to nature. The same may also be said of Magdalen Hayward, the girl who, we suppose, is to be considered the true heroine of the tale, though her part in it is comparatively subordinate. The novel is worth reading, and in every respect will compare favourably with much of the current fiction of the day.

"Kingsdene," by the Hon. Mrs. Fetherstonhaugh, author of "Kilcorran" (2 vols.: Bentley).—Had we closed our examination of this book at the end of the first volume—a course to which, we admit, we felt strongly tempted—we should have pronounced it altogether trivial and commonplace. But with Vol. II. a very marked change for the better sets in, and the story of how the young wife succeeds in winning the love of the husband who has married her with nothing more than a calm regard for her, and whilst still sore at heart from the faithlessness of a former flame, is told with a skilfulness that arouses our interest, though the theme is one that can hardly boast of novelty. On the whole, then, we think that "Kingsdene" must be held successful as a novel of its class—of course not a high one—and it at any rate contains some two or three very fairly effective scenes.

We have also received "Sir Aubyn's Household, a Plain Unvarnished Tale," by Sigma, author of "Fan" (Samuel Tinsley), a story which may be recommended as not without merit or interest to those in search of "something to read," and of which we do not see that more need be said.

BOARD THE "VICTORIA AND ALBERT" INSPECTING THE FLEET

HOSPITAL EXPANSION

There is no subject of social economics at the present day that possesses a greater degree of importance than that remarkable expansion of the Hospital system which has been witnessed during the last fifteen years, and which is especially active at the present time. In the internal management of our great hospitals there has been a manifest advance, still leaving, however, something to be desired. The rule is that of gradual and general improvement. The services of sisters and ladies as nurses are increasingly brought into requisition. Several new hospitals of a truly national character have been added of late years to the old foundations, and there is at present a remarkable movement in favour of extending their benefits to the middle classes.

The main intention of hospitals is to meet the wants of the poor who, through accident or the sudden incursion of disease, are disabled from work, and unable to meet the expenses of sickness. Though the fact that our hospitals command the highest medical and surgical ability, and are admirably furnished with all the best methods and appliances, it has often happened that the poor labourer has received greater help and assistance than the poor gentleman. We have known cases in which the curate and the barrister have been glad to creep into hospital beds, assured of attention and treatment which they could not easily procure at home. One suggestion which has been lately made is that there should be special wards for the accommodation of persons who are able to pay for the accommodation which they receive, or to erect a Home Hospital for the middle classes. There is one special form of disease peculiarly demanding sympathy for which a peculiar provision has happily been made. The misfortune of insanity often falls with terrible severity on the middle classes. There is frequently hardly a middle place between a pauper lunatic asylum and expensive establishments where the charges frequently amount to several hundreds a year. This has often pressed with cruel severity on the families of professional men with limited income. Through the munificence of Mr. Holloway, a magnificent structure has arisen close to Virginia Water, which has been erected at his sole cost, and where the patients will simply have to defray the necessary expenses which they would incur in their own homes. It is to be hoped that this example will be followed until a sufficient number of such institutions is provided to meet the urgent need.

Hospital expansion has witnessed the origin and progress of several entirely new classes of hospitals, the Cottage, the Convalescent, the Children's Hospital. Cottage Hospitals are an institution which first came into existence about twenty years ago. They are now overspreading the whole country in a very remarkable manner. The rise and progress of this movement forms a very interesting chapter in the annals both of philanthropy and of medicine. The Cottage Hospital does not possess all the methods and appliances of the large metropolitan hospitals, nor yet the medical and surgical staff which can only be found in great cities. But it possesses special favourable features which the large hospitals are imitating, as in the case of the new Hospital of St. Thomas. There is no doubt that a larger amount of cures takes place in private practice than in hospital practice. The atmosphere of a large hospital causes what is called Hospitalism, a condition of air and temperature unfavourable to health and provocative of disease. The Cottage Hospital avoids this. It ensures quietude and privacy. Abounding in small towns and villages it frequently gives easy and immediate access to cases when a journey to a distant hospital or infirmary might be impracticable. The movement has had an extraordinary degree of success. The first was established at Cranleigh, about twenty years ago. It was a genuine cottage, which at the cost of fifty pounds was converted into a small hospital for six persons. The second was, we believe, at Warminster. Lord Bath gave the land; an unusually large garden was attached; clergymen volunteered their help as visitors and chaplain, and good ladies acted as visitors and matrons. These Cottage Hospitals have now a science and system of their own. They are managed at a much smaller comparative cost than the large hospitals, and the methods of managing them and sustaining them have in the course of time been simplified and improved. They well deserve separate consideration.

Convalescent hospitals are a happy addition to the old Hospital system. It very frequently happened that cases of illness and accident, which apparently prospered during hospital treatment, fell back after the removal of the patients to their homes. Nor was the reason far to seek. They were often removed from spacious rooms and ample diet to poor food and squalid surroundings. It was thought that the object should be not only to discharge a patient as technically cured but return him as a sound cured member to society. It was thought, therefore, that the Hospital might well be supplemented by the Convalescent Hospital. The remedial effect of an entire change of scene and climate have been beneficially manifested in thousands of cases. The first hospital of this kind was at Seaford in Sussex, very much on the plan of a Cottage Hospital; but now many of these institutions have assumed a peculiar character of their own. One of the London Companies has established a magnificent place at Bognor, and the Sanatorium at Weston-super-Mare is famous through all the West of England. We are glad to see that there are several institutions of this kind for poor gentlewomen in some of the seaside watering-places.

During the last quarter of a century, and especially during the latter part, the subject of hospitals has received a great stimulus and a remarkable expansion. The list which we have already given might be further extended if we enumerated the special hospitals which have been erected in order to meet special forms of disease. Nearly all these institutions, excepting a few which are more or less endowed are, "supported by voluntary contributions," a noble British phrase which has its place of honour all over the country.

The Children's Hospital is a favourite institution. Many are the presents of books, pictures, and toys which are sent up from happy homes to these charming little infirmaries. The movement began in Great Ormond Street; it was followed by the Evelina Hospital, and now many towns, we might especially particularise Brighton and Gloucester, have these hospitals. It is very interesting to visit them. The rooms are very pictures for neatness and comfort; the little ones, often hardly able to realise the gravity of their ailments, seem positively to enjoy themselves very highly; their relations and friends come to see them, and many are the friends and visitors who take a special interest in such cases. Many a young life which would otherwise have been lost or lapsed into a hopeless state of disease has been made useful and happy. In these hospitals children receive a constant scientific treatment and an amount of personal attention which would have been impossible at their own homes.

It will be seen, therefore, that during the last twenty years there has been a progressive development of our hospital system. It ought always to be borne in mind that the interest of the public are inseparably bound up with the interests of the hospitals. The latest improvements, all the methods and experiments of surgical and medical science, are watched and tested in these great institutions. We might considerably have added to the list if we had included the special hospitals for special kinds of disease. Armed with the knowledge acquired at the bedsides of his patients the medical man goes forth to practice his art in general society. The good which society renders to the hospitals is thus returned by the hospitals to society. The more perfect, the better appointed, the better classified they are, the greater is the reflex influence on the profession and on the country. So true it is that "those who water are watered again," and in showing kindness to others bring blessings upon themselves.

"FRUITY"

This is not a discourse upon port wine, tannic acid, tartrate of potash, and gout, but to a certain extent, upon gooseberries, currants, strawberries, and the like; and if it takes the form of a plaint, and expresses regret for the good old times, it is because there is reason. Now there are two gooseberry seasons—the one when newspaper editors miss the columns of talk poured forth in the Houses of Parliament, and are fain to seek for every-day facts to fill up the space. This is the time when the much-laughed-at paragraphs appear about the enormous gooseberry so many inches round, and so many ounces in weight, that was gathered in Mr. Tompkins' garden—a paragraph that goes the round of the provincial papers, like that relating to the shower of frogs. There is also the gooseberry season pure and simple, when gooseberries in their unripe state are gathered, basketed, sent to market, sold, and finally appear at our tables in the form of pie or tart. These are the fruits which succeed the soft, sub-acid, succulent leaf-stalks of the rhubarb—suggestive name, redolent of sick bed and nauseous potion—the leaf-stalks of a plant that has been tortured into untimely growth and abnormal bulk, until it has become a vegetable vagary, wonderfully unlike its uncultivated ancestor, the rheum, in its native state.

Now, has it ever occurred to anybody that while our seasons have gradually seemed to grow later, as if the annual clock had been pushed on a month, so that we get our frosts in January and February instead of December, our March weather in April, our May in June, and the like, fruits and vegetables, by the force of competition and the desire to be first in the market, have been dragged to maturity much earlier than of old. The result is that we are favoured with them during an exceedingly brief period, and then, one succeeding another at a terribly rapid rate, the fruit season is over before it should have culminated by Nature's laws, and housekeepers are reduced, like the busy bees, to the preserves they have stored in those well-known glazed white earthenware cells known as preserve-jars, but, to the youthful mind, as jam-pots loved and dear. There is good in this, of course; it incites the frugal mind, and induces household honey-gathering from the open flowers while they last. But what would the bees say if, by constant forcing, they found that their flower-time was reduced one-half, and, almost before swarming time, the workers came back to the hive with the announcement to her majesty the queen that flowers were over for the year?

And yet this is the case with the tart-producing and dessert-providing growths of the garden, and by this is meant the great market gardens that supply our towns. For here is the case: cook comes up for orders, and says the greengrocer is below, when naturally a conversation takes place with that "chief of nature formed to please, fit to converse, and keep the keys"—in other words, the mistress of the house. She says in spring-time, "I think, cook, we will have rhubarb tart again." "Can't, mum: Mr. Timmins says as it's gooseberries now, and rhubarb's over." In a very short time the tune changes to "There's no more gooseberries, mum; but red currants is in;" and almost before the red currant stain has had time to grow ruddy where the juice was spilt upon the tablecloth, black currants are there to make a deeper dye. Raspberries, that used to come so late—those wondrously-flavoured beehives of crimson hue, that came, thimble-like, off a delicate white finger on the parent cane, fruit that required such delicate gathering, but which yielded itself so gracefully to the seeking hand, and then endowed the palate with a flavour that one dares the vaunted mangosteen or durian of the distant East to equal if it can—the raspberries, we repeat, that used to come so late, now dart into the market to make a fugitive stay, and then they are shouldered away by the plums. Who would quarrel with plums, so long as they are the luscious greengage, or the pearly purple-tinted globes, with a furrow down the side—those wondrous skinsful of delicious pulp that used to drop into our hands when the tree was shaken, and then, if parted, allowed the stone to fall out clean and dry? No one, in their turn; but they are now dragged into the market immature and hard, to make an ephemeral visit, short as was that of the cherries, and, ere one has time to renew one's acquaintance, they are gone, and for weary, weary months it is always apple pie. Certainly, as the cookery-books say, there is "another way," and the pie may become a pudding, boiled in a basin, or the slippery sphere rolled out of a cloth; or the George the Thirdian problem—a dumpling with the apple inserted whole. Even the apple turnover may be had for a change—the Charlotte, the fritter, the jelly; but it is toujours pommes for many long months, to an extent that reminds one ever of the unhappy days of school, when apple pudding boasted two-inch crust, and sugar was not supplied, like French white bread, à discrétion.

Fruit, then, by forcing, and this hurried rush to market, is being made to resemble the flowers of the cistus—a one-day pleasure, and then it is gone. The only exception to this is the strawberry, of which growers have had the wisdom to cultivate various sorts for succession; while this year we have been flooded with those of foreign growth, well ripened, and tolerably good, but tasting strongly of the basket, faint with travel, and looking languid where they should be bright and scarlet. But even the strawberry of English growth seems to have degenerated of late years. It has grown big and bulky, elephantine in its proportions; but it is as the huge drayman to the well-knit little man—all bone and muscle. There is no stamina there. It is watery and soft; but the firm delicious flavour of its ancestor of five-and-thirty years ago is wanting; say forty years ago, when the cry through the streets was "Hautboys!" and Myatt's "Elton pine" was a something to come; when strawberries were strawberries, and you bought the crammed and bursting pottle, so redundant at the top, and so fine—and deliciously empty at the bottom. Truth to tell, the strawberry pottle was a delusion and a snare, and too often its contents were on the road to unsugared jam; but it must be owned that earlier growth and increase of size have not improved the strawberry of these later days.

Then the jam-making—those mysterious witcheries of picking fruit and stirring it in a scoured cauldron of copper, with such piles of loaf-sugar. Those scenes of enchantment over the charcoal fire lasted through the summer, when one's childhood was held spell-bound over the saccharine scenes, when the incantations were performed, and we grew sticky in finger and in face; were replete with skimmings, and watched with awe, after the cauldron scene and the last stir, the summoning of the spirits which were poured in plates to bathe the discs of foolscap, cut and nicked so neatly, to fill up the tops before the final tying down of jars, upon whose drum-head tops cabalistic characters soon appeared, before they stood in ranges on the store-closet shelf. Perhaps they stood true, perhaps they developed a pearly fungoid growth; but they were always suggestive to one's mind of roley-poley puddings, save and except those little pots of black currant jelly, which whispered "powder puzzled in a spoon." Preserving now is a rush that the fruiterer says is caused by the weather, when it is really brought about by the competition of trade. Farmers hold back their corn or hay; why should not market-gardeners their crops, and grow later varieties? The answer is, "They would be out of season," and this is so, for fashion rules in fruit as it does in flowers and dress. Efforts are made to produce vegetable abortions before their time; but the trials, save as preserves, to keep fruit late are few and far between. "Why," we say to the greengrocer, "should we not have currants and raspberries now this month?" "Well, you see, sir," he says, "rasps is out and currants isn't in." True; but they should be, for in plenty of country gardens they will abound. The fact is, that it is not the fruit, but the times that are out—of joint.

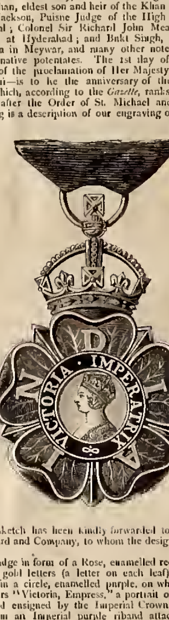
THE NEW ORDER OF THE INDIAN EMPIRE

This new Indian Order has been instituted in order to commemorate the proclamation of Her Majesty as Empress of India, and is intended for rewarding Indian officials, and in a great measure as a mark of distinction for various Eastern Potentates. The Viceroy is the Grand Master, the Members of the India Council are ex officio members for life, and C. U. Aitchison, Esq., C.S.I., has been appointed Secretary. The first batch of nominations numbered fifty, and first amongst them is Meer Mahmood Khan, eldest son and heir of the Khan of Khelat; the Hon. L. S. Jackson, Puisne Judge of the High Court of Judicature, Bengal; Colonel Sir Richard John Meade, K.C.S.I., the Resident at Hyderabad; and Bukt Singh, Rao Bahadur, Rao of Bedla in Meywar, and many other noteworthy Indian officials and native potentates. The 1st day of January—the anniversary of the proclamation of Her Majesty as Empress of India at Delhi—is to be the anniversary of the institution of the Order, which, according to the Gazette, ranks "next to and immediately after the Order of St. Michael and St. George." The following is a description of our engraving of the badge, of which the sketch has been kindly forwarded to us by Messrs. R. S. Garrard and Company, to whom the design and execution is due:—



A gold badge in form of a Rose, enamelled red, charged with INDIA in gold letters (a letter on each leaf), having in the centre, within a circle, enamelled purple, on which is inscribed in gold letters "Victoria, Empress," a portrait of Her Imperial Majesty, and ensigned by the Imperial Crown in gold, worn pendant from an Imperial purple riband attached by a gold brooch at the top.

ALL THE WORLD AT PARIS

Chapter IV.

Nos nisi damnose bibimus, moriemur inulti.

I feel almost too unwell to write, and we are all in the same plight. I cannot explain it except by using Charlie's vulgar expression, "mixing one's liquors."

We have mixed our liquors to-day to a frightful extent.

We were in such high spirits, too, when we started for the Exposition this morning. It was fine, and we were to explore all the cafés of nations.

Why, oh why, did we feel in honour bound to taste all their drinks?

It was unwise (mamma said so at the time) to begin with liqueurs at the Dutch Café at eleven o'clock in the morning. The glasses were tiny (not near as deep as the rolling Zuyder Zee), but they were very strong for their size. It cost us dear, too, in another way, for it spoilt our muslin dresses. Everything was sticky—chairs, tables, walls. We were like butterflies caught in a tub of honey.

Meanwhile Lilly was in ecstacies. "Oh, that delicious old brass chandelier! Oh, those sweet green and blue bottles! those lovely tiles!" she kept exclaiming. "Might we not be in an interior by de Hooghe?" "And, above all, the costume of those Hollandaises! Look at their complexions, pure white and vermilion! Skins such as those Rubens and Gerard Dow used to paint."

"My dear," said Papa, "look sharp with that sketch."

A walk from the Low Countries to Russia isn't far enough to clear one's head, or make one thirsty, especially if you stop, as we did, at the Hungarian Café to hear the Gypsies' band.

Here we were obliged to pay our footing by drinking a bottle of Tokay.

"Why need we have drunk it?" Because papa and mamma didn't like to see it wasted.

Never shall I forget that music, or the effect it had on the company round!

"I shall make a sketch here," whispered Lilly, "and call it 'Music hath Charms.' That priest there entranced, those people spell-bound, those faces beaming with all that is divine in man, all will come in."

With a touch of her pencil she transferred the godlike into the brutal. They knew they were being sketched, and shot glances at us which were simply fiendish.

"Quel joli talent!" We were moved on to Russia.

"We must taste the Kvas," said Charlie. "Mr. Hepworth Dixon drinks nothing else," said mamma. "It is described as a refreshing drink," said Lilly.

This was only to induce us to stop a minute. She was already wrapt up in the costume of a real Russian girl who was flirting with three or four Frenchmen.

Scratch away, Lilly, in your sketch-book; you will soon find your model not a Tartar, but a Frenchwoman à la Russe.

Alas, then, are all the costumes we see merely make-ups?

Nearly all.

Look, for instance, in at the door of this "Café de Tunis," and tell me how many of the musicians on the divan understand the legend over their heads.

"Entrez," said a horrible, old French waiter with a fez on, "and don't stop up the doorway. Come in or go away."

"Perhaps," said mamma, "a cup of coffee might settle the Maraschino, and the Tokay, and the Kvas."

"The very thing," said papa. So we go in.

Rummy cups (Charlie), with no handle, stuck into egg-cups, and the horrible old French waiter ladling the coffee into them.

Nevertheless it has a flavour, and with all thy grounds, Tunisian coffee, I love thee better than thine English counterfeit.

As to the music, it was unintelligible to Western ears, but it seemed abominable. Its excellence depended on the difficulty of its production, as with us. The mortal agony on the face of the singer proved this.

"Children," said papa, "we may as well be hung for sheep as lambs. Let's have another cup in the 'Café de Maroc.'"

This time we mount a staircase, paying a franc at the bottom. An Antinous, half French, half African, leads us each to a little pearl table and a seat. The egg-cups are brought on Moorish trays of brass.

It was delightful.

"To think," said mamma, "that I should find myself and my family in such a disreputable place as this, in front of that disgusting old, fat, half-naked, polygamous Turk, and those black ruffians without boots!"

These men were making soft music.

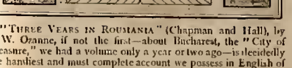
Lilly began to sketch, of course, and the girl quickly discovered it. She said the portrait of her papa was not nice enough. Her papa was the fat, disgusting, polygamous man. Then the fat man wanted to see it. Then the negro (he was "King Coffee" here) ordered us to go out, declared that we stopped business. That they wouldn't perform till we did go out.

And go out we did.

Whither should we go! We fly to the friendly shelter of those high-backed wicker chairs. Each seizes one like a hermit crab, and we turn them testudo-wise against all the world in Paris—for we were ill and cross and not fit to be seen.

P.S.—Papa has just received a telegram from the man who turns the handle of the boot-cleaning machine to say that he has brushed another pair of boots clean off the trees. I have to lend a pair of mine.



THE READER

"THREE YEARS IN ROUMANIA" (Chapman and Hall), by J. W. Ozanne, if not the first—about Bucharest, the "City of Pleasure," we had a volume only a year or two ago—is decidedly the handiest and most complete account we possess in English of a country and a people more talked about than known. Ethnologically and historically, the Wallach and the Moldavian take a place by themselves in the map of Eastern Europe. Claimed by the French as members of the Latin race, pronounced by the Germans to be a variety of the Slav, they are more probably a cross between the two, but with a stronger affinity to the former, the originally Daco-Rouman element having, like the Celtic, the valuable power of assimilating to itself most foreign admixtures. Their history runs in a line of its own, parallel to, but distinct from the Serb and Magyar chronicles, whose heroes are Stephen Dushan and John Hunyades. It betrays throughout a sneaking kindness—by no means altogether unreciprocated—for the Turk, not, indeed, as the best of possible neighbours or rulers, but as a good deal better than Magyar, Pole, or Muscovite. A bold and warlike race under their native Woivodes, Michael the Brave, Vlad the Impaler, Basil the Wolf—a chief still memorable for a simple code of laws in which "love" is emphatically pronounced an extenuating circumstance for a variety of crimes—often at war with one another, more often with their neighbours on every side, now in alliance with the Emperor, now making submission to the Sultan, the Moldo-Wallachians were always gravitating towards the Osmanli. Under the later rule of the tyrannous effeminate "Phanariote Hospodars," submissiveness increased as warlike virtues gradually decayed. In 1821 the Wallach rises of his own accord to put down Ypsilanti and the Hetairia. In 1828 and 1848, and again in 1853, he submits to Russian occupation only in deference to force majeure. Even last year, despite the personal ambition of Prince Carl, it was almost an accident—a cup of tea, say some, poured out for M. Bratiano by the Czarina—which brought about the Russo-Roumanian Convention, in lieu of the plan for combined defence which Sir Stephen Lakeman was simultaneously negotiating at Constantinople. Chapters of history, however, or on the types of the population—the half-French Boyard, the peasant who might have just stepped out of the Dacian group on Trajan's pillar, the wandering Tsigane, the hardy Szekler from the Hungarian side, the Bulgarian gardeners and road-menders, the odious Jew who has everybody in his books—are only a portion of Mr. Ozanne's volume. As interesting to the full are his descriptions of the features and the products of the country, its manners and its customs, its national fêtes and family ceremonies. Few countries equally out of the beaten tracks, despite an abominable climate for nine months in the year, perpetual fevers and not infrequent attacks of cholera, possess greater attraction than Roumania for the foreign resident, thanks partly, we are inclined to think, to the beaux yeux of the Wallachian ladies, and the determined love-making, much facilitated by a law of divorce, unparalleled in Europe for laxity and popularity. On its political future, under its Hohenzollern ruler—the pawn pushed forward by Prince Bismarck, twelve years ago, to the furthest corner of the European chess-board—Mr. Ozanne declines to speculate; though placed as it is between Austria and Russia he fears it cannot but fall eventually to the latter. Meanwhile we most heartily commend the volume as a store-house of information about lands which will always play an important part in the final settlement of South-Eastern Europe.

Like Mr. Ozanne, Dr. Henry Ling Roth, author of "A Sketch of the Agriculture and Peasantry of Eastern Russia" (Baillière, Tindall, and Co.), writes with the authority of an old resident in the districts he describes—the Trans-Volgan provinces of Samara and Simbirsk, in the heart of the famous "Black Earth" region, which Russians, with some little exaggeration, pronounce the finest soil in the whole world. Though a volume, strictly speaking, for the agriculturist, given up to statistics of varieties of soil and modes of culture, farm buildings and farm implements, sheep, cattle, and horses on the steppes, systems of land tenure, and Government training institutions, these sketches also contain much to interest the general reader. Very striking, for instance, is the opening description of the steppe country after the melting of the snows, when all the plain is one deep sea, and the water-courses where the turf is thin work ever-deepening ravines out of the ground, or in the long droughts of a "hungry summer," when the dew ceases to fall, and the thermometer sinks at times as much as sixty degrees in the night; and very interesting the accounts of the change in the ways of living that has set in here and there since the emancipation of the serfs. Dr. Roth is careful to quite an unusual degree to speak of nothing which he does not know thoroughly, and thus his volume, if it loses in bulk, gains equally in trustworthiness.

The painful conviction that "to the 'general reader' the political history of England during the last century and a half is a sealed book," has induced Mr. H. D. Adams to come to the rescue with the two sturdy volumes which, under the title of "English Party Leaders" (Tinsley Brothers), endeavour to combine a general survey of English politics from the reign of Anne to the Repeal of the Corn Laws, with biographical notices of the seven men whose names, though not all in the strictest sense "Party Leaders," will first occur to every reader of British history:—Walpole, the elder and the younger Pitt, Fox, Burke, Canning, and Peel. The ignorance which Mr. Adams deplores can hardly spring from deficiency of standard works, for of set histories, casual essays, biographies, correspondence, bearing on the matter, there is literally embarras de richesses. Much more must it arise, we fear, from dull indifference or sheer dismay at the accumulation of authorities to be worked through before the subject is fairly mastered. We can scarcely say that on either supposition Mr. Adams quite supplies a definite want—piquancy to stimulate the indifferent, or masterly condensation for the timid student. As a fairly careful summary, however, of salient points in British constitutional history, not unrelieved by occasional "tit-bits" from memoirs of repute, or from ephemeral publications of the period, his volumes are by no means without value, above all, for lives which, like those of Fox and Canning, require even for a superficial survey the study of a tolerably voluminous literature. They may do better service still if they allure their readers to labour for themselves in the same fields from which Mr. Adams has been gleaning for their amusement.

There is a naive presumption about the Hon. A. S. G. Canning's "Religious Strife in British History" (Smith, Elder, and Co.), which almost disarms one by its very innocence. Fresh, so we must infer, from the study of a number of books, among which Cassell's History of England, Scott's historical novels, and the inevitable Macaulay appear most prominent, and deeply pressed with the undeniable fact that "devout and sincere men," disciples of the Gospel of Peace, have waged war on one another with a bitterness far exceeding any they would have displayed had their opponents been common sinners, Mr. Canning favours us with a little résumé of our religious battles, bloody or bloodless, from the Reformation down to Catholic Emancipation, seasoned as he goes on with blameless moralising and historical comments of less or greater accuracy. There is no harm in it, but why has it been published? Written by a Brahmin after a year or two in an English College, it would be praiseworthy, and even interesting. As a contribution by an Englishman to historical literature it needs a justification which, we confess, we have been unable to discover.

It is but a fragment of the story of the siege which is told us in the late Col. Reynell Pack's "Sebastopol Trenches" (Kirby and Endean), nor can this fragment now hope to attract as eager listeners as it would have done when those personages of the Crimean War—the comments upon whom delayed its publication from motives of delicacy—were still fresh in public memory. Yet the plain soldierly tale of day and night work in the trenches, of the change of plan and the mismanagement in details which marred the first attack on the Redan, or of the fatal fewness of veteran soldiers among the rank and file, has interest for us still—an interest even greater, it may be, for the military than for the civilian reader.

The possibility, doubtless, of another Siege of Stamboul in 1878 suggested to Mr. Eaglestone "The Siege of Constantinople, 1453" (Tinsley Brothers) as a subject for a novelette, to which the ill-starred loves of a Varangian warrior and the sister of the Ottoman Sultan should supply the necessary underplot. The attempt to rival Gibbon is decidedly rather daring than successful. But the love-story is a graceful trifle enough; while flashing scimetars, and giant forms, and eagle glances, and curling lips abound to an extent which should satisfy the youngest reader.

The sketches of hunting, coaching, &c., contributed by Mr. F. F. Whitehurst during the last two seasons to the columns of Bell's Life and the Daily Telegraph, and now reprinted under the appropriate title of "Tally Ho" (Tinsley Brothers), will be found very excellent specimens of their class, though that class, we fear, is one which requires a special training to appreciate. It is a little curious, indeed, that the noblest of our field sports should be the hardest to describe without being tedious. The simplest scribe can generally write pleasantly of angling and shooting, though the scene be merely the canal bank or the rabbit burrows in the sandhills. Our best writers about hunting—unless, like the author of "The Adventures of Mr. Sponge," they give free rein to caricature—seem scarcely able to describe two "runs" together without much making-up from a queer mélange of ancient road-book and new Court Circular. Mr. Whitehurst, too, is by no means free from these besetting sins, though with the good excuse that he is writing for the papers. To the credit side of the account we must place a judicious variety in the "meets" described, from the orthodox "Shires" to the Exmoor stag-hounds, and from these again to the harriers of the Isle of Wight, and a multitude of "chirpy" anecdotes, of which some may interest a wider circle than that of the mere lovers of horse and hound.

Of a stout pamphlet of merely local interest, "The Hill Country of Alabama, or the Land of Rest" (E. and F. N. Spon)—an account of the iron and coal fields of Alabama, neatly illustrated with an ingenious map of the railway lines converging on this favoured spot from various quarters of the Union—we are scarcely qualified to speak. We may say, however, that it appears under the auspices of the English Committee of Alabama Eight per Cent. Bonds, and of the Alabama Great Southern Railway Company (Limited).

"Fat and Blood, and How to Make Them," by Dr. S. W. Mitchell (Lippincott and Co.), suggests, by its very title, its American origin. Not by the sires and matrons of Old England—whose embonpoint never ceased to provoke the sarcasms of the fastidious Hawthorne—are such directions generally needed. There can be little doubt, however, that meagreness, where it exists, is the worse evil of the two, and in the case of delicate girls a symptom often of serious ill health; and for such cases Dr. Mitchell's mode of treatment—based on the combination of rest, systematic feeding, and passive exercise—will be found, we think, extremely valuable.

Neat shilling editions of two famous works, "Paley's Evidences of Christianity" and "Butler's Analogy," edited, with introductions and analyses, by the Rev. F. A. Malleson, M.A. (Christian Knowledge Series: Ward, Lock, and Co.); a most readable little manual for Science Schools, "Elements of Physiography," by Professor D. T. Ansted (W. H. Allen and Co.); and a "First Latin Writer" (Rivingtons), by G. L. Bennett, Head Master of the High School, Plymouth, based on the lines of the Public School Latin Primer, and on the whole happier than such exercise-books often are in its selection as pieces for translation of passages fairly interesting in themselves and not too obviously put together for the express purpose of being put back into Latin, hardly require further commendation.

We have received from our old friend Mr. Punch "The Earl of Beaconsfield, K.G.," a selection from the cartoons that have appeared in the pages of our contemporary, in which the Premier and his doings are represented with more or less pungent satire. The series commences in 1845, and Mr. Disraeli's attacks on Sir Robert Peel form the subject of the opening cartoons. Then the "Protectionist" scheme is made fun of, and we find him represented as Gulliver in the fields of the Brobdingnag farmer. Passing on to 1857 we find Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone as "The Balancing Brothers of Westminster," in relation to Mr. Disraeli's amendment to the Budget, in which he was supported by his Liberal opponent. It is easy to see in what direction Mr. Punch's bias tends, else, why are several well-known cartoons omitted, whose subjects and treatment are more favourable to the Premier than those here presented.

We have received from Messrs. F. W. Bacon and Co. two new maps illustrating the Berlin Treaty, and showing very clearly the alteration in the European boundaries thereby made. We think, however, they would have been more complete if the Asiatic changes had also been represented.

DOT!

O HAD I but a fairy yacht,
  I know quite well what I would do—
I soon would sail away with Dot!

I'd quickly weave a cunning plot,
  Had I but fairies for my crew—
O had I but a fairy yacht!

I'd soon be off just like a shot,
  Far, far across the ocean blue;
I soon would sail away with Dot!

What happiness would be my lot,
  With nought to do all day but woo—
O had I but a fairy yacht!

To some sweet unfrequented spot—
  If I but thought that hearts were true—
I soon would sail away with Dot!

I'd sail away, not minding what,
  My friends' approve, or foes' pooh-pooh—
O had I but a fairy yacht!

For name or fame care not a jot,
  I'd leave behind no trace or clue—
I soon would sail away with Dot!

Forgetting all, by all forgot,
  I'd live and love the whole day through—
O had I but a fairy yacht!

In distant lands I'd build a cot,
  And live alone with I know who—
I soon would sail away with Dot!

I'd start at once—O would I not?—
  If I were only twenty-two—
O had I but a fairy yacht
I soon would sail away with Dot!

THE ISLE OF MAN BANK ROBBERY.——The bulk of the money stolen by Gray, the late cashier at the Bank of Mona, has been recovered, the convict having placed a full confession of the robbery in the hands of Mr. Laughlin, the lawyer who defended him on his trial. On Monday Mr. Laughlin communicated with the police, and the result was that search was made in the grounds attached to the residence of Mrs. Barrie, to whose daughter Gray had been engaged, and 1,985*l.* in gold was found beneath a tree. On Tuesday the search was resumed at Mill Mount, the country house which had been occupied by Gray, where at the bottom of the garden a sum of 2,000*l.* was found buried, and in front of the house another heap of gold (2,372*l.*) was discovered, just hidden beneath the surface of the earth. The bags in which the coins were packed had rotted away, and the money had become so mixed with the soil as to necessitate careful sifting. It is stated that the whole of the missing money, with the exception of 15*l.*, has thus been recovered. The details of the convict's confession are not published; but it is stated that they bear out in a most striking manner the evidence given at the trial by Mr. James Greig, the accountant of the bank. Gray says that he conceived and carried out the robbery entirely without accomplices. The story told by him about being attacked on the highway and robbed of the keys of the bank was of course pure fiction invented for the purpose of diverting suspicion from himself.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——After a lengthened inquiry before the local magistrates, Mr. Edward Clarke, one of the guardians of the poor of the parish of Edmonton, has been committed for trial upon five charges of fraud and forgery. He is accused of having appropriated large sums out of the public funds, and to have made the accounts apparently correct by presenting bogus contractors' accounts to his fellow guardians, none of whom entertained the slightest suspicion of him. The trial will take place at the Central Criminal Court, and meantime the accused has been admitted to bail, 4,000*l.*—Last week the manager of a coal-mine at Astley, was fined ten pounds for a breach of the Mines Regulation Act. The Inspector of Mines had visited the mine, and found cavities in the roof in three places, all containing gas, within a space of thirty feet. There was a naked light at the bottom of the shaft, which the inspector caused to be extinguished, and he had the men withdrawn. He said that he believed no one would have come out alive if the gas had ignited. The fireman, for not having made a full and true report, was fined 20*s.* These fines seem absurdly light in view of the serious nature of the offence for which they are supposed to be punishment.—The Treasury have undertaken the prosecution of John Holt and Elizabeth Ohlsen, who have been committed for trial at Liverpool on a charge of perjury, alleged to have been committed during the hearing of a "spiritualistic" divorce suit.—A fraudulent bankrupt who, to avoid paying his creditors, married a wife and settled all his property upon her, was last week convicted and sentenced to eight months' imprisonment.—At the Middlesex Sessions the other day a charwoman, aged sixty-one, was sentenced to four months' hard labour for a very singular robbery. The prosecutor, a coffee-house keeper, being annoyed by organ-grinders in front of his house, threw a lump of sugar at one who came to his door, and in doing so dropped a sovereign and a half-sovereign. The latter was soon recovered; but the larger coin could not be found, and the prisoner, who had been standing by, was accused of having picked it up. She denied having done so; but on the way to the police-station she remarked, "It would be curious if it were found in my apron," and in the apron it was found. Her defence was that the coin must have been jerked into its hiding-place without her knowledge; but the jury thought otherwise, and therefore convicted her.—At Hinckley three naughty boys, each aged eleven years, have been sentenced to a week's imprisonment and a whipping, for breaking open the missionary boxes at the church schools and stealing the contents. The robbery was committed on a Sunday during Divine service, the young thieves being amongst the congregation, but leaving before the service was finished in order to effect their purpose.—A policeman of the V division, attached to the Wimbledon district, and who has been in the force some fifteen years, last week met his death in a mysterious manner. On the Thursday, when he returned to the station, after being on duty all night, he appeared to be just recovering from the effects of drink, his face was injured and bleeding, and his staff was missing. He appears to have told the sergeant and the divisional surgeon that he had fallen down, and had not been assaulted; but his wife states that he told her he had been ill-used, and that some one, not a soldier, had taken his staff away. He died on the Friday night, and the coroner's inquiry has resulted in an open verdict. The staff has not yet been found.—There was some serious rioting at Lurgan on Monday. At Ballyblough, a very Protestant part of the town, two policemen who had arrested a man for using party expressions were set upon by a mob of some hundreds, who stoned and kicked them, and who afterwards broke the barrack windows, and had to be charged by the police at the point of the bayonet. Seven or eight persons were arrested. At a place called Dall's Mill, near Banbridge, some Protestant bands were passing a Roman Catholic part, when they were attacked with stones, and in retaliation fired on the people, and wrecked many Catholic houses. The Manchester Guardian tells of a man who has just sold "a lease" of his wife to another man who had become enamoured of her. The original price demanded was 10*l.*; but, through the friendly arbitration of a publican, half that sum was accepted. The couple had been separated from each other for two years, the husband having taken offence because one night, when he went home intoxicated, his cara sposa punished him by the application of a huge mustard plaster as he lay asleep.—The Chester magistrates on Saturday had before them a number of assault charges arising out of a curious case. Some time ago a married woman, the mother of six children, had eloped to America with a young man of twenty, who, after spending all her money, deserted her. She returned home last week, and her arrival was celebrated by a noisy crowd, who burnt her in effigy. The police were called to quell the disturbance, and one over-zealous constable laid about him vigorously with a stick until his sergeant ordered him to desist. The defendants were all bound over to keep the peace, and the constable has been suspended.—Some startling revelations were made the other day at an an inquest on the body of an illegitimate infant, which had "died by suffocation from want of fresh air." The grandparents and their four children all lived in one small room in a court off Gray's-inn Road, and it was stated that there were even worse cases of over-crowding in the neighbourhood, notably one in which two men, three women, and six children were the joint occupants of a single apartment.—The Bishop of Sodor and Man has written to the papers to remove the impression that it was a Manxman who threw the stone at Mrs. Rowley Hill the other day. His lordship says:—"The inhabitants of the island are peculiarly peaceful and well conducted. They have their faults, no doubt, as is the case with all; but I do not believe that there is a native of the Isle of Man who would have been guilty of such a dastardly act. The man is one of a very rough set of navvies imported from Glasgow for the construction of a new line of rail in the neighbourhood. What his motive could have been I am at a loss to understand. He was a stranger, and had received no provocation. He was certainly not drunk. He threw the stone, which was of considerable size, not accidentally, but with deliberate aim."—The Dublin newspapers contain a sensational narrative alleging dangerous insanity on the part of Mr. Justice Keogh. It is said that on Tuesday morning last, while in an hotel near Brussels, he attacked his valet, Curran, with a razor, inflicting two severe slashes across the ribs on either side of his body. The valet's cries brought assistance, and the Judge was disarmed and placed under restraint. The servant is in a fair way of recovery.—On Monday, at an inquest held on the body of a little girl, aged eight, who had been drowned in the Wye, near Buxton, it was stated that five men had stood watching the unfortunate child as she was carried down the stream, and made no effort to rescue her, although the water at that spot was not more than two feet deep. The coroner said that it was one of the most "peculiarly heartless" cases he had ever investigated. Such conduct was cowardly, contemptible, and mean to a degree, and he hoped most sincerely that it would never again be his duty to speak of a similar proceeding by beings who were a disgrace to any community. It was a painful case in every respect, and he hoped that if those men had either heart or soul, the thought of their conduct would occasion bitter reflection for years to come.—The statements made in Truth to the effect that a number of gambling hells existed at Brighton, at which persons were drugged, cheated, and robbed, was discussed by the Brighton Town Town Council on Wednesday, when the police stated that the allegations were absolutely untrue. Mr. Alderman Lamb, however, said that it was well known that for a long time a house in the town had been kept open for the purpose of fleecing simple young men; and a Mr. W. J. Smith informed the Council that he had been annoyed by touts inviting him to go in and gamble at several houses in the King's Road. The Mayor declared that he would rigorously prosecute all offenders who could be got hold of; and the Chairman of the Watch Committee said that every endeavour would be made to secure a conviction.

TURKEY AND ENGLISH COUNSELS.——It is stated that England has begun to act with decision in accordance with the Anglo-Turkish Convention. The Porte, we are told, has been formally advised to appoint a gendarmerie for the maintenance of order in Asia Minor, to establish appellate tribunals with European assessors, and to reform her whole system of taxation. If these provisions were carried out, the inhabitants of Asia Minor would, indeed, have good reason for gratitude to this country. The war unsettled society in every part of the Turkish dominions, and there can be no doubt that in remote towns and villages there is an enormous amount of disorder of which no rumour reaches the Western world. An efficient gendarmerie is, therefore, the most elementary of all the necessities of Asiatic Turkey at the present moment. Even this, however, would be a comparatively light boon if it were not accompanied by the appointment of proper appellate Courts. The Turks have never been good administrators of justice. They have a number of excellent laws, but they enforce them irregularly, acting too often on the caprice of the moment, or causing the scale to fall in proportion as it is weighted by the gold of suitors. English residents in Asia Minor are agreed in maintaining that a Turkish subject can only on rare occasions feel sure that his cause will be determined solely in accordance with the evidence. Mahomedans and Christians alike suffer; the former, perhaps, more than the latter, since there are fewer rich Christians than there are rich Mahomedans. New appellate tribunals, therefore, would command no respect without European assessors; but with them something like order might ultimately be expected to emerge from the existing chaos. As to the reform of taxation, almost any system would be better than that which now prevails; and a real improvement would inevitably lead to the encouragement of native enterprise. The question is, Can the Porte be trusted to give effect to these fine schemes? It is said to have formally assented to them; and we fully believe that it means well. But the impulse caused by recent disasters will soon be spent, so that, if we are to achieve anything worth achieving, we must do it without unneccessay delay. If we could make a genuine beginning, more than half our difficulties would be overcome, for we should then have the people on our side. As yet they cannot realise that anything is to be done for them, and they have not the spirit to act independently. But were good tribunals actually at work, this alone would exercise a powerful influence. The population would have an inducement to improve their position, and to insist on their rulers thinking of something more than their own selfish interests.

ST. PARTRIDGE'S. The First of September falls this year, as our Irish friends would say, on the Second, and so the poor "little brown birds" will have a day's grace, though many thousands will hear the village bells for the last time on Sunday next, as their music will be wafted over the stubbles and green covers. To all intents and purposes then Monday next is "the First," and, as far as can be gathered from reports, the partridge season is likely to show as good sport as the grouse. But it may once more be asked why in this country we insist on "the First" being an unmoveable feast. Our foreign friends certainly manage some of their affairs better than we do, and show considerable common sense in regulating the opening day of the shooting. No hard and fast day like the 1st of September exists. Not later than the 12th of August authentic information as to the condition of the game and the clearing of the crops is forwarded from the provincial authorities to the responsible Minister, who thereupon decides the date of the opening day, it being understood that not less than seven days shall intervene between the publication of the fixture and the celebration of the festival itself. In Belgium they are even more minute, and one half of the little kingdom has generally a different day fixed from that selected for the other half, so that by simply crossing the river Meuse an enthusiastic sportsman may enjoy two "Firsts" within the same twelvemonth. There is obviously a good deal of reason in this arrangement, which we fail to imitate. Several evils are thereby avoided. You neither find yourself incurring the maledictions of tenants by trampling through uncut crops in search of a marked covey, nor witnessing the murder of the innocents by some so-called sportsman, to whom a partridge is a partridge if it be no larger than a sparrow. Again, should the season result in an early harvest, and strong coveys give warning that it is full time to be up and doing, there is no sinking into your armchair with a sigh of disgust to count the evil days which must necessarily elapse before the fatal First of September. It only needs that sportsmen should take some definite steps to express their wishes on this matter, and then, notwithstanding the "Conservative reaction" of late years, there would be no very great difficulty in obtaining some modification of the present Medo-Persian law.

ENGLAND AND AFGHANISTAN.——Serious alarm has been caused both in England and in India by the Russian mission to Cabul, and a great deal of advice is being thrust upon the Government with respect to the policy it ought now to pursue. One piece of counsel which has come from many different quarters is that we should take the opportunity of Abdoola Jan's death to urge upon the Ameer the propriety of his recognising Yakoob Khan as his successor. It is impossible to feel sure that this is wise advice. Yakoob Khan was at one time believed to have a friendly feeling towards England, but we do not know what may be his sentiments now. The fact that we have not procured his release may have permanently turned him against us, in which case we should, by favouring him, be injuring our own interests. Besides, it is not absolutely certain that if he were set free be would be Shere Ali's successor. The chances, indeed, are that he would obtain the throne, but there are other claimants, and circumstances might arise which would prevent him from holding his own. We should then, of course, if our cause were identified with his, find in the new ruler a bitter and persistent enemy. On the whole, the Indian Government will probably conclude that its safest plan is to interfere as little as possible in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. Shere Ali is an independent sovereign, and he naturally resents any claim on our part to dictate to him the course he shall adopt. At the same time England cannot allow Russia to go on intriguing in a country so close to our territory. If her influence were to become predominant in Afghanistan, a heavy blow would be struck at our authority in India, and it is not too much to say that a war with Russia would be rendered absolutely unavoidable. There can be little doubt that a permanent English mission will now be settled in Cabul, and if this is done there should not be much difficulty in thwarting the schemes of the Russians. The Ameer has as little desire to see his country annexed by the one Power as by the other, and nothing would bind him and his people to us more readily than the assurance that they will be left to settle their own business in their own way, but that if they are attacked from without they will be defended with the whole force of the British Empire.

DROVERS.——The Drovers' Benevolent Institution, which has recently been holding high festival at the Alexandra Palace, is an Association which must command general sympathy on the ground that one of its chief objects is the general improvement of a class of men whose occupation in itself is not surrounded with the most humanising influences. That it has effected great good during its existence may be fully and thankfully admitted, and no doubt a considerable number of drovers belonging to it are men who perform their work honestly and humanely. But all who take special notice of the driving of the flocks of sheep and herds of cattle through the metropolitan streets on Mondays and Thursdays cannot but feel that the majority of drovers are still most wantonly cruel. They still beat and prod the unfortunate animals under their charge most unmercifully, and suffer swarms of small boys armed with sticks to do the same, and scenes of the grossest cruelty are being perpetually enacted, as if there was no such Association as the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in existence. Moreover, as if conscious of their wrong-doing, not one out of every half-dozen drovers one sees wears his metal badge in such a way that the number on it can be seen, the badge being turned so that the face of it is between his arm and his side. But after all there is some excuse to be made for the drovers, for they have a most difficult work to perform, and of which it might almost be said that it requires a loss of temper to carry it out efficiently. Our system of private slaughter-houses, and the necessity of driving cattle from Copenhagen Market to all parts of the metropolis, must be blamed for much of the cruelty that is enacted. An Act of Parliament long ago arranged for the abolition of these private slaughter-houses after a certain period, but unfortunately they have been suffered to remain under the provisions of a more recent Act. This is a matter for regret for several reasons. Notwithstanding the most stringent regulations concerning them, they are dangerous to the health of the localities in which they are situated, the flesh of animals is deteriorated by the exhaustion they suffer while being driven to them, they involve needless cruelty in the slaughtering of the animals, and the meat can neither be properly dressed or kept, under the limited accommodation they afford. There is a hope, however, that the enforcement of the present strict regulations by the local authorities will eventually cause a movement among the slaughterers themselves to demand a further development of the system of abbattoirs, which amend many of the evils complained of, and minimise the cruelty of drovers.

MARSHAL MACMAHON AND THE REPUBLIC.——The enemies of the French Republic have been spreading a report that Marshal MacMahon intends to resign after the Senatorial elections, or when the Exhibition is closed. There does not seem to be the least foundation for the rumour, and the obvious intention of these who invented it is to create a feeling of insecurity throughout France. They are intensely annoyed that Republican institutions have worked so smoothly, and they hope that if there were some uncertainty as to the tenure of his office by the Marshal, a little difficulty might be thrown in the way of the predominant party. It is significant that their tactics have altogether failed. France has paid very little attention to their outcries, and has exhibited no anxiety. This is, no doubt, partly due to the general conviction that the Marshal likes his post too well to give it up in haste. If he had meant to resign, he would unquestionably have done so when the last Ministry was ignominiously turned out of office. He had then placed himself in opposition to the country, whereas now he acts in hearty accord with it, and knows that be enjoys general respect and confidence. This does not, however, exhaust the secret of the national calmness. It is still more due to the belief of the majority of the people that even if a new President had to be elected there would be no serious disturbance. Some jealousies would, of course, be excited. The chances of M. Grévy, M. Dufaure, and M. Gambetta would be eagerly canvassed; and the extreme Radicals would have a strong temptation to insist on the adoption of what their opponents condemn as a violent policy. But the vast mass of the Republicans have of late years learned many profitable lessons; they realise, above all, the necessity of not playing into the hands of the Imperialists by encouraging disorder. Hence the possibility is that, if Marshal MacMahon were to retire, a successor would step quietly into his place, and that the Republicans would keep to the same lines as those they now follow. That France is at last convinced of this fact, and has good grounds for her conviction, is the best possible guarantee for the permanence of the system which has been established after so much strife and bitterness.

GAMBLING AT BRIGHTON.——The propriety of the modern Baiæ has been shocked at the allegation that gambling of a most pronounced kind has been going on within its precincts at more than one house established for that express purpose, and that touts are employed to inveigle "pigeons" within them to undergo the process of plucking. The Corporation, as becomes a virtuous body, is indignant, and, because some of the details of the accusation are not strictly substantiated, seems inclined to repudiate the charge as a myth. One of the Aldermen, however, knows better, and mainly in consequence of his personal statement further investigation is to be made. In the mean while other evidence has been adduced which leaves the matter in no doubt; and after all there is nothing surprising in the facts elicited, for Brighton has always been only too ready to imitate and exaggerate the follies and vices of the metropolis. It is a mere truism to say that Englishmen are the most inveterate gamblers in the world, though their gambling assumes a variety of forms which pass for legitimate speculation. But recent revelations indicate that the vice has of late years been increasing, and running in old channels which were thought to have been long blocked up. True that the neighbourhood of St. James's Street does not abound with those establishments which a generation ago were so common and known by a name not fit for ears polite, but as a recent trial has demonstrated to the general public they exist now under the modified form of "clubs" of a "proprietary" character, at which several of the old gambling games and several new ones are played for ruinous stakes. Of course, gambling cannot be put down by Act of Parliament, but facilities for it may, and it cannot be tolerated that mere gambling-houses, practically open to all comers, should exist in our midst under another name. The law is clear enough in this matter. Gentlemen may gamble in their own houses and in bonâ fide clubs among themselves on equal terms, but where there is a regular banker, one who "holds the bag against all comers," and this person practically the proprietor of the house, then the house becomes in the eye of the law "a common and disorderly house," and so liable to prosecution. A few days ago the police made a raid on a gambling house in Whitechapel, and captured a large batch of gamblers. They were all fined or imprisoned, and their names given in the police reports. Let such a raid be made further west, and the question tried as to the legality of some of these "clubs." Probably we shall hear something of this matter when Parliament meets again.

THE REFORM OF EGYPT.——There is at last some ground for hope that Egypt is to have a bright future. The mere fact that the Khedive has consented to give up to the State his vast lands is of immense significance. These lands have hitherto been tilled, for the most part, by forced labour, which means an almost incalculable amount of human misery. Forced labour will now be virtually abolished, and the lands which are surrendered will offer a splendid field for free and energetic enterprise. The appointment of Nubar Pasha as Chief Minister, and of Mr. Rivers Wilson as Minister of Finance, is perhaps of even greater importance, since it implies that the Khedive intends to carry out in earnest the recommendations of the Committee of Inquiry into his revenues. The present system of taxation in Egypt is abominable. It crushes to the earth the poorer classes, and dries up the very sources of national wealth and progress. Such men as Nubar Pasha and Mr. Wilson will certainly not allow this state of things to last much longer, if they are invested with real power; and there is every reason to believe that their authority will be genuine. We have not, indeed, much faith in the generosity or wisdom of the Khedive; but he has, at any rate, a keen apprehension of his own interests, and he must see that thorough-going reform is the only means by which he can hope to retain his palaces and honours. Should constitutional Government be established, and the financial administration be placed on a just basis, Egypt will become prosperous, and a patriotic feeling will grow up among all sections of the community. England will rejoice at this result, not only from humane motives, but for her own sake. It is clear that we are more deeply interested than any other nation in the political destinies of Egypt. To us it is of vital importance that it should never fall under foreign domination, and if it were ever threatened with this fate we should be absolutely compelled to interfere and to annex the country. We do not want to annex it, however, partly because we should prefer not to wound France, but mainly because we have already more territory than we know very well what to do with. Our chief hope must be that the people themselves will be ready to resist any attempt at conquest. And they will be so if their country is made pleasant to them, if they obtain institutions of which they can be proud, and which will enable them to develop in peace their great resources. They will then be eager for independence, and we shall have the best possible allies in our determination to keep open the direct route to India.

REFRESHMENTS AT RAILWAY STATIONS.——The announcement that a leading railway company is about to thoroughly consider the whole question of the re-organisation of the refreshment-rooms at its stations, with a view to the interests of the travelling public, will be received with general satisfaction. As a rule refreshments of all kinds on our railways are second rate and intolerably dear, while the variety is very limited. This is particularly the case with effervescing and non-alcoholic drinks, which are almost invariably bad, though charged for according to the tariff of first-class hotels. In no Continental country, which has claims to be considered civilised, are the arrangements for hungry and thirsty travellers so bad as is our own. In France, Germany, Austria, and Italy, the railway authorities seem to take a pride in seeing that their clients are well and cheaply catered for; a remark which applies also to America. However, it is never too late to mend. The railway company at home which first puts these matters on a better footing will not only earn the gratitude of its own special passengers, but of all travellers, for other companies, if only for very shame's sake, will be obliged to follow the good example.

THE ROYAL SILVER WEDDING

THE festivities at Brussels, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the marriage of the King and Queen of the Belgians, extended over several days. The Belgian capital was decked out in all the glory of the national colours, which were noticeable everywhere, whether the decorations took the form of flags and banners, or of wreaths and garlands; and all the residents and visitors felt it incumbent upon them to display their patriotism by wearing ribbons and rosettes of the same hues. The King and Queen had a hard week's work of it. On Monday, after visiting Bruges, they were present at a banquet; on Tuesday a multitude of diplomatic deputations were received, and another banquet was given; and there were more receptions on Wednesday, though that was supposed to be an "off day." Thursday, the actual anniversary of the wedding, opened with a religious celebration at the Church of St. Gudule, at which Cardinal Deschamps and five Belgian Bishops officiated, and the Te Deum was sung. On their return to the Palace their Majesties received the Provincial Councillors, listened and replied to their address, and then retired to lunch. Next came the great event of the day, the procession of upwards of two thousand Belgian women, led by Madame Auspach, the wife of the Burgomaster of Brussels. These were charged with the pleasing duty of presenting the diamond crown and suite of lace, the subscriptions for which though limited to a maximum of twopence halfpenny had produced nearly 5,000*l.* The crown is very elegant but very small, and is intended to be fixed in the hair. In front is a large diamond, worth 2,000*l.*, the gift of one of the Belgian Consuls abroad. For some days these articles were on view at the Hotel de Ville, and out of the payments of ten centimes each person for admission the poor were given a dinner. The representative women of the Communes assembled in the Park, and advanced across the grand alley to the Palace, under the marshalling of some male officials of the Communes. The King, wearing a General's uniform, and the Queen a costume of the national colours, maize-coloured silk, black lace, and scarlet velvet bonnet, took up their positions behind the small table on which the presents were laid. Madame Auspach advanced, and in a few graceful sentences told Her Majesty of the desire of the Belgian women, there represented by delegates from every city, town, and village in the kingdom, to offer to their gracious Sovereign some slight tokens of their affection and respect on so joyful an occasion. The Queen briefly returned thanks, and then the deputation began to defile past, the King and Queen bowing to each lady delegate as she went by; and the procession taking fully half an hour to go by. During the day the Marquis of Hamilton presented the King with a magnificent silver covered cup, sent to His Majesty by the Prince of Wales, and Lord Torrington, on the part of Queen Victoria, handed to the Queen a letter conferring on Her Majesty the Ladies' Order of the Victoria and Albert and the Insignia in diamonds.

At night there was a general illumination of the city, and their Majesties attended a banquet given by the Councillors-General. On Friday there was a review of the Civic Guard on the Place du Palais; and in the evening, when the weather brightened for a short time, the King and Queen, who had given a banquet, and held reception at the Palace, were serenaded by some of the associations which were to have taken part in the monster torchlight procession which had been countermanded on account of the rain.

Saturday was the children's day. All the Communal schools of Brussels, strengthened by deputations from every provincial school in the kingdom, paraded before their Majesties. They were copiously provided with banners, and each school brought to the Queen an offering of flowers in a basket.

Marie Henriette Anne, Queen of the Belgians and Archduchess of Austria, is a daughter of the late Archduke Joseph Antoine-Jean of Austria. She was born at Buda Pesth on the 23rd of August, 1836, and was married to Prince Leopold, now King of the Belgians, in August, 1853. Our portrait of Her Majesty is from a photograph by Ghémar Brothers, 27, Rue de l'Ecuyer, Brussels.

CHARACTER SKETCHES AT BRUSSELS

THE group of "fair women" which forms the first sketch will give a good idea of the diversity of head gear to be found amongst the peasantry of Belgium. Many of the head dresses are exceedingly handsome and valuable, some consisting of priceless lace and quaint old gold ornaments, the latter mostly heirlooms for many generations. Next we come to a very familiar object in the streets of Brussels—Flemish milkwomen and their patient canine steed, carefully muzzled, according to law. The dog depicted is somewhat unusually small for his work—they are usually big, strong brutes, as muscular as Shetland ponies. The gallant Civic Guards drinking the health of their King and Queen need only a passing mention; nor does the well-known figure of the Belgian lace girl require any detailed description. The next figure, a Brussels dandy à la quête for subscriptions to a pet school, is frequently seen throughout Belgium and France. Possibly he has undertaken the task as a penance; but, more probably, he is accompanying some fair and charitably disposed damsel. The Waterloo coach is one of the chief features of Brussels, at least to Englishmen, who never fail to hasten to the great battle-field, and rarely come away without some "really genuine relic" of the "famous victory."

THE LATE QUEEN CHRISTINA OF SPAIN

THE death of the once famous Queen Dowager Christina of Spain, who for the past thirty years has led a peaceful, domestic, and almost forgotten life, has recalled to mind a stormy epoch of European history—an epoch when who should or who should not be the ruler of the peninsula, or even the husband of that ruler, was made the subject of endless internecine intrigues and negotiations, and which once nearly brought about a breach between France and England. Indeed, in modern days no woman has ever taken so prominent a part in the political history of Europe, nor has been able for years together, like Catherine de Medici, to maintain her power by skilfully pitting her various antagonistic factions against each other. Queen Christina was every inch a Bourbon, being the child of Francis I., King of the Two Sicilies, and of his second wife, Maria Isabella, the daughter of King Charles IV. of Spain. Queen Christina was born in 1806, received a liberal education, and a capital training in outdoor sports, and in 1829 was married to King Ferdinand VII. of Spain, being his fourth wife. Her elder sister had also married a younger brother of the King, and the two women speedily acquired such an influence over the mind of Ferdinand, who was then in feeble health, as altogether to eclipse his eldest brother, Don Carlos, who, in the event of the

THE ROYAL SILVER WEDDING AT BRUSSELS—CHARACTER SKETCHES

King having no son, was reckoning upon the succession to the throne. The King, however, in 1830, abrogated the Salic law by which no woman could sit on the throne of Spain, and later in the year Queen Christina gave birth to a daughter, Maria Isabella (the present ex-Queen), who was at once proclaimed Princess of the Asturias. Shortly after, however, the King became seriously ill, and, under pressure from the Church party, restored the Salic law; but, on getting better, once more yielded to the influence of his wife and her sister, and again abolished the restrictive statute, so that, on his death in 1833, the Infant Isabella was proclaimed Queen, the Queen Dowager Christina being appointed Regent by the King's will until Isabella's eighteenth year. Then ensued a fierce struggle between the Liberals or Constitutionalists, with whom Christina identified herself and her daughter, and the Absolutists, who espoused the cause of the King's brother, Don Carlos. The result was the well-known and terrible five years' civil war between "Christinos" and "Carlistas," which was conducted on both sides with almost unprecedented horrors and cruelties, and which was ultimately ended by the victories of the Christino general, Espartero, and the treachery of the Carlist chief, Maroto. Tranquillity being restored in 1839-40 by the "Peace of Verzara" and the flight of Cabrera, the Queen Dowager became alarmed at the Radical attitude of her own supporters, the Liberals, whose ultra measures were highly repugnant to a Bourbon mind, and with whom she had by no means led a peaceful life during the stormy period of the five years' war, a period which, although supported by France, England, and Portugal, she found fraught with pitfalls and dangers in every direction. Now that peace was restored, the Madrid political parties split into various subdivisions. After numerous Ministerial crises the Queen Regent, who favoured the Church party, found herself compelled, three months after the end of the war, to withdraw to France, leaving the Regency in the hands of her Prime Minister, Espartero, who had been forced upon her by the Progressista faction. Three years later (1843) Espartero himself fell through the intrigues of the French party, who supported Queen Christina, and this was followed by the Cortes declaring Queen Isabella to have attained her majority, although she was only just thirteen years old. Queen Christina then came back to Spain, and with consummate skill ruled over the mind of her daughter and her Ministers, and was practically the sovereign of the country, though eminently unpopular, her nickname being La Mala, the Evil One. Then ensued the historical intrigues between the Courts of England and of Louis Philippe as to who should be Isabella's consort, and as the English Court showed a very determined attitude in opposing the French King's wish to make his fifth brother, the Duke de Montpensier, king-consort of Spain, Queen Isabella married her cousin, Don Francisco d'Assisi, the Duke having to be content with her younger sister, Maria Louisa. It is curious to note how nearly Louis Philippe's wish that his line should sit upon the throne of Spain was realised by the marriage of the Duke's daughter to King Alphonso. These marriages added to the unpopularity of the Queen Dowager, and in 1847 she finally left Spain for France, where she has since, with occasional visits to Rome, lived in retirement with her husband, Don Fernando Muñoz, the Duke of Rianzares, a private soldier whom she had raised to the rank of Chamberlain, and whom she secretly married three months after King Ferdinand's death, and has devoted herself mainly to the education of her daughters, who have all married Italian noblemen Queen Christina, however, undertook a journey to Spain last year to be present at the wedding of her grand-children. She died on the 21st inst. at Havre, after a brief illness.—Our portrait is from a photograph by E. Neurdien, 28, Boulevard de Sebastopol, Paris.

THE BOMBAY VOLUNTEER RIFLES

This corps was only established in August last year, but it is supported in the most enthusiastic manner by the European residents in the district. It has a strength of about 600, forming six companies, with an additional company at Poona 120 strong, and 200 cadets. It is armed with Martini-Henry rifles of the latest pattern, and the uniform consists of a scarlet tunic, with blue collar and cuffs braided with silver; and blue trowsers, with helmet and puggree. The honorary Colonel is Sir R. Temple, K.C.S.I.; the Commandant is Lieut.-Colonel J. M. Sexton, and the Adjutant Lieutenant I. J. B. Dunne. The corps possesses a good band and has its own shooting range at Coorla near Bombay, where the members diligently practice, and with such success that it is not unlikely that they may one day send a picked team to take part in the Wimbledon competition. In May, when the native troops were ordered to Europe, a number of men, headed by Captain Weir, volunteered for active service.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION

THE BASKET-CHAIRS

Why cannot something of this sort be introduced into England? At every ordinary sea-side resort there are certainly seats provided on the beach for visitors, where ladies who object to repose on the shingle or sands can spend the morning with their work or a book; but then they are exposed to the full glare of a July or August sun, or, should there be a breeze, to the discomfort of having the various materials of their work-basket scattered about the neighbourhood, or the leaves of their novel suddenly turned over before they have completed a page, to say nothing of running imminent risk of toothache or neuralgia by having one cheek uncomfortably cool while its fellow is scorched to a cinder. In these chairs, which are in constant use in many continental watering-places, and with which the grounds of the Paris Exhibition are bountifully studded, the occupant can shelter himself from both sun and wind, and many an invalid or convalescent might thus be enabled to enjoy the outdoor air with a minimum of danger.

THE DUTCH HOUSE

Here we have the interior of one of the rooms in the Dutch House, with a group of women in their national costume, preparing to take a baby to church for the important ceremony of christening. The child is carefully covered over with a quaintly-coloured shawl, while its mother and her attendants are decked out in all their picturesque finery for the occasion. The room and its inhabitants represent life at Hindeloopen, Friesland, and the whole interior gives an admirable idea of a dwelling in that district. There is a dado running round the room of the characteristic blue tiles, representing scenes of canal and rural life; while on the right is a huge bed, let into the wall, like a monster berth in a steamer's cabin. There is a charming old clock in the corner; close by is the baby's cradle of painted wood on a stand. The fireplace is singularly picturesque; while in glass-panelled cupboards is quaint old china which would make the mouth of the mildest of china-maniacs water with envy.

"AMONG ALIENS"

"HER LAST SACRAMENT"

Such a scene as this needs little description; but we may say that Mr. Stocks has treated a difficult subject with unquestionable success, as all who saw this picture in the recent exhibition of the Royal Academy will readily admit. The excellent painting of the rustic interior, the careful grouping of the attendant relatives, the reverential attitude of the clergyman, the expression on the face of the aged moribund, momentarily lit up by a ray of sunshine, are all worthy of high praise.

LIFE IN MANITOBA, BRITISH NORTH AMERICA

In these sketches our artist gives us some interesting glimpses of life in the Far West. One of the best kinds of sport to be had in those wild regions is shooting the sheep of the Rocky Mountains, a pastime calculated to test the physical strength and nervous courage of the hunter, who must be prepared to follow the trail patiently and perseveringly over difficult and dangerous bits of rugged and mountainous country before he gets a sight of his quarry. After hours and perhaps days of careful stalking, now climbing a precipitous rock, now struggling through a dense jungle, and anon creeping round the face of some high cliff, upon a narrow ledge, below which yawns a fearful chasm, he at last gets a "flying shot," and brings down his game. The next thing is, of course, to pitch one's tent, and seated on a mossy bank, enjoy one's pipe, while the faithful Indian guide cooks some "mutton chops for supper." "Art Critics" shows the delight and interest with which the Indians regard The Graphic, especially when the engravings depict scenes with which they are familiar. Finally we have an Atnah "Medicine Man" or doctor in the act of performing his incantations. These doctors are never consulted until the patients are at the point of death, when their friends carry them in blankets to the "Medicine Man." In our engraving a sick woman has been placed on the ground, her relations form a half circle at her feet, and a pan of water has been placed near her head. The medicine man begins to dance round her, first muttering, then singing, and as he gets more excited, he shouts and yells! The Indians believe the illness (or evil spirit) is thus driven out of the sick woman into the water in the pan, and they carry her home firmly convinced that she will recover.

CYPRUS—A NATIVE DANCE

"The subject of my sketch," writes the artist, "is a dance on the recruiting ground in Nicosia. It was taken a few months ago. While the recruiting for the Sultan's army goes forward these dancers are employed, so that by their gymnastics and wild war-songs, they may attract probable recruits to the ground, and infuse into them a spirit of patriotic enthusiasm. The Turks in Cyprus responded well to the calls for troops to serve the Padishah up to quite a recent date; but, on the whole, the Cypriotes are a quiet, inoffensive, agricultural people, and possess no very strong ambition for martial glory. The ground shown is also used as a market-place, and is in the strictly Turkish quarter of the town. The sketch was taken at considerable risk, as at the time the Turks objected to see a stranger with a pencil and sketch-book in his hand."—We are indebted for the sketch and the above description to Mr. Charles Fullwood.

THE CAPE WAR: FINGOES VIEWING THE DEAD BODY OF SANDILLI

Sandilli, the last of the Gaika chiefs, and the leader of the late rebellion by this tribe, was killed by a bullet which entered his right breast, but it is not known who fired the shot. His body was found some days afterwards, nearly all the flesh on the left side of the face having been eaten by wild animals. Sandilli lingered some days after he had been shot, and the news of this circumstance, and also of his death was given by Gadu (a Councillor of Sandilli's) who gave himself up and led Captain Langtry (of the Colonial Forces) to the spot where the body was found. The remains were subsequently brought to Isidingi, where they were identified and buried. A large number of Fingoes were present, and Commandant Shermbriicker, by the aid of an interpreter, pointed out to them the consequences of rebellion. They passed the body, which was laid out in a shed, one by one; each man making a lunge at it with an assegai, as if he would like to have stuck it into the body The Fingoes executed a war dance to commemorate the fall of their great enemy. By the death of Sandilli, and the subsequent capture of Edmund and Mautanziena (his two sons), the rebellion, as far as the Gaikas are concerned, may be considered at an end. —The sketch from which our engraving is taken, is by Lieut. G. E. Giles, R.A., to whom we are indebted for the above particulars.

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND, IV.

BRITISH SYRIAN SCHOOLS

"The numerous Christian schools" (writes our artist), "French, German, American, and British, form a most interesting feature in a Pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

"In the City of Damascus alone there are more than fifty schools, some Moslem, others Jewish, and others, again, established by the different branches of the Christian Church Greek Church, Roman Catholic, and Protestants of various denominations—several of these latter are under the management of the British Syrian Committee."

"The head-quarters of British Syrian Schools are situated at Beyrout, and are presided over by Mrs. Mott. On my visit to the establishment I was much surprised to find such large and handsome buildings, so far superior to many of our charitable institutions at home. There are schools for infants, for blind girls, and a training-school for Bible teachers. In this section especially, I am told, a great deal of good work has been done. The pupils are mostly Mahomedan women, taught by English ladies; and the pupils eventually become teachers themselves and, visit the numerous harems in the town and about the Lebanon villages to read and lecture to the fair inmates. In many instances their husbands have in time taken a lively interest in their education, and have been much surprised in listening to many passages from the Bible, 'the best history of their country,' from the fair lips of their wives.

"It is surprising with what accuracy of pronunciation the little scholars speak English and sing Moody and Sankey's hymns. Though it was vacation time when I visited the schools, a choir was collected from those who still remained: that was, indeed, charming but strange in the land of the slow-going Turk.

"Another institution, which I must mention before leaving sunny Beyrout, is the Ottoman Bank, which is lodged in a large quadrangular building near the quay. It is not only that one replenishes his exhausted purse in this establishment, but we get a whole budget of news from Europe, and, if one is lucky enough, to take Turkish coffee with the genial manager, Mr. Christian, we may come away with a complete knowledge of the Lebanon, its beauty, resources and history, since the days of the Crimea, up to the occupation of Cyprus by British troops."

OLD ST. PAUL'S

THE WILBERFORCE MEMORIAL CHURCH

The Church of St. Mary at Southampton, which is now in process of reconstruction as a memorial of the late Bishop of Winchester, of and which the Rev. Canon Wilberforce, a son of the deceased prelate, is rector, is situated in a very poor and densely crowded part of the town, where church accommodation is greatly needed. Canon Wilberforce was naturally anxious to connect the new building with the memory of his father, and was fortunate in securing the interest of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, by whom the dedication stone was laid on the 12th inst. The town was of course en fête. The Prince and Princess, with the two sailor Princes, came direct from Cowes, and were received on landing by the Corporation, and of course an address was presented. They then drove through the decorated streets to the church, where the Bishop of Winchester and Canon Wilberforce were awaiting them. These took part in the religious service which preceded the ceremony, and the proceedings were concluded by the presentation of subscription purses, which were brought up and laid upon the stone in front of the Prince by a number of ladies, some of whom were quite little girls. Their Royal Highnesses subsequently took tea with Canon and Mrs. Wilberforce, and on their way back to the pier, escorted as before by a troop of the Hampshire Yeomanry, they were again enthusiastically cheered. In the evening there were illuminations and fireworks, and Canon Wilberforce entertained the workmen employed on the building at dinner.

The total cost of the church will be 18,000*l*.; the portion now in course of erection, which will include chancel, chancel aisles, transept, and one bay of the nave, will cost 10,000*l*., of which 1,000*l*. is still wanting. The new structure is to be attached to the body of the old building until sufficient funds are collected for the completion of the whole work.

Order of the Indian Empire.——With reference to the announcement in our issue of last week respecting the Order of the Indian Empire, we take this opportunity of giving a correct list of the ordinary Companions of the Order, which, it should be stated, consists at present of only one class; the "Councillors of the Empress" (comprising the members of the Governor-General's Council, certain leading Indian Chiefs, Governors, and Lieutenant-Governors), being extraordinary members thereof:—Mir Mahmud, Khan of Khelat, L. S. Jackson, Esq.; Colonel Sir R. J. Meade, K.C.S.I.; Rao of Bedla; J. Muir, Esq.; D. Brandis, Esq.; Zemindar of Mandasa; C. A. Turner, Esq.; Mir Ali Khan, of Lus Beyla; G. C. Paul, Esq.; Chief of the Sarawan Brahuis; Lieutenant-Colonel O. T. Burne, C.S.I.; Chief of the Jhalawan Brahuis; R. K. Puckle, Esq.; Surgeon-Major W. Jameson; Syud Wilayut Ali Khan; Colonel W. G. Mainwaring; Rai Bahadur Rajendra Lala Mitra; Surgeon-General J. F. Beatson, M.D.; Deputy Surgeon General J. T. C. Ross; N. R. Pogson, Esq.; W. W. Hunter, Esq.; Colonel C. S. Hearn; Lieut.-Colonel E. C. S. Williams, R.E.; Rai Bahadur Kristodas Pal; Major-General A. Cunningham, R.E., C.S.I.; Rear Admiral J. Bythesea, C.B., V.C.; Morarji Gokuldass; Colonel B. Walton; Lieut.-Colonel H. Moore; Tiruvarur Muttuswami Aiyar; Colonel W. Gordon; Khan Bahadur Saleh Hindi; D. Graham, Esq.; Surgeon-Major T. G. Hewlett; Cettepaliem Ranga Charloo; Colonel C. M. Macgregor, C.S.I.; R. Berkeley Shaw, Esq.; J. G. Buhler, Esq.; Bapu Diva Shastri; P. Carnegy, Esq.; T. M. Gibbon, Esq.; E. R. Lethbridge, Esq.; Babu Bhudev Mukerji; G. Smith, Esq.; J. H. Rivett-Carnac, Esq.; Captain the Hon. G. C. Napier; R. Bocquet, Esq.; J. B. Knight, Esq.; Pundit Nain Singh. Officers of the Order: Secretary, A. C. Lyall, Esq.; Registrar, Sir A. W. Woods.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——On Monday, Mr. Mundella, M.P., delivered, or rather attempted to deliver, his annual address to his constituents at Sheffield. The meeting was held in the open-air in Paradise Square under the presidency of the Mayor. Some 12,000 persons were present, and, though Mr. Mundella's supporters were in the majority, the minority was sufficiently strong to render it impossible for any speaker to be heard. Howls, groans, and cheers, and all sorts of indescribable noises rent the air, and the confusion was at one time so great that the Mayor resorted to the extreme measure of naming the most prominent disturbers, who were youthful members of respectable families in the town. Mr. Mundella, after vainly endeavouring to obtain a fair hearing, addressed himself to the reporters, but his speech was brought to an abrupt conclusion by the increasing intensity of the clamour, but Mr. Mundella declared that he would attend every ward meeting, and insist upon a hearing. They had silenced his voice in a discreditable manner, but they should have it five times as much. A vote of confidence was declared by the Mayor to be carried, but this decision was loudly disputed by his opponents, who intend holding a meeting on their own account on Monday next.—On Tuesday Mr. Mundella received a deputation from the Sheffield Butchers' Association, who presented him with a vote of thanks for his successful action with regard to the Government Cattle Bill. In replying, he referred to the improvement which had been effected in the measure during its passage through Parliament, and said that the result would be a large supply of foreign cattle at a reasonable price. Had the Bill passed as introduced, meat would have reached famine prices.—Speaking at an agricultural dinner at Whitehaven on Tuesday, the Right Hon. G. A. F. Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., said that the fact of the Government having done so little of late was not entirely due to the Irish Obstructionists. It was the young members who were to blame. New men should listen, and try to learn the business of Parliament as far as possible, but it appeared to be the aim of every one to see how soon he could talk; how soon his speeches could be taken down by shorthand writers, and how soon he could get them transmitted to his constituents. When remonstrated with for so doing, these young members replied, "My constituents will think nothing of me if I cannot make a speech." He advised them to give it up, and do as their forefathers had done—wait, and only address the House upon what they knew something about. Then they would be listened to with respect, and it would be for the public good.—Lord Dartmouth has written a letter to the Daily News in response to the challenge thrown out by Mr. Joseph Arch, to which we referred last week. His lordship says that although he cannot fix the exact date, he has a distinct recollection of letters appearing in The Times, in which Mr. Arch either wrote, or was reported to have publicly spoken, to the effect that if the farmers employed more agricultural machinery the result would be a revolution, and wrote or said exactly the contrary within a few days, thereby causing the other correspondent of The Times to inquire whether he was to believe his eyes or his ears. In a subsequent letter his lordship gives the date of the publication of these letters, with extracts from them justifying his original statement.—The result of the election at Newcastle-under-Lyne has taken both parties by surprise. The late member, Sir E. Buckley, did not resign until the last moment, and the Liberals were so unprepared for a contest that it was thought the seat would be uncontested, the Conservatives, of course, having their candidate ready in the person of Mr. Donaldson Hudson. The Liberals were beginning to despair, but Mr. Rathbone Edge came to the rescue, and has beaten his opponent by 1,330 votes to 990. The borough has never before had two Liberal members. The election caused excitement, and when the figures were declared the victors manifested their enthusiasm in a very boisterous manner.—The polling for the county of Argyle took place on Tuesday amid much excitement. On Wednesday, after the votes were counted Lord Colin Campbell, the Liberal candidate, was found to have polled 1,462, against Colonel Malcolm's 1,107.—Major O'Gorman has, since his return to Waterford, stated that he will not again seek the representation of the constituency.—The rumour that Mr. Plimsoll was about to retire from Parliament is said to be without foundation.

THE DISBANDED RESERVES.——On Tuesday Lord Shaftesbury presided at a meeting of the Committee of British Hospitallers, held to consider the means that ought to be adopted for the assistance of the men who have been reduced to necessity through their engagement in the Reserve forces. Resolutions were passed to the effect that the alacrity with which the men of the Reserve forces had responded to the call to arms deserved national recognition, and that it devolved upon the nation at large to see that they were rewarded by at least being enabled to regain their former positions. A Relief Committee was formed to collect subscriptions.—On Wednesday a number of the Reserve men attended at the Guildhall and made statements concerning the Relief Committee, which we sincerely hope are not true. The spokesman of the party declared that he had mixed with 3,800 Reserve men, and knew of none who had received any money relief. He himself had been twelve times to the office, and got nothing but a small quantity of provisions. Alderman Figgins expressed sympathy with the men, and gave each member of the deputation 5*s.*; but expressed no opinion as to the conduct of the Relief Committee, which, we hope, will be inquired into without delay. Such names as Miss Nightingale, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Marquis of Exeter, and Lord Ashley, who are among the patrons, ought to be a guarantee that public confidence is not misplaced.

MISCELLANEOUS.——Experiments with war-balloons have been commenced at Woolwich, and will be continued for several months. The War Department has appointed a Select Balloon Committee, consisting of Colonel Nugent, R.E.; Professor Abel, Chemical Department, Royal Arsenal; Colonel Noble, Director of Works; and Lieutenant Watson, R.E.; and if their report is satisfactory, war-balloons will be adopted into the service, balloon-trains established, and officers of the Engineers instructed in their use. One feature of the experiment will be the floating of five balloons at one time over London, at distances of five miles, and the trial of a system of communication by signals.—On Wednesday the Eurydice was successfully moved on to her port side, and during the operation twelve more bodies came to the surface. The starboard side of the hull has been damaged by resting on the fluke of an anchor. On the same day the court-martial was opened on board the Duke of Wellington flagship, Admiral Fanshawe presiding. The two survivors, Benjamin Cuddeford, able seaman, and Sydney Fletcher, ordinary seaman, were formally placed upon their trial; but as soon as they had given their evidence they were discharged, and other evidence was gone into, the avowed object being to assign an acceptable reason for a sailing frigate of previous good reputation suddenly heeling over and settling down with 308 out of 310 of the ship's company on board. The proceedings are expected to last several days. Admiral Fanshawe has issued a circular expressing his unqualified admiration of the skill, energy, and determination with which the raising of the vessel has been accomplished by Admiral-Superintendent Foley and the officers under his orders, and the cheerfulness and patience shown by divers, seamen, and other workmen who have been employed.—Operations have been commenced with the view of raising the Grosser Kurfurst. On Monday one of the divers, who had remained one hour and a half below water, had a fit of apoplexy immediately after his dress was taken off. He became totally unconscious, and died soon after.—On Thursday last week Lord Sandon opened a new branch of the Liverpool Sailors' Home, and afterwards distributed the prizes on board the training ship Indefatigable. His lordship, addressing the boys, advised them to do their duty to the utmost, in the firm conviction that they would not go unrewarded. Eulogising the noble character of the institution, he said, "We hear of reformatory ships in rather large numbers, but ships for lads of untainted character are very few; and how pleasant it is to think that the lads we see before us are lads of unspotted character, whose only misfortune in life is that before they came on board this ship they had not many friends and were not very well to do in the world."—The storm of Saturday last did much damage in various parts of the country. In many parts of London the houses and streets were flooded. In Bishopsgate Street two men were killed and several others seriously injured, by the collapse of a newly-built arch beneath which they had taken shelter from the rain. At Peckham, a servant girl was struck blind by lightning; and at Nottingham three persons were drowned while attempting to land from a boat which was capsized by the breaking away of the river bank, which had been undermined by the floods caused by the recent heavy rains.—Two fatal fires, attended by circumstances of more than usual distressing character, occurred on Monday. At Hackney two young children were burnt to death in a room in which they had been locked by their mother whilst she went on an errand. A lodger forced the door, but was beaten back by the flames and smoke, and the firemen, who got in through the window, were badly scorched. A woman who lived in a room above, jumped from the window and injured her spine in the fall. The other fire, which was attended with the loss of four lives, occurred at Birmingham. There was considerable delay in the arrival of the fire-escape, and the ladders placed against the house did not reach to the window at which Mr. Dennison and his wife were standing, and only Mr. Dennison was able to descend. When the fire-escape arrived a policeman mounted it and took Mrs. Dennison's infant from her, but let it fall in descending, and it subsequently died from its injuries. The fire escape took fire, and Mrs. Dennison fell into the street and was killed. A sister of Mrs. Dennison and a servant were burnt to death. Several persons displayed great bravery in their endeavours to save the inmates of the house, and some of them sustained severe injuries; but the police appear to have been utterly powerless to maintain order, the crowd being so panic-stricken that, although Mrs. Dennison threw out blankets, and asked that they might be held for her to jump into, the request was not complied with.—On Saturday a coal-laden steamer, which started from Cardiff on the previous day, put into Falmouth in a disabled condition, the result of the explosion of her cargo, which had been battened down while wet. The captain was killed, and several of the crew badly injured.—The Shakers are still upon the highway at Hordle, although a gentleman has lent them a field to cook in. Mrs. Girling was taken before the magistrate on Saturday, and ordered to remove her goods within a few days. On Sunday a Wesleyan minister paid her a visit, and tried, of course in vain, to persuade her to rejoin the denomination of which she formerly belonged. None of her followers have seceded since the eviction, although they are in great distress and have no shelter. Mrs. Girling ascribes to a special interposition of Providence the fact that the storm did not visit the district.—On Saturday Mr. Charles Maples, of Liverpool, who has frequently contributed sketches of current events in that city to the pages of The Graphic, was drowned while bathing at Rhyl, where he and his family had been staying some weeks. He was drowned within a few yards of the pier, and in view of many promenaders. A man on horseback tried to rescue him, but unfortunately failed in his efforts.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——The old Royal City of York has witnessed during the week an almost unprecedented gathering of Turfites, gentle and simple, giving ample evidence that the county of broad acres still adheres most faithfully to its love of horseflesh and racing. To see the latter, and to hear the latest news re the St. Leger, Turf magnates in shoals left their shooting-boxes in Scotland and their yachts on the south coast. Little, if anything, was wanting to make the meeting a most enjoyable one, the weather being fine, the course good going, the class of horses competing above the average, and the racing certainly first-rate. Some special excitement, too, was added to the first day in the shape of the hearing by the Jockey Club of the objections raised to two horses belonging to Mr. Bowes, which had recently won races, on the ground that, having been entered by Mr. Bowes' head man, who is in the forfeit list, they were disqualified. It certainly seemed a rather ungenerous objection to make, as Mr. Peart only acted as the agent of Mr. Bowes, as he has done for years, and it is some satisfaction to know that the Turf authorities had no difficulty in dismissing it as untenable. A contrary decision, it is hardly necessary to say, would have been a flagrant outrage on common sense. The first race was a terrible blow to backers, as Glengarry, whom many fancied for the Leger after his display at Ascot, was beaten in the Produce Stakes, though the odds of 100 to 15 were laid on him, and he had Fordham on his back. Immediately afterwards almost any odds could have been had against him for the Doncaster race. In the Yorkshire Oaks Lord Falmouth's Jannette, with 4 to 1 on her, won in a canter from Strathfleet and Carrillon, and became a better favourite for the Leger, treading very closely on the heels of Beauclerc. His lordship, however, had to put up with a second in the Convivial for Two-Year-Olds, as his Ringleader, though made a hot favourite, could not beat Mr. J. Dawson's Falmouth, who showed such good form last week, and established Glenlyon's reputation as a sire though he never carried silk. But on the next day his lordship had his revenge, for his Wheel of Fortune, evidently "the flying filly" of the season, beat Falmouth by half-a-length. They both carried a 7lbs. penalty in a field of thirteen for the Prince of Wales's Stakes; and in the pair we probably have the best colt and filly among the two-year-olds yet shown. Major Stapylton, who keeps a small but select stud, scored twice on the Tuesday with Swordknot and Star and Garter, and Mr. Gee, with Claudius, took the Biennial. The Great Ebor Handicap brought eleven to the post, Strathmore, Jagellon, and Caerau being most fancied in the order named. After a fine race the last-mentioned beat Jagellon by a head. At the close of the day's racing Beauclerc became a better favourite for the Leger, and, as we noted last week, he will see very short odds indeed if he comes sound to the post after a good preparation.

CRICKET.——The cricket of the Kent men seems rather variable, for after showing most favourably against Surrey at the Oval, they received a one-innings and 56-runs' defeat at the hands of Lancashire. For the latter Barlow and Royle made 43 and 81; but no large score is to be recorded on the side of Kent.—Lancashire, however, has fallen an easy victim to Gloucestershire at Clifton, the latter winning by eight wickets, owing mainly to the excellent bowling of Mr. W. G. Grace and Mr. Gilbert. In the two innings the latter took nine wickets for 106 runs.—Surrey has again gone to the wall in the return match with Notts, who won by 139 runs. The Surrey men in their two innings only put together 53 and 92. The Australians continue their victorious career, and seem to improve as the time draws on for their departure. The Eighteen of Scarborough had no chance with them, being defeated by one innings and 46 runs. Spofforth, whose bowling seems now at its best, took twelve wickets for 111 runs, and with his bat made 64.—A still more meritorious performance was the Australian victory over Eighteen of Hastings and District, who were also beaten in one innings with 47 runs to spare. This is perhaps the best game our visitors have played, when it is noted that among the Hastings team were the crack Kent players, Lord Harris, the Hon. Ivo Bligh, F. Penn, and J. Cunliffe. For the Australians Bailey made 106. Spofforth's bowling was irresistible. In one over he bowled three wickets in succession, and in five overs obtained nine wickets for 7 runs.—The Australians commence a match on Monday next against "the Players" at the Oval, but there seems a little difficulty in arranging the team of the latter.

AQUATICS.——The North country oarsmen, Boyd, Lumsden, Nicholson, and Elliott, have arrived in London to take part in the Thames International Regatta, at which they will be opposed by two crack London fours. News comes that Trickett, the Australian sculler, has so far recovered from his accident as to have been out in his boat.

YACHTING.——At the Torbay Regatta, the Jullanar has scored another victory in the Schooners' and Yawls' (forty-one tons and upwards) race, the Florinda being second. The Cutters' (not exceeding forty-one tons) match fell to the Myosotis, while the Maggie took the prize for the smaller vessels.

A NEW ORDER FOR LADIES has been founded by the Sultan. It is entitled the "Nishan Shefakat," and has been offered to Mrs. Layard, but Lord Salisbury has declined to authorise her to accept it.

Scraps

AN INTERNATIONAL ART EXHIBITION will henceforth be held at Munich every four years, beginning with 1879.

SIGNOR VERDI IS WRITING A NEW OPERA—Montezuma. The work will be in five acts, and will be produced at the Scala, Milan.

A MAMMOTH has been found at Bois de la Batie, near Geneva. No such fossil has been discovered in the Canton since 1786.

"ENGAGEMENT BRACELETS" are amongst the latest fashionable novelties across the Atlantic. They are fitted with combination locks, of which the husband in prospective keeps the key.

A RAILWAY IN THE HOLY LAND will soon be an accomplished fact, according to the Constantinople Al-Jawaib, which states that a mixed company has obtained a concession for laying down a railway between Jaffa and Jerusalem.

MONT BLANC has at last been ascended from the Italian side, and four Italian Alpine excursionists, MM. Vaccarone, Costa, Nigra, and Broschi, have succeeded in reaching the summit from that quarter, an achievement which has hitherto been attempted in vain. They descended, however, on the French side.

THE PARIS "FIGARO" of late has shown a very fair knowledge of England and things English, but its London correspondent, in translating the humorous bill of fare of the recent Ministerial whitebait dinner, cannot conceive why the guests should be bidden to eat after "Ye Hungarie Manner," which he renders as à la Hongroise. "Pray, how do the Hungarians eat!" he asks.

A CURIOUS NAVAL RELIC is lying off Monterey, California, where at low water may be seen a part of the wreck of a vessel, formerly the Natalie, the ship on which Napoleon Bonaparte escaped from Elba sixty-three years ago. The old vessel, now slowly going to pieces in the Pacific, brought to California, in 1834, from Mexico, the colony of Hijar, whose members intended to settle in what was then Sonoma County. Not liking Sonoma, they returned to Monterey, where, like the vessel, they have gradually broken up.

OPIUM CULTURE in India does not appear to suit British energy, if we are to believe the Times of India, which remarks that John Bull has been growing opium at Bodicote, near Banbury; but, unlike the Indian cultivator, does not appear to think that the finest occupation in the world is to squat on his haunches for the livelong day and scrape poppy heads. He has shaken his head, and declared that if somebody does not invent something to do all that sort of thing by steam, he will have no more to do with it. So, after all, a propensity for sitting still at the lowest possible charge is a qualification not without value.

LONDON MORTALITY further decreased last week, and 1,411 deaths were registered against 1,517 during the previous seven days, a decline of 84, being 75 below the average, and at the rate of 20·9 per 1,000. There were 74 deaths from whooping-cough (an increase of 14, exceeding the average by 38), 201 from diarrhœa (a decrease of 67), 131 being children under one year of age, 10 from small-pox, 24 from scarlet fever (a decline of 3), 10 from measles, 16 from different forms of fever (a decline of 2). There were 2,491 births registered against 2,451 during the previous week, exceeding the average by 145. The mean temperature was 61·5 deg., or 0·7 deg. above the average. The duration of sunshine during the week was 21·5 hours, the sun being 99·4 hours above the horizon.

A CURIOUS VERSION OF RIP VAN WINKLE exists in a Japan legend:—"A young man fishing in his boat on the ocean was invited by the goddess of the sea to her home beneath the waves. After three days he desired to see his old father and mother. On parting she gave him a golden casket and a key, but begged him never to open it. At the village where he lived all was changed, and he could get no trace of his parents until an aged woman recollected of hearing their names. He found their graves a hundred years old. Thinking that three days could not have such a change, and that he was under a spell, he opened the casket. A white vapour rose, and under its influence the young man fell to the ground. His hair turned grey, his form lost its youth, and in a few moments he died of old age."

THE SUCCESS OF THE REPUBLIC IN FRANCE seems somewhat to have soured the temper of a certain verger of Nôtre Dame, who, according to a correspondent of the Daily News, while showing a party of sightseers over the cathedral, instead of pointing out the objects which all had paid to see, went off into a tedious diatribe against the Republic. An Englishman of the party remarked, hoping to put an end to the philippic, "Why talk against the Government of your country? Why, I see 'Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity,' on your own portal." The whole party cried, "Hear, hear." The verger angrily replied, "That formula is a lie! There can be no such thing as liberty, equality, and fraternity. Unless you were a Communard you would not object to my observations. Communards have no business here."

THE COLONY OF VICTORIA AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION has a special interest in collecting hints and suggestions for its own International Exhibition which is to be held at Melbourne in 1880. To interest the French as well as the British public in the coming "world's fair," the Illustrated Australasian News has brought out an entertaining special number for the Paris Exhibition, containing some excellent views of Melbourne and the other principal towns of the colony, in addition to sketches of various local industries and manufactures. Amongst the engravings a large panoramic view of Melbourne and a reproduction of the successful design for the Exhibition buildings are particularly noteworthy. The accompanying letterpress gives a brief history of the Colony, its climate, institutions, and the advantages offered to colonists, besides describing the illustrations, and is in both French and English, with a few brief notes in German and Italian.

AN URGENT APPEAL for disused books and periodicals for seamen has been forwarded to us by Commander William Dawson, R.N., who writes:—"Merchant ships going to sea require many thousands of books, pictorial papers, &c., weekly. Thanks to the press 80,777 second-hand books, magazines, and illustrated papers have been placed on board ships within the year by the Missions to Seamen Society, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C., having been sent to this office in sacks, hampers, or boxes, by rail or carrier, by those who read your paragraph. These include 2,800 disused bibles and prayer books, and 9,205 hymn-books, which are very useful for services at sea, and many thousand Graphics. Our supply is, however, exhausted, and our fifty-eight lay chaplains and fifty-five chaplains and readers working afloat in forty-three harbours and roadsteads would be thankful if your readers would place our small book [illegible] on their church boards, and collect old books and Graphics from their neighbours for seamen."

CHAPTER XVII.

"YOU must not imagine that I was asleep all the while in the Church of the Madonna di Quintiliolo," said Signor Sandro, puffing away very contentedly at a long, thin, black cigar, with a straw in the middle of it, which he had the bad taste to prefer to one of Mr. Rutherford's good Havanas. The latter would not smoke, but sipped his tea, and declared it excellent. It was so sweet and mild an evening that we had left one of the windows open which looked into the tangled, weed-grown garden, and the last beams of the setting sun poured into the room with a warm and golden lustre. They burnished Lucy's wavy curls as she lay on the couch, and brought out the delicate beauty of a bunch of hyacinths which stood in an earthenware pitcher on the table near her. They transfigured even the S'ora Nanna's hideous blue and yellow wall paper, and the bare brick-floored room with its rare scraps of common drugget disposed here and there, and its spindle-shanked stiff chairs, covered with faded red worsted damask, until the whole had somehow an air of pleasantness and peace. And it was all the doing of the blessed sunshine! Or nearly all: for Mr. Rutherford remarked that the place had a home-like look, which he attributed to our influence,—Lucy's and mine. The effect was attained by very simple means, at any rate. Two or three books, the dainty white hyacinths in their brown pitcher, a few of my sketches pinned against the wall, a clean white cloth on the tea-table, and Lucy's tortoise-shell work-case with her mite of a silver thimble in a separate little velvet house of its own, were all the materials we had at command in the way of decorative furniture. But I have wandered away from Signor Sandro's remark, with which I began this chapter.

"No," said he again; "I didn't sleep above a quarter of an hour by my watch."

"And what were you doing then, Professor?" asked Mr. Rutherford.

"Why, I got into conversation with the sacristan, a talkative fellow who seemed to like to let his tongue wag. He does not very often have the chance of a chat out there, I dare say; and what do you think he told me?"

"That he wanted a franc, I suppose; at least that's what those fellows generally tell me—unless when they want two!"

"Dear Rodolfo, he knew better. I'm not a foreigner—and, moreover, I'm a poor devil—and, moreover, I'm an artist—all of which my friend the sacristan knew very well. No, not, not a word did the fellow say about francs; I should have liked to catch him at it. I gave him six soldi to get a draught of wine, and he thought himself well off, I promise you."

"But, Signor Sandro, what did he tell you? I was in hopes we were going to have a story," said Lucy.

"Ay," returned my Master, "it is a story, and—"

"Stop, stop!" cried Lucy, clapping her hands, "we must hear it properly. Catherine, do get S'ora Nanna to clear away the tea-cups before Signor Sandro begins, or she'll come stamping in in the middle; and then, please to give me my sewing. I always enjoy a story better when my fingers are busy. There's a dear Catherine. And you take your knitting and look comfortable and home-y. Signor Sandro has his cigar, and, besides, he is the story-teller; but you, Mr. Rutherford—what shall you do?"

"I will turn over those sketches if I may. I can listen and look at the same time; that is, if Miss Wilson will permit?"

"I permit, Mr. Rutherford," said Lucy; "as to Catherine, she will tell you her sketches are not worth looking at if you ask her. I mean to have everything my own way this evening." Then with a sudden submissive look like that of a little child, she put out her hand to me and said, "You don't really mind, do you, Catty dear?"

What a sweet winning creature she was! I caught an expression in Mr. Rutherford's face as he looked over at us, which seemed to show that he thought her so, at all events. But he withdrew his eyes when they met mine, and began to turn over the portfolio full of my sketches—a very heterogeneous collection.

"Well now," said Signor Sandro, good-naturedly humouring Lucy's fancy, "now for the story! The sacristan at the Madonna di Quintiliolo told me that the folks about Olevano have been in a great fright and fuss lately in consequence of the appearance in their neighbourhood of—what do you think?"

"Phylloxera in the grape-vines? Cattle plague?" suggested Rutherford.

"Che! Another guess matter, than grape disease or cattle-plague. Brigands, my friend! Brigands, with guns and pistols and knives in their belts. What think you of that for a 'sensation,' eh?"

"Brigands near Olevano, Signor Sandro?" cried Lucy; "oh, I can't believe it!"

"Well, it's very startling, but not altogether unheard of. Some years ago—oh, it may be ten, or fifteen, the time flies so swiftly—there were three or four fellows who committed robberies thereabouts. They had come up from the Abruzzi, having by some miracle been hunted out in earnest by the gendarmes there. And so they gave the folks at Olevano a taste of their quality; but I don't think they found it altogether a favourable place for their exploits."

"Not a happy hunting-ground, eh?" said Rutherford.

"Why, no; they got peppered by a couple of dare-devil painters—an Englishman and a German—who laid a sort of trap for them, and enticed them into the garden of a house they thought empty, and which they meant to rob, and then fired on them from the windows. Since that time I have always heard that the neighbourhood of Olevano was as safe as the Piazza di Spagna."

"But is it sure," said I, "that the sacristan was not exaggerating or romancing? What grounds had he to go on?"

"Exaggerating? Oh, I suppose he was exaggerating; doubtless he was not speaking the exact, simple, severe truth, like one of your Quakers (by which Signor Sandro meant Quakeress), but there is something in it. He spoke of a band of marauders armed to the teeth; now that may mean three or four—or perhaps even no more than one or two—ruffians with a knife apiece, and a rusty pistol among them. But still, that robbers have been about among the hills is certain. The sacristan gave me chapter and verse: Prince [illegible] father was stopped as he was driving home in his little calessino,* and robbed in broad daylight."

"Miss Wilson looks really fatigued," said Rutherford, suddenly. "I reproach myself with having lured her so long after a tiring day."

Lucy turned her head towards me, and exclaimed, "Catherine, dear, what is the matter? You are deadly pale!"

"Are you not well?" asked Rutherford, whose voice had caught an echo of the anxiety expressed in Lucy's.

"Yes, I am quite well—perfectly well; and if I look pale I cannot help it! It is the strong sunlight, perhaps."

I was vexed that the sudden shock of surprise and alarm which I had felt on hearing of the robbers, should have betrayed itself in my face. Not that I had the smallest personal apprehension with regard to them, but the thought rushed into my mind at once that Monica's brother must be connected with these lawless vagabonds, and that their presence in the neighbourhood of Olevano but too clearly accounted for his return to these parts. After a minute or so I remembered that Monica had told me her brother was going away immediately. By this time he was probably away far from Tivoli, and if my surmise of his being connected with the brigands were correct, he had doubtless gone off with them to a considerable distance. After such an exploit as robbing Prince [illegible] agent, they were not likely to remain in the immediate neighbourhood.

"Why, Caterina," said my master, taking his cigar out of [illegible] mouth, and looking at me with intently knitted brows, "you're not made nervous by my story, are you? Per Giove! I didn't know you could be frightened! But it looks like it, I declare. Lucia is as bold as a lion in comparison."

* A light, two-wheeled vehicle in use among the [illegible]

"I'm not at all ambitious of being supposed impervious to fear, Master; but, as I am neither Prince Pozzodoro—nor Prince Pozzodoro's fattore—I see no particular reason why I should dread the robbers. They would never be stupid enough to carry me off, for no one would ransom me who could, and no one could who would!"

"Then you are tired, my daughter, for you look very white and fagged."

"Not a bit, Master, not a bit! Pray don't let any one suppose that our pleasant excursion has done me anything but good."

Mr. Rutherford had already risen to go away, but I saw so much loving anxiety on my account in Lucy's face, that I exerted myself to induce him and Signor Sandro to remain. Lucy had a mandoline which she played, and I got it down, and to its accompaniment she and I sang one or two little duets, popular songs of Naples and Tuscany. Then Lucy insisted on my singing alone some pathetic old Scotch ballads which she liked. And Signor Sandro shook his head and declared that such ditties sounded only like "roba da chiesa," as who should say "psalm tunes," and that there was no melody or beauty in them at all; and he begged us to wind up with "Santa Lucia," in order that he might go away with some pleasant sounds in his ears, and he and Mr. Rutherford (who had a good mellow baritone voice) joined in the chorus, and so our evening ended very harmoniously, and even gaily, after all.

I was astonished, on thinking over it, after Lucy had gone to bed, at the quickness with which she had glided into the manners of friendly intimacy with Rutherford. He seemed to have some spell to pierce the cloud of sadness which had dimmed her bright face during these last weary weeks. She not only talked with him and listened to him, but even smiled on him with somewhat of her old sunny, happy look. In a word she seemed perfectly at her ease with him—she who was so shy with strangers at her best and who lately had almost trembled at the sight of a strange face. Might there be a hope that this Englishman should drive away the image of Don Vittorio from her mind like a bad dream?

Early the next morning, before Lucy was dressed, there came a basket full of wild flowers and ferns, with the compliments of the "Signore Inglese." He must have been far afield and betimes, to gather them. They were covered with dew, and so exquisitely fragrant that they perfumed all the room when I set them in front of my sister's place at the breakfast table. Whilst I waited for her to come down I sketched them in water-colours on a scrap of paper. And as I took the portraits of the sweet fragile blossoms, I said to myself half involuntarily, "Surely, surely, something more than mere civility and politeness has moved this man to take so much trouble, and pay her so delicate an attention."

CHAPTER XVIII.

We had settled among ourselves to make the promised excursion to Monte Gennaro and Horace's Sabine farm at the end of that week. Monica had sent word of our coming to her aunt at Licenza, and the ponies were ordered to carry us up the mountain. The weather continued to be delightful, and to grow more delightful day by day, and I for one looked forward to our little journey with the pleasantest anticipations. Mr. Rutherford, meanwhile, took the opportunity of paying a visit of a few days to Rome.

Our trip was to be made on Saturday. On the previous Thursday morning I received a packet and a letter, both forwarded to me from Rome by the landlady of our lodgings there. For a moment I looked at the packet with some curiosity, but almost immediately I guessed by its shape what it contained, and my guess was right. It contained a pair of hand-screens such as those I had done for the famous bazaar, which Donna Laura's friend, Madame de Clavigny, had commissioned me to paint for her. I had finished, and sent them to her just before starting for Tivoli; and, to say the truth, had reckoned on the price of them to pay part of our expenses there. Now, here they were returned on my hands, without a word of explanation save a message pencilled on the outside of the parcel, saying merely that Madame de Clavigny must decline to receive the screens. "This is the Princess Olympia's doing," thought I. I had half a mind to insist that Madame de Clavigny should pay me for my work, which had been executed in accordance with her express directions. But I reflected that I had no written order to show, and that my bare word as to the nature of the bargain would avail me but little.

Together with the parcel had come a note, as I have said. It was addressed to "Miss Wilson," in an English handwriting, and bore a huge and undecipherable monogram, blazing with gold and scarlet. On opening it I found it was meant for Lucy. These were its contents:—

"Mrs. Ranville Egmont Jones regrets that the result of her inquiries from the ladies referred to is not such as to induce her to engage Miss Wilson as daily governess for her daughters."

"Number two!" thought I. The "ladies referred to" were the Princess Corleoni and a certain Mrs. Elphinstone, a great friend of the Princess; and the lady who wrote the note and bore the title of Mrs. Ranville Egmont Jones had nearly settled to give poor Lucy a six weeks' engagement beginning at Easter. Her change of intention was also clearly owing to the influence of the Princess Olympia.

I cared little for the loss of Lucy's promised pupils. My sister would scarcely be strong enough by Easter to undertake giving regular lessons. But I could not help being struck by the immediate fulfilment of Signor Sandro's prophecy that the Princess would do her best to ruin us and drive us out of Rome. "And truly," I thought, "if we were living in the 'good old times' which I have heard Mrs. Elphinstone affect so much to regret, the Princess might probably succeed in her endeavour. As it is, I think she is biting a file."

Nevertheless the whole matter vexed me, because I knew it would hurt Lucy's sensitive and affectionate spirit. There was a great comfort, however, in reflecting that by good luck the first shock of these new annoyances had fallen on me rather than on my sister. Lucy need know nothing about them until she was stronger and more cheerful, and until the lapse of time should have taken away much of their power to hurt her. I was again surprised, and almost ashamed, to find how inevitably the image of Mr. Rutherford came into my visions of brighter days in store for Lucy. However, I reflected that my visions could do no harm so long as I kept them to myself, which I was very resolutely minded to do.

Apart from Lucy's trouble—if any portion of my life could be apart from her sorrow—I had reason to be content and cheerful. Signor Sandro had given me what from him was high praise for my study of Monica, and had encouraged me to set to work on the picture I had conceived, whilst he was near at hand to help me with his advice. I had sent two very small and unpretending works to an Art Exhibition held in my native town, and just after Signor Sandro's arrival in Tivoli I had got a letter from the secretary telling me that not only were my pictures accepted, but had both been sold on the first day that the exhibition was opened to the public. Altogether I had much to give me serenity for the present and hopefulness for the future.

I was alone in my studio, and had begun to sketch in the first outlines of my picture. It was a delicious Spring morning. The perfume of violets and the cheerful chirp and twitter of little birds came in at the open window; and as I worked I hummed to myself an old-fashioned ballad about the "Miller's Daughter on the Banks of Allan Water." What with the chirp of the birds and my own singing, I did not hear the opening of the door, but some one entered and advanced close to the easel, and, looking up, I found myself face to face with the Princess Corleoni. She was dressed in black, and had a black lace veil thrown back over her close bonnet and fastened beneath her chin;—a style of head-dress which did not soften the masculine severity of her outline. Her skin was sallower than ever, her brilliant eyes somewhat sunken, her whole aspect expressive of harassed anxiety and angry discontent.

I was amazed to see her there, and no doubt I looked so, for she said, "I do not wonder that you are surprised. Of course you are surprised. I wish to have a few words with you in private."

All my smouldering indignation flamed up at the sight of her haughty face, and the sound of her arrogant voice. "I do not wish to speak with you," I said. "I think you have behaved with great harshness and cruelty. Only this moment I have received proofs of your persecuting spirit towards my sister and me. I have my bread to earn, Madam, and I refuse to give up my working hours to you, or to allow you to disturb my mind and make me unfit to work at all."

She was evidently unprepared for this, and stood looking at me irresolutely, like one who has received an unexpected check, and is deliberating on the next move to be made. I turned to my canvas and went on sketching, though with a very uncertain hand, it must be owned.

"Do you absolutely refuse to speak with me, then?" asked the Princess, after a pause. "I have come from Rome on purpose to have an interview with you, Miss Wilson."

I laid down my brush, and placed a chair for her. "Be pleased to be brief, Madam," I said.

"Will you not sit?" she asked.

"No."

"I must avail myself of your offer of a chair; for I have had a great many troubles to shake me of late, and to remind me that my prime of life is past, and that old age is overtaking me quickly."

She was not old in years,—scarcely fifty, I believe; yet it was true that she was greatly changed and aged within the last few weeks. I stood opposite to her, partly leaning against the empty terra-cotta stove, and waited until she should speak again.

"You are feeling angry with me," she said, beginning with a slight effort, "because of that letter which I wrote to your sister. Monsignor Chiappaforte told me how angry you were."

"I should have thought there needed no one to tell you that, Signora Principessa. Your letter was intended to hurt and wound."

"You do me wrong!—But I have not come to talk of that. Only—I must say this one word: I wrote as I did because I considered it to be my duty. It was a painful duty, although you probably may refuse to believe it."

"No doubt it must have been painful to confess your son's bad conduct. For no amount of casuistry can prevent your seeing that he behaved treacherously—even if not to Lucy, at least to you. I say, to both."

She passed her hand wearily across her forehead, and made this unexpected answer: "He is behaving badly to me now; very badly, undutifully, cruelly! Miss Wilson, I have come to ask you to help me to bring him back to his home and his duty."

I was so utterly taken aback by this, that I literally could not answer her, but stared at her with a passing suspicion that she had lost her reason. What could have happened to bring the Princess Olympia to me with such a petition? She did not keep silence long. Reserve was unnatural to her, as to most of her compatriots. She could, and did, assume it on occasions, and for certain definite ends; but it never was the result of any shyness in displaying her emotions to the world. And now, moreover, she was evidently, as she had said herself, shaken by trouble, and eager to gain assistance in prosecuting her purpose, even at some cost of dignity.

"You know that my son has quarrelled with me?" she said.

I answered that I had not known it, nor had heard anything about him for some time past. Upon this she looked so incredulous that I repeated my statement emphatically.

"Oh, yes," she continued, speaking in a rapid, excited way, "he has quarrelled with me—with me—the mother who has devoted herself to his best interests ever since his birth. And in his anger with me he has chosen to offend the Campograssos. His marriage will be broken off, after all the years of thought, and care, and pains I have expended on the alliance. I have had it in view ever since little Clelia Campograsso was ten years old! You must have heard of it," she continued with growing agitation. "Although the engagement was not yet formally announced, all Rome knew that they were intended for each other!"

She doubtless believed what she said; for the extension of the social horizon which had come to pass in these latter years by the mere influx of population from all parts of Italy to the capital was unrecognised by her and her immediate friends. They lived on in their narrow and self-imposed limits, supposing themselves to be still the focus and central point of Roman life.

"And how does all this concern me, Madam?" said I, when she had made an end.

"Gran Dio!" she exclaimed, getting up and walking about the room, with quick irregular steps, "could any human being have believed in such phlegm, such indifference? Are they made of stucco, then, these English?"

As she spoke, the door opened and in came Signor Sandro, who stopped short on seeing a stranger. He did not recognise his beautiful Princess Olympia of former days. But she knew him instantly, and hailed him by name. "Ah, Santi, is that you? Come in, come in. Shut the door. Fasten it. I don't mind you, but I want no one else to interrupt us."

Even when she spoke, he was evidently at a loss to know who she was. But a certain little imperious gesture of the hand, with which she bade him shut the door, seemed suddenly to recall her to his memory. It was a habitual gesture with her, and a characteristic one.

"Donna Olympia!" he exclaimed, looking from her to me in undisguised astonishment.

"Ah, you didn't know me at first? I am changed, of course. Years, Santi, years change us all;—and sorrows."

"Your life has not had a great share of sorrow, Donna Olympia—Principessa, I should say," returned Signor Sandro. He kept looking at her as if he were trying to discern the beautiful young Olympia of long ago in this faded, haggard, harsh-browed woman.

"Not a large share of sorrows! We have had sorrows enough for a century within the last few years! We have seen revolution and irreligion and blasphemy triumphing over all that is sacred. Injustice and oppression rule in high places. Souls are decoyed to perdition. Our sovereign is despoiled and imprisoned. Ah, Santi, I should think that many of those who entered on this path of ruin with the cry of patriotism and liberty in their mouths must bitterly repent their error by this time!"

"We won't talk about these things, Principessa," said my master, with a gentleness and moderation I had scarcely expected from him. But I almost fancy that some suspicion of the Princess's sanity flashed across his mind, as it had flashed across mine. Her appearance in my studio was so utterly unexpected and surprising, her manner was so excited, that the suspicion was really not unnatural.

However, after a minute or so she seated herself, and, assuming a more collected demeanour, began to repeat to Signor Sandro what she had told me as to her son's quarrel with her and her fear lest his marriage engagement should be broken. She entered into fuller details respecting the latter than she had given to me; pointing out how she had negotiated and manœuvred and schemed to bring the engagement to pass; how the great wealth of the Campograssos made them presumptuous and exigent, and difficult to deal with; with what masterly policy she (the Princess) had overruled all objections and got rid of all difficulties in order to secure the heiress for her son; and how all her admirable combinations had been threatened with utter ruin by the sudden and lamentable rebellion of Don Vittorio, who had left the Palazzo Corleoni, and gone away without telling his family whither.

"It does not answer, after all, to play your game with live chessmen," thought I to myself. "The pieces may at any moment develop a disconcerting will of their own."

"Now, Santi," said the Princess Corleoni, "you know the world, and you know our habits and social views. You are a Roman born and bred, and you understand these things, as perhaps a foreigner cannot. And I want you to confirm what I say when I tell this young lady that, come what may, let his engagement go on, or be broken, let Vittorio behave as badly to me and his father as can possibly be—still there is not and never has been, and never will be, the remotest chance of his marrying her sister."

"And, Signor Sandro," said I, "although you don't know many people of my class and country, you do know me well enough to believe me when I say that there is no effort or sacrifice I would shrink from to prevent my sister being married to such a man as Don Vittorio Bastiani-Corleoni."

There was a dead silence. I noticed at the time—notwithstanding the excitement of very unpleasant feelings—that Signor Sandro looked at me as though he thought I had been too hard on the Princess in making that speech. His conscience and his judgment were wholly on my side, as I well knew; and yet I am sure that at that moment he would have had me spare Donna Olympia Corleoni the mortification of finding an equal, though different, pride opposed to her own. Perhaps it was because some tender memories of the past were inextricably entwined with his thoughts of Donna Olympia, perhaps because she was a compatriot, and he could identify himself more fully with her feelings than he could with mine—in short, whatever be its solution, such was the fact; and I record it now as I marked it then, because it seemed to me a curious touch of character.

"Then tell me where he is," said she.

"Friendship," by Ouida (3 vols.: Chatto and Windus).—One is half-inclined to believe that it was "Ouida's" intention here to give a moral lesson to her admirers by showing them that a novel may be brimful of naughtinesses, and at the same time unspeakably and intolerably dull. As a literary work, "Friendship" stands nearly as much below the worst of her previous stories as its immediate predecessor, "Ariadne," stands above the best. When we have said that we have here two or three finely-drawn pictures of Rome and the scenery around it, and a few touches showing the author's old insight into the "seamy side" of passion—particularly of passion as it enters into the life of the artist—we have pretty well said all the good of the book that there is to say. It is wholly without plot or incident, almost without anything that can be called an attempt at the exact and careful delineation of character; and a great part of its inordinate bulk is taken up with long-winded, and in the main clumsy and pointless, tirades against the hollowness and baseness of Society—that Society which, according to "Ouida," is so willing to condone and wink at vice in those strong enough to browbeat it, clever enough to flatter it, or, better still, rich enough to be able to amuse it, and give it good dinners, and so ready to decry and slander the pure and lofty souls who treat it with the neglect and contempt it deserves. The story is, perhaps, hardly to be called "immoral," for there is certainly no attempt in it at throwing over vice that fascinating glamour by which, in Burke's words, it "loses half its evil by losing all its grossness." On the contrary, the grossness, coarseness, and foulness of evil are here only too painfully conspicuous. Indeed, we think it possible that the book might even have a deterrent effect on some "frisky matron," with nascent proclivities towards what the world, it seems—if you are well born enough or rich enough—calls "friendship," but which receives a different name in the Commandments. All the same, such a result does not seem to us to excuse or palliate the means employed for bringing it about. We must altogether protest against being called on to contemplate such a creature as the Lady Joan Challoner, who may be said to be the foremost figure here—a woman unchaste in thought and word and deed, coarse, dishonest, violent, and vulgar, a Messalina always, and a tyrant, a virago, a liar, a slanderer, or a hypocrite, as the occasion may require. And her lover—or, should we say, her "friend"—the Prince Ioris, is, if not so hateful, even more despicable and contemptible; first, in having suffered himself to be fascinated by such a woman, and then for lacking the spirit and manliness to throw off the yoke he finds so galling, though by his silence and submissiveness he is doing a cruel wrong to the great artist Etoile, the tender and noble-hearted woman he really loves. The whole theme of the book, in fact, is in the highest degree offensive and distasteful, whilst, for the most part, it is as wearisome as it is unedifying. That the world we are here introduced to is a mere travestie of any "society" actually existing in England, Italy, or anywhere else is, we should say, self-evident. As has already been pointed out by one critic, if "society" really were what "Ouida" affects to consider it, it would long ago have fallen to pieces from very rottenness.

"The Notary's Daughter," &c., by Lady Georgiana Fullerton (2 vols.: Bentley).—We are very glad to have again to welcome a tale by Lady Georgiana Fullerton, well known some quarter of a century back as the author of "Grantley Manor" and "Ladybird," and an accomplished novelist, who comes before us much less often than we could wish. It is true, however, that the present tale is very far from being altogether her own work. "The Notary's Daughter" is, as Lady G. Fullerton says, "done into English," that is, partly translated, partly modified and "adapted," from a French story, called "Un Mariage en Provence," by Madame Leonie d'Aulney, whose full sanction has been obtained for the alterations and additions here introduced into it. The work seems to us to have been very successfully performed, and the result is that we have an extremely fresh, pretty, and attractive tale of French provincial life. The pretty Rose Lescalles, daughter of the well-to-do and influential notary, M. Toussaint Lescalles, of Ciotat, a little seaport on the Mediterranean between Toulon and Marseilles, is married—entirely to suit the mutual convenience of the heads of the two families—to the Baron George de Védelles, younger son of the Count de Védelles, of the Château de la Pinede, a large landed proprietor of the neighbourhood. Rose is far too good a French girl to refuse to obey her parents' will in the matter of her marriage, but has almost a superstitious horror of her young husband, whose peculiarities have procured him the reputation of being a "fada," that is, only half-witted. How this union, which begins with utter indifference on the one side, and much more than the "little aversion" recommended by Mrs. Malaprop on the other, is rapidly transformed into a love match, we need not tell in detail, and will only say that Rose soon makes the discovery—but not till after she has plainly shown her feelings towards him—that George de Védelles is no "fada," but a genius, who is only supposed imbecile because his family have not had the wit to understand him. The characters of both husband and wife are drawn with much naturalness, grace, and delicacy of touch; and almost better than either of them is that of Denise de la Pinède, the high-born young beauty who, in obedience to a "vocation" received as a child, leaves the world and becomes a Sister of Charity. The tale is one of unusual excellence; and very good also is the companion piece, which fills the larger part of the second volume, "The House of Penarven," which is a simple translation from the French of M. Jules Sandeau.

"Life and Adventures of an Unfortunate Author," by Himself (Samuel Tinsley).—This is supposed to be the autobiography of a man of vast genius and vaster ambition, driven by privation, disappointment, and the failure to achieve his dreams of fame, to suicide. The tale is not without some signs of power and ingenuity, but is altogether too rhapsodical and exaggerated in style and character to be pleasing, and the "Unfortunate Author" might have won more sympathy for his sufferings if they had not to so great an extent seemed due to the unreasonableness of his desires. If the author will curb his flights of fancy, and try his hand at some theme more within the range of ordinary experience, we might not be unwilling to meet him again.

We have also received "Sophia," by Jane Ashton (Samuel Tinsley), a book whose faults are certainly not in the direction of wildness or extravagance. It is carefully written, and characters and incidents are natural and probable enough; but the story is throughout so tame and insipid that it fails to arouse our interest.

SCIENTIFIC NOTES

THE MICRO-TASIMETER—THE ELECTRIC LIGHT

ANOTHER marvellous physical instrument has been born of Professor Edison's active brain—namely, a micro-tasimeter, or measurer of infinitesimal pressures. This instrument is due to certain phenomena which became evident during experiments with the same inventor's Carbon Telephone. It relies for its action upon the variation of electrical resistance caused by variations of pressure upon a button of carbon. Figs. 1 and 2 show it in elevation and in section respectively. It consists of a base-board (C), to which the supports A and B are attached, A holding the carbon button D, which is fixed on a disc of vulcanite. The whole is connected with a Galvanometer, in which the results are recorded by the movements of a needle.

It is said to be so extremely sensitive that if a strip of mica or hard rubber be fixed within it, the heat of the hand, held some inches away, will affect either substance in a very sensible manner. It will therefore be observed that the new apparatus is also a measurer of infinitesimal amounts of heat. Hitherto, for this latter purpose, an instrument called a Thermopile has been used, but possibly it may be altogether superseded by this new device of Professor Edison's. Although the Tasimeter has not yet been subjected to any test on this side of the Atlantic (our description being condensed from an account which appears in the Scientific American), we learn from independent sources that it successfully figured among the many marvellous contrivances which were used during the late eclipse, to add to our incomplete knowledge of solar physics. By its help the presence of heat-waves was detected in the radiation from the corona. The heat radiated from the fixed stars has already been made manifest by means of the Thermopile, but the Tasimeter is said to be capable of much greater sensitiveness, inasmuch as its inventor hopes by its aid to weigh their light.

Professor Edison's undoubted genius has stamped itself upon various inventions, of which the Phonograph is perhaps the most remarkable. But his friends are, perhaps, too ardent in their admiration for him. For rumours are abroad respecting instruments which he is perfecting which fairly take one's breath away. We need only mention one of them. He is credited with having devised a small glass globe, which contains within itself a complete electric light apparatus. The ball is to be swallowed by a living person, in order that by the brilliant light emitted within him the operations of digestion, &c., may be rendered visible through his outer skin. Such a literal rendering of the process known as "seeing through a man" has, perhaps, never occurred to anyone save the originator of a certain musty conundrum relating to an invalid with a pane in his back. The swallower of the apparatus would surely surpass in courage the proverbial partaker of the first oyster. But, perhaps, after all, the task would be easier than the one we are asked to perform in swallowing the bare announcement of the matter.

The question of electrical illumination for streets has, however, passed beyond the region of vague conjecture, for the system has, as many of our readers have doubtless witnessed, been established in Paris, in the Avenue and Place de l'Opera. The Jablochkoff system there in use is one of many which are represented in some form or another at the Exhibition, and, from the prominent attention it has received, we may assume it to be one of the best.

The old plan of obtaining the Electric Light from battery power has long ago been discarded, except for lecture-room purposes, where such a light is only wanted occasionally—the expense and trouble being too great for more ordinary uses. Then came the invention of the Magneto-Electric Machine, in which the electricity can be generated wholesale so long as the machine is kept in rapid motion. But here another element of expense comes upon the scene, in the shape of a steam-engine to furnish the requisite motive power. Moreover, one machine was only capable of feeding one light—in other words, the current could not be sub-divided and dealt with in detail, as in the case of gas. Another difficulty found in electric illumination was the necessarily complicated character of the lamp itself, or—as we should say in speaking of gas—the burner.

Our readers are no doubt aware that the actual light is obtained by furnishing the ends of the two wires from a source of electricity with pencils of carbon. The manner in which these carbons have until lately been placed is shown in Fig. 3. They are attached to a box containing a clock movement—the complicated nature of which may be judged when we explain the conditions necessary to keep the light alive. In the first place, the upper carbon is consumed far more rapidly than the lower one, so that both must be moved towards one another at different speeds in order that the actual light may be kept stationary. Moreover, in the event of the light ceasing to burn, the two points must be made to touch one another before the current can be re-established. The Electric Lamp, in fact, was until lately a most complicated and delicate piece of mechanism, and withal a very expensive one. But in June last year M. Jablochkoff brought forward his Electric Candle, which at once showed that there was a means of burning the Electric Light without a complicated lamp.

The Electric Candle as now used in Paris is shown in Fig. 4. Its simplicity is evident when compared with the older form of lamp which is shown by its side. It consists of two pencils of compressed carbon placed side by side, instead of being one above the other, as in the older system. They are divided by a narrow strip of plaster of Paris, but connected at the top by a narrow bridge of carbon. The electric current is supplied to the two carbons, the circuit is completed by the connecting bridge, and a brilliant arc of light is established between them. The plaster partition is a non-conductor of electricity, therefore the two carbons are effectually insulated from one another throughout their length, but directly they begin to burn the plaster in its incandescent state becomes a conductor at the point of fusion, and therefore the plaster and carbons burn down together like a veritable candle. The difficulty that will perhaps present itself to our readers, that one carbon would still be apt to consume more rapidly than the other, is got over by causing the machine which supplies the electricity to give an alternating current—i.e., each candle is alternately positive and negative several times in a second—their rate of consumption being by this means exactly equalised.

One Jablochkoff candle of the size found most convenient in practice lasts for a little over two hours, but by an automatic shunt, the burnt out candle is immediately replaced by a fresh one. Each lamp—covered with an opal glass globe to correct the intense glare of the light—contains four candles, which one after the other are brought into circuit. The shunt consists of a bent lever somewhat like a common bell-crank. Its upper arm is furnished with a platinum wire which rests against the base of the carbon pencils. When the candle burns down to the place against which the wire leans the arm falls over, as it has no longer any support. Its lower branch immediately makes electrical contact with the next candle; and the same operation is repeated as each pair of carbons becomes exhausted.

The possibility of electric illumination is now reduced to a question of pounds, shillings, and pence. The Chelsea Vestry have been enterprising enough to send their surveyor to Paris to inquire into this important part of the matter, and his report has just been made public. It endorses the opinion of all who have carefully studied the subject. The light can be burnt with economy to illuminate large areas where one or two machines will suffice to supply the force required. But in streets, where the lamps are far apart necessitating either many machines or immensely powerful ones connected by long lines (for the power decreases much if the light be far from the source of its production) it is not applicable until it appears in a much improved form. The cost of lighting [illegible] Street with gas is 2s. 1½d. per hour, with the plant already in existence. To light the same thoroughfare by the Jablochkoff system would cost 1l. 4s. per hour, in addition to an immediate outlay of nearly 5,000l. Of course there is no comparison between the brilliancy of the one light as opposed to the other, but the outlay would not be justified just now, when the whole question is on its trial.

For some nights past the Strand has been effectively lit up by some electric lights contained in globes which are hung outside the Gaiety Theatre. The principle on which they are worked is known as the Lontin system. We have not now space to enter upon an examination of the merits which its promoters claim for it, but we shall revert to the subject at a future time.

It is evident, with so many workers in the field, that the day is not far distant when electric lighting will form an important industry. It cannot entirely supersede the use of gas, although in a great measure it must supplant it. Meanwhile the gas companies may take the wise precaution of reducing the price of that of which they have the monopoly, and people will not be too anxious to welcome their rival. That they can easily afford to do so is proved by their balance sheets, without entering into consideration of the fact that the by-products of their manufacture have lately become so valuable that little or no waste is left upon their hands.

STOCKING THE THAMES WITH CARP AND TENCH

IT is now about eighteen months ago when the Thames Angling Preservation Society, on the suggestion of Mr. Francis Francis, the well-known author of several works on angling, originated a movement for increasing the stock of carp and tench in the metropolitan river, with which it was then only scantily supplied. The movement was so far successful that Messrs. Francis Francis and W. H. Brougham, who undertook the management of it, turned into the river at Twickenham and Teddington twenty-four carp and fifty-three tench from the pond of Mr. Gustav [illegible], at Twickenham Common; twenty-two carp and thirty-nine tench at Kingston, sixteen carp and four tench at Thames Ditton, and fifteen carp and thirty-three tench at Hampton, from the ponds of Bushey Park and the Home Park; thirty carp at Sunbury, and seventy carp at Walton Reach, from the ponds of Osterley Park. Most of the carp were from 3lbs. to 14lbs. each, and the tench from 1½lbs. to 3lbs. each. Several of these fish were taken out of the Thames last season by the anglers, and there were some instances of the larger carp having been hooked by the anglers who were unable to land them. On the netting of a piece of backwater at Hampton about three months ago, to recover some stray fish, there were found a brace of the tench which were turned in last year, and as these two fish were male and female it was, perhaps, a pity they were removed with the other members of the finny tribe into the natural stream of the Thames, and not allowed to remain. The neighbourhood of Teddington Weir, a few years ago, was famous for its stock of carp, and both there and at Kingston some great piscatorial triumphs have been achieved, several of the riverside hostelries possessing good specimens of these fish. At Kingston, where the unsportsmanlike practice of snatching goes on amongst a very low class, numbers of fine carp have been caught within the last year or so, and openly sold in the streets; but steps have been taken this last week to check the disgraceful practice by staking the places where they haunt, and covering the stakes with tenter hooks. The Committee of the Thames Angling Preservation Society, having obtained a renewal of the order from Her Majesty's Office of Works to net the Heron Ponds of Bushey Park, arrangements were made for that purpose on Monday, the 3rd of June, under the superintendence of Mr. M. H. Blomey, and with the assistance of Messrs. Alfred Nuthall, Thomas Hiscock, H. J. Allred, Russell Knapp, and W. H. Brougham, the keepers employed being those of the Thames Angling Preservation Society and the Thames Conservancy. Mr. Frank Buckland, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Salmon Fisheries, kindly supplied one of his largest salmon nets for the occasion, but it was found very much too small, and, in addition to this, the ponds were excessively low, and choked up with weed. Two attempts were made to drag certain portions of the water, but netting was found utterly impracticable, as on each occasion the net came out rolled up like a thick rope. It was then decided to fix the net in the centre of the pond, and endeavour to drive the fish into it, as shown by one of the illustrations, which was rather an interesting process; but whilst the big carp could be seen rushing in the direction of the net, they managed to escape the destructive engine by diving underneath. Some additional nets were sent for in order to unite them together, so as to reach right across the pond, the interval being filled up by supplying the men with refreshments, and the visitors, of which there was a numerous throng, availed themselves of this opportunity to refresh the inner man in a kind of pic-nic fashion, which they appeared more thoroughly to enjoy than the netting. At length the nets arrived, and it was the work of very little time to put them together, and get them into the water, all who were engaged in it being thoroughly in earnest, those in the boat beating the water with all their might, and others with their high boots in the water in vigorous glee, landing net in hand ready to secure any fish that might come in the way of it, but their services were not required, as the sly old carp was a great deal too many for them. The netting of what is called "The Wick Pond," from its nearness to Hampton Wick, only resulted in the capture of a brace of tench, there being a marked contrast from the time it was netted at the beginning of last year under the direction of Mr. Francis Francis, when in one haul after lifting the net frequently over the stakes, there were landed twenty-two carp of about 8lb. each, and quite as many got away from the sides of the net. The operations, after "The Wick Pond," extended to the piece of water close by called "The Shoulder of Mutton Pond," where the process of driving into the net was tried three times in different places, the entire result being an addition of only three brace of fine tench. If any carp had been taken, they were intended to benefit the Shepperton waters of the Thames, but arrangements are being made to stock the remaining portions of the river with an increased supply of carp and tench at the end of the present year, when the ponds will be free of weed, and with no chance of failure.

RIDES FOR INVALIDS have been established in some of the cities across the Atlantic, and we read in the Christian Union that this charitable movement, inaugurated some years since by the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, has grown into an established summer charity. The object is to provide a few hours of sunlight and genuine recreation for those among the poorer classes whose lives are sunless and secluded by reason of disease or feebleness. Last year the committee were able to furnish carriage rides to nine hundred and twenty persons, chiefly women and children, selected from the hospitals, and to continue the good work by the distribution of fifteen hundred horse car tickets, allowing, in many instances, whole families to make excursions into the country by means of the open cars. The example is certainly well worth following in this country.

HER LAST SACRAMENT:—"THIS

FROM THE PICTURE BY A. STOCKS,

O IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME"

IBITED IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY

"DIPLOMATIC SKETCHES," by an Outsider.—I. Count Beust (Bentley and Son).—Among statesmen who have just missed being great, there are few greater than Count Beust. But yesterday—so near in time, so far away in political situation—Bismarck and he seemed equal names in the ranks of the European diplomacy. To-day, it is almost by an effort we remind ourselves that the genial Ambassador to the Court of St. James's was the writer fifteen years ago of those curt despatches to the English Foreign Office, which might not (said Bismarck) have been written at all had Saxony possessed a sea-coast; that nine years back the same M. de Beust—no longer Saxon baron, but hereditary Count of the Austrian Empire, and chief worker in the reconstruction of the defeated of Sadowa and possible ally of still undefeated France—was the man upon whose "Yea" or "Nay" depended the Franco-Austrian alliance; or that but seven years have passed away since, yielding to the rancour of an opposition which only the effacement of the Minister could induce to submit to the triumph of his policy, he withdrew, it might almost seem for ever, to the peaceful shade of a respectable ambassadorship. Much of this, no doubt, is ancient history now, so far at least as regards that earlier period in which M. de Beust won his diplomatic spurs; the period of the silent and bloodless struggle between Austria and Prussia for supremacy in Germany, of the conflicts of the "Gross-Deutsche" with the "Klein-Deutsche Idée," and of the vain attempts to bring about a Tripartite Union in the same "Bund" of the two great Powers and the group of smaller States; the period at every stage of which one blunder the less on the part of Austria, one turning of a straw from the outside might have long postponed or prevented altogether the coming transformations of '66 and '71. But much, too, has a direct bearing on the politics of the day, and more especially on that Eastern Question which Count Beust himself was, perhaps, the first to re-introduce in its latest shape by his action in the matter of the Servian fortresses in '67. As an estimate of the ex-Premier's true rank as a statesman the "Outsider's" sketch may strike some readers as exaggerated praise. Honest and clear-sighted as he has often shown himself Count Beust has hardly given proof of the supreme power—so fully possessed by Bismarck and Cavour—of making others see as clearly as himself and act precisely as he would have them do. But it is a thoroughly able and connected survey of a period and career that well deserve the closest study, garnished besides with anecdote and information which often savour of something more than a mere "outsider's" knowledge.

"Lucretius," by W. H. Mallock—the newest volume of "Ancient Classics for English Readers" (Blackwood and Sons)—well maintains the high reputation of this excellent series. Few writers of the older world can claim as close affinity as Lucretius with certain types of modern thought—the affinity, as it were, of the careless, defiant, speculative boy-poet, for the subtler doubts, the scientific sense of an insoluble mystery everywhere around, which characterise the matured man. In Lucretius we seem to hear—across the gulf of nineteen hundred years—an echo of our own materialist creed; a song of doubt, lighter in its note, less conscious of difficulties in the way, less equipped with scientific arms, but in its general conclusion much the same, or even tending more directly to the goal, just as it knows less of the halts that come from wider knowledge, the sadness that is inspired by an enlarged conscientiousness, the recoil of super-subtle reasoning upon itself. As a poet he holds (for a bard of the highest order) a position absolutely unique in literature. Too much in earnest to sacrifice philosophic precision to verse, he will write page on page which, but for the metrical form, would be purest prose, then burst half unexpectedly into passages unsurpassed for poetic power in the whole range of Latin literature. To Lucretius, alike as poet and as philosopher, Mr. Mallock's volume does ample justice; in its analysis of the great poem in which his philosophy is embalmed, as in its comparison of his pre-scientific materialism with the deeper and more complex scepticism of our nineteenth-century philosophers. The prose translations are from the scholarly version of Professor Munro. Those in verse, by Mr. Mallock himself, seem equally (with a very few exceptions) adequate and tasteful.

"Lucullus; or, Palatable Essays" (Remington and Co.), two volumes of which the major part appeared some years ago as separate papers on the "Oyster," the "Lobster," and "Sport and its Pleasures," can hardly have been corrected up to date, or the author would not have brought down upon his head a general outcry of indignation for discoursing at length in his opening chapter on the pleasures of fine natives "at sixpence a dozen," a price which indigent gourmands who cannot do without their oyster-sauce are rather apt to associate with mussels. This stumbling-block, however, left behind, it is fair to say that the remaining pages are everywhere readable, and on many points extremely useful. There is a recipe, for instance, for partridge pie, and another for cooking snipe, which of themselves would atone for many errors. Then there is an eloquent vindication of the hare, unjustly slandered by an Irishman of the last century as "being little worth, because, being naturally so fearful, she is never very fat;" and some chapters on the small birds which Frenchmen call gibier, and Englishmen do not call game, as to which we can only hope they will tempt no one to kill Cock Robin for "his delicate and bitter flavour," or to slaughter nightingales, after the manner of old Rome, for the sake of their rare and curious tongues.

If "Stanhope Memorials of Butler," by W. M. Egglestone (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.), tell little that is new about a famous man—of Butler, beyond a signature or two in the parish books, and a sermon that may have been his, there is no memorial of any sort, far less any characteristic memorial, at Stanhope—they give at least some pleasant pictures of the fat Weardale Rectory in the olden time, when Bishops of the County Palatine were veritable Princes of "the North Countree." The records of the Rectors of Stanhope, of a great suit with the lessees of the lead-mines (settled fortunately for the Church before the time of the unworldly Butler), which made the living one of the richest in the kingdom, and of the "24 substantial men" by whom all the parish affairs were regulated, are interesting even in themselves. Taken together with the pretty illustrations of village and of valley, they furnish out a most suitable companion for the stranger who may chance to ramble through the scenes amid which the "Analogy" was composed, and the famous "Rolls Sermons" first thought out.

We must hand over to the artist or the amateur the pungent criticisms entitled "English Landscape Art in the Year 1878" (Deighton and Dunthorne), which Mr. Alfred Dawson publishes for the third successive year on the landscapes exhibited at the Academy, the Grosvenor Gallery, or by the Old and New Water-Colour Societies. Moreover the criticisms are for the most part of a kind that can be only followed catalogue in hand, and with a lively recollection of the paintings severally censured or approved. Mr. Dawson's complaints of sketchiness in some cases and of a realism which gives simply the effect of photography in others, though somewhat strongly put, are not, we fear, without their justification.

Plain, practical, rather broad in tone, "Ten Short Sermons" (W. Ridgway), by N. R. Smith, M.A., must be ranked above the average of discourses thought deserving the honour of print. The sermon entitled "The Dark Glass" may be cited as a fair specimen of the tone of thought that animates them throughout.

A new and revised edition of "Ocean and Her Rulers," by Alfred Elwes (Griffith and Farran), a well-arranged and prettily-told history of the chief maritime Powers of the world, from the Phœnicians, who manned the fleets of Xerxes, to the British sea-kings of the present century, needs no commendation to the youthful reader. We might add that there are many chapters—e.g., those on the navies of Pisa, Venice, Genoa, and Holland—to which even older students might not unprofitably make occasional reference.

Under the title of "The Physical System of the Universe" (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.), Mr. S. B. J. Skertchley has given us a striking outline of physiographical science, based, not on the enumeration of facts or details, but on the examination of the earth as an integral part of one great universe, whose changes past and present can all be reduced to the action of heat on matter in its various forms, whether solid, liquid, or gaseous. Many of the later chapters, more especially those on the condition of the earth's interior, on the probable antiquity and duration of our system, on mistaken theories of the glacial periods—Mr. Skertchley is himself an enthusiastic follower of Dr. Croll—or on the enormous and generally under-estimated changes brought about by sub-aerial denudation, are admirable examples of sound reasoning and extensive research. As a manual for the student the utility of the volume is much enhanced by the brief recapitulation of results at the close of every chapter.

Few writers are so competent to describe existence across the Channel as the author of "The Member for Paris," whose life-like sketches of French men and manners are familiar to most readers. Alike in the palace, the office, and the provincial cottage, in political, social, and military affairs, little escapes his caustic pen, and under a thinly-veiled disguise few Gallic celebrities have remained unnoticed. Thus the second series of "French Pictures in English Chalk" (Smith and Elder) possesses the usual features of its predecessors—the easy, chatty style, combined with plentiful satire and a strain of Bonapartism—and the whole volume is eminently readable and amusing. In a few pages the author can construct a story which, in less skilful hands, would have been drawn out indefinitely, and the very charm of his writing lies in the conciseness and brevity with which he presents his subject, each character rendered sharp and clear by a few touches.—French society of a less respectable type is illustrated by Mr. A. E. Hake in "Paris Originals" (C. Kegan Paul). Here are the celebrities of the lower orders, those queer types to be met with in back slums, pursuing varied and odd industries; but they are mainly well-known characters, and Mr. Hake has not endowed them with any particular novelty. He speaks, however, from genuine experience, and has a keen eye for seizing the salient points of his subject. The illustrations by L. Richeton degenerate in most cases into caricatures.

"Tales from the Old Dramatists," by M. E. Browne (Remington), is a laudable attempt to familiarise general readers with the famous plays of such old-world authors as Congreve, Dryden, Otway, and Addison. Disclaiming all design of imitating Charles Lamb, Mr. Browne gives a brief and straightforward summary of the plots of eight noted dramas,—amongst which are Cato, Venice Preserved, and The Mourning Bride,—describing the characters and their chief exponents, and giving occasional extracts to illustrate the authors' style. As these plays are now never represented, by reason both of their length and their unfitness for present taste, while they are rarely read by any but genuine students, this book will be really useful to many desirous of some slight acquaintance with the literature of the English stage.

Under the title of the "Human Eye" (Hardwicke and Bogue), Dr. R. E. Dudgeon, already known to science as the constructor of an ingenious air lens for enabling divers to see under water, gives us a clear and not on the whole too technical an account—though on this latter point the estimates of unlearned reader and of scientist occasionally differ—of the mechanism of vision, and of the artificial lenses which assist its power. The sections on the changes in the eye through age, and of the comparison of the eye-muscles in man with those in the lower animals, may be noticed as especially interesting.

In "Clergyman's Sore Throat" (Gould and Son), Dr. C. B. Shuldham, himself a practical public lecturer, has put together a most useful treatise on the diseases of the throat and windpipe through over-exertion or mismanagement of the breath in speaking, no less than "on the art of breathing, and general hygiene of the voice." These last two sections, even those who do not hold the homœopathic rule of similia similibus curantur can hardly fail to pronounce excellent. More particularly may they be commended to those public readers and singers who know too well how slight a cause, while not absolutely incapacitating, can effectually destroy, for the evening, the delicate quality of a famous voice.

"Automatic Arithmetic: a New System of Multiplication and Division," by John Sawyer (George Bell and Sons). This is a very ingenious method, by which problems in these particular branches of arithmetic can be worked without any mental labour worth mentioning. It also possesses advantages over the use of Logarithms, both in point of accuracy and in the number of figures used, and in cases of multiplication and division by a large number of figures a considerable economy of time is gained, together with a greater certainty of a correct result than is the case with the ordinary methods. The tables of Logarithms in general use are only calculated to seven decimal places, but by Mr. Sawyer's system operations can be carried far beyond that limit.

Readers not wholly tired of the East will find in a little pamphlet, "The Armenians and the Eastern Question, with Text of the 'Memoires' addressed to the Cabinets of Europe, &c." (E. Stanford), a temperately written plea for the most numerous and important—though Mr. Palgrave does deny them the title of a nation—among the Christian races of Asia Minor. Stanford's "Map of South-Eastern Europe and Armenia to illustrate the Treaty of Berlin," is a capital shilling's worth, in which all the recent changes in the Turkish Empire are discernible at a glance.

We have also received from Mr. James Wild a very admirable map of Cyprus on a scale of about five miles to the inch. It is very clear and distinct in its delineation of roads, rivers, towns, villages, &c., and, besides the geographical map includes smaller maps, showing the geological and agricultural features of the island, together with plans of the chief cities and roadsteads.

THEATRE ROYAL, WAPPING-WAY

"ON Saturday evening will be presented at this theatre for the first time a new and original domestic melodrama of thrilling interest, entitled Rubies and Rags; or, a Work-Girl's Perils. Cherry Plampton, a pretty and virtuous young needle-woman; Sir Dazzler Hawkmoth, a profligate scion of aristocratic birth; Jackal Jem, a heartless scoundrel and a lion's provider; Mealy Mike, a kind-hearted baked-potato man, a true, though humble friend to the poor, &c., &c. Boxes, 1*s.*; Pit, 6*d.*; Gallery, 3*d.*"

The evening above mentioned was a warm one, but the enterprising lessees of the Theatre Royal had not miscalculated their prospects of a crowded house. The theatre afforded accommodation for at least fifteen hundred persons, and within a quarter of an hour of the doors being opened it was filled from floor to ceiling. The audience, which had been drawn entirely from the immediate locality, was of a decidedly mixed character, the costermonger element mustering in force. Prominent, too, in pit and gallery were many young men, lank and lithe, who wore neckerchiefs limp and wisp-like as an eel-skin, and who were remarkable for a curious oleaginousness both of clothes and skin, suggestive of an easy slipping out of the grip of a policeman.

The most fastidious manager, however, could not desire a more attentive or a more appreciative audience. The opening scene discloses Cherry Plumpton, the pretty and virtuous young needle-woman, attired in white muslin, trimmed with pink bows. Her attic is but meanly furnished—indeed, besides the chair she sits on and the table she works at, it appears to contain nothing but a pair of bellows and a canary bird in a cage. She sings, however, and stitches away at a tremendous rate, and is supremely happy. Then comes a tap at the door. "Come in," cries Cherry, cheerfully; and in he comes—Sir Dazzler Hawkmoth. Like all profligate scions of noble birth of the nineteenth century, he wears a tunic of Lincoln green, laced with gold, and hunting-boots, and a three-cornered hat of crimson velvet heavy with bullion trimming. Sir Dazzler starts. Pardon him, he has made a mistake—has been wrongly directed. He is in search of an old dame—his old nurse, in fact, who is residing somewhere thereabout, and is, he has heard, in sore distress. Cherry says something complimentary respecting his kindness of heart, and Sir Dazzler remarks on Cherry's beauty. Cherry blushes, and hides her confusion under an offer of chickweed to her canary. Sir Dazzler follows up his success. He draws from his finger a ring, the diamond in which from its size should be worth about three hundred pounds, and offers it to her, at the same time clasping her in his arms, and exclaiming, "Sweet girl! jewel of my a-hear-r-r-t's core! be mine!" The effect is electrical, Cherry's virtuous indignation is instantly aroused, and she proceeds to revile the scion of noble birth in such withering terms that he visibly cowers and shakes at the knees. "What," cries Cherry, holding up the diamond ring, and addressing the gallery, "what is this glittering bauble compared with the priceless gem of virtue!" It was the first applauding outbreak since the drama opened, and it was a rattler. The coatless young costermongers, as with one voice, roared "Bray-vo!" Grey-headed men of sinister aspect were seen to wink hard with both their eyes and repress the visible tear; even the slippery young fellows in the pit, speechless in their admiration for the ennobling sentiment, thrust their fingers in their mouth and whistled shrilly.

Sir Dazzler slinks out of the house, gasping with rage, and in the next act is found still in green velvet and hunting-boots in the tap-room of a public-house of call for robbers and ruffians of reckless enterprise in whispered converse with Jackal Jem. Sir Dazzler hands the latter gold, and the Jackal hisses "She shall be yours," and forthwith whispers the baronet that the dastardly deed shall be accomplished. Sir Dazzler expresses his assent, and they part. Barely have they done so when Mealy Mike emerges with his steaming stove and his glowing charcoal fire from behind the taproom door, where he has been an unobserved listener to the dastardly compact. Mealy Mike knows Cherry Plumpton, and in a serio-comic manner, and during the eating of one of his own scalding hot baked potatoes, he relates a moving story of how Cherry once nursed a little daughter of his through a dreadful fever. Mealy Mike swears to deliver the virtuous work-girl from the machinations of her enemies. The third act discloses the arch villain and the lion's provider, Jackal Jem, stretched on a wretched pallet in a miserable house. His face is chalked to a ghastly hue, and his rascally head swathed in a wisp of dirty white rag. Jackal Jem, however, is only shamming sick. He sits up in bed and chuckles in a ruffianly manner at the artful trap that is set to catch the artless Cherry, whom, it seems, he has sent to, imploring her to come and nurse a miserable penitent wretch, sick well nigh to death, and despised by all the world. "Ha, ha, ha!" laughs the awful villain, "and presently she'll be here, and Jackal Jem and Sir Dazzler Hawkmoth will square their little account!" The detestable impostor drinks from a rum bottle, concealed beneath his pillow, and then comes a knock at the door, and he hastily conceals it, and, with a dismal groan, bids the knocker enter. It is the tender-hearted Cherry. She approaches the ruffian's pillow to whisper consoling words into his ear, when, with a savage laugh, he starts up, seizes on her, and gives a shrill whistle. Instantly there emerges from a cupboard Sir Dazzler Hawkmoth, still in green and gold, and carrying a hunting-whip. "Ha, ha!" he cries, mockingly; "now, my pretty scornful one, you are mine, and no earthly power can save ye!" He is mistaken, Mealy Mike can! All unsuspected that philanthropic baked-potato vendor has lain concealed under the bedstead. With an exultant cry, he crawls out, seizes on the horsewhip, and lays on to the Jackal as well as the base baronet, while the audience applaud frantically, and evince by their behaviour their delight that vice should be frustrated and virtue protected.

But there is another act yet, Cherry Plumpton is in the hands of the police! Sir Dazzler has accused her of stealing his diamond ring, and she is sent to prison for three months. It is winter time when she is released, and snow is falling fast, night time, too, and Cherry, weary and famished, sinks down by the wayside. But succour is at hand! Mealy Mike is making his way home with his can and his fire, and has sold out all but two "mealy ones," reserved for his own supper. By the light of his fire he discovers poor Cherry. He kneels by her side and chafes her cold hands, and as soon as her senses return presses on her acceptance the two reserved mealy ones. With her head on his lap, and her white face well exhibited in the cheery light of the charcoal fire, he feeds her with hot potato to slow music. The picture is affecting. Sobs are heard in the boxes, sniffing is audible in the gallery, and even the sleek-looking young fellows in the pit snort undisguisedly, and stay the trembling tear with a corner of their eel-skin neckerchiefs.

But suddenly there is a commotion, and a crowd is observed coming down the road, and bearing in its midst, on a litter, a gentleman clad in green and gold. It is Sir Dazzler Hawkmoth, who has just met with a terrible railway accident in which Jackal Jem was smashed all to bits. The procession halts just opposite the spot where Mealy Mike is still playing the part of the Good Samaritan. Sir Dazzler on the stretcher with a shriek recognises the pallid female form on the ground. In feeble accents he summonses the generous baked-potato man to his side. Mealy Mike obeys, leading the shivering Cherry by the hand. Sir Dazzler, with a painful effort, withdraws from his bosom a heavy pocket-book, and presents it to her. "This! this!" he gasps, "will make some amends! Virtue you already possess, now I give you wealth! But say, oh, say! Can you forgive me?" She can and does, and so does the baked-potato man and so do the audience, and Sir Dazzler dies and the curtain falls, and everybody is made happy. JAMES GREENWOOD

RECENT DISCOVERIES AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL

A SHORT time back it was decided that the burial-ground surrounding St. Paul's Cathedral should be converted into an ornamental garden. The alterations necessary for the carrying out of this project suggested to Mr. Penrose, the learned and able architect to the Dean and Chapter, that the opportunity which he had so frequently desired of making a search for any remains that might exist of the ancient Cloisters and Chapter-house, delineated by Hollar in Dugdale's "History of Old St. Paul's," had at length arrived. Following as nearly as possible the situations suggested by Dugdale's plan, a series of excavations were made in the ground immediately to the south of the nave, bounded on the east by the west wall of the south transept. This search has been most richly rewarded, for not only have the foundations of the Cloisters and Chapter-house been to a great extent disclosed, but even the richly-moulded basement of the buildings, and the complicated and elaborate bases of the shafts and columns which supported the vaultings, have been found to exist in a sufficiently perfect state to suggest to any student of Gothic architecture the date, style, and general character of the beautiful buildings which formed such noble appendages to the old Cathedral.

One of the most remarkable facts brought to light by these discoveries is the proof that we have hitherto been entirely in error as to the site of the old Cathedral, and, singular to relate, the plan published by Wren himself, showing the relative positions of the old and new Cathedral, is thoroughly incorrect, and we can only suppose that the scheme shown in that plan, and so implicitly relied upon by subsequent architectural writers, was abandoned, as that plan represents the axis of each of the two buildings running obliquely to one another, whereas these discoveries have proved that they were parallel, if not identical, as shown in Dugdale's plan. The Cloisters of old St. Paul's surrounded a small quadrangle, the north side of which was formed of a portion of the south aisle of the nave of the cathedral, the east side by the west aisle of the south transept, while the other two sides were formed by two lofty walls. The Cloisters surrounding the court were of two stories in height, and were lighted from the interior of the courtyard by large perpendicular windows, the lower tier of which were unglazed. The Chapter-house, which was octagonal in plan, stood in the middle of this little court or quadrangle; like the cloisters, it was two stories in height, the lower story forming a kind of open crypt, somewhat similar to that of Lincoln's Inn Chapel. This crypt was richly vaulted, the ribs being supported upon four columns, and eight responds attached to the inner faces of the great buttresses. The basement and lower portion of one of these responds has been discovered in a very perfect condition, and is represented in our Sketch No. 2; the great angle buttress, or rather what remains of it, is to be seen at the back. This respond is an example of the very finest style of the Perpendicular period, and dates from about the time of Henry IV. Fine, however, as its mouldings are, and elegant as it is in design, it is a singularly poor piece of construction, as the large moulded stones which form the facing of the work are not properly bonded into the "rubble" forming the "core" of the work, probably the thing only held together by the excellence of the workmanship, the material employed, and its great solidity.

The remains of one of the other eight responds has been brought to light, but is in a far less perfect condition than that shown in our sketch.

Our Sketch No. 1 represents the basement of the inner wall of the east walk of the Cloisters and its junction with the south walk; this is of two distinct dates, the earlier portion consisting of the bases of the vaulting shafts and a complicated series of very slender columns and "ogee" mouldings, forming the inner angle of the two Cloister-walks. All these are composed of magnificent blocks of Purbeck marble, and probably date from the end of the reign of Edward III., or the commencement of that of Richard II. The delicate and beautiful design, of which these formed a portion, seems to have been abandoned for that of a much plainer character and less costly material, as all the rest is executed in stone, and has simple Perpendicular mouldings.

The other three excavations have succeeded in bringing to light a portion of the west walk, which was of precisely the same character as that already described, though in a far less perfect condition; and the foundations of the outer wall, the most interesting of which is that which shows its juncture with the west wall of the south transept.

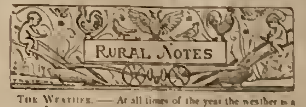
A reference to the small plan we publish, which is copied from Dugdale, will explain to our readers the position of these various portions of the building. Those parts which are blacked-in show what has been discovered; that which is left light is more or less conjectural.

We are informed that steps will immediately be taken to preserve these precious relics of the old cathedral from destruction; and we are requested to state that, until this has been done, they will not be shown to the public. H. W. B.



THE WEATHER. —— At all times of the year the weather is a matter of great interest to the farmers; but in the present month it is one of vital importance, as it makes or mars their fortunes. Seed-time is one in which the barometer is very anxiously studied, but when that era has been passed and the crops have thence passed well on to maturity, the weather during the cutting and ingathering of the corn becomes the all absorbing idea in the agricultural mind. Crops lie rich and ripe before the husbandman's eyes to-day—his reward has come, and lo! ere the next morning dawneth, when the reaper was to lay them low, the thunder storm has burst over them and battered them to the ground, twisted and tossed about in such a way that no genial breezes can lift them up again, and no mechanical reaper enter the enclosure to sever the stalks. Sadly to remark, within the past ten days we have had a series of terrible thunder storms, with deluges of rain which have levelled with the ground many fine standing crops, and have spoiled the quality of the grain that had been reaped but not carried, and where carried and stacked, not finally protected, as the Scotch would say, under "thack and rape." It is quite within the mark to say that hundreds of thousands of pounds will have been lost to the agricultural interest through the recent storms, the increased cost of cutting and deterioration in quality being taken into account, along with the fact that such weather is highly provocative and promotive of potato disease, which, we regret to learn, is now spreading rapidly throughout wide districts of country. Turnips and mangolds look well, and grass is of abundant and healthy growth, yielding good "bite" for cattle and sheep.

CATTLE DISEASE LEGISLATION.—From the first it will be remembered by readers of these "Notes" that the writer's opinion was that the Bill as introduced into and passed by the House of Lords would not receive the sanction of the Lower House, a view which turned out to be correct. Foreign stock from healthy countries are still to be permitted free entrance to this country, which is right, as it is difficult to see what our meat-consuming people could do without them. For instance, in the London market alone on Monday last there were no fewer than 1,345 foreign cattle, 930 of which came from America out of a total of 3,480. Beef was "riz," notwithstanding—what would it not have cost per pound the following day but for the presence of these animals. One good thing the Act has done, it has done away with the overwhelming mass of orders and counter orders in the Privy Council archives, which neither Privy Councillors themselves, municipal authorities, nor any other "fellow could understand," and consolidated all into a series of regulations easier of comprehension, but which are yet far too cumbersome. They are still of the Circumlocution Office genus. With reference to diseases in home cattle (the Orders take effect in October), the inevitable and intelligent "gentleman in blue," familiarly known as the "bobby," is the first person to whom it is incumbent upon the the stockowner to convey the information that his stock suffers from foot and mouth, pleuro-pneumonia, or other disease named in the schedule. This information the constable conveys to the inspector of the local authority, who determines either that the cattle are right or wrong, and segregates or slaughters as his judgment directs. If slaughtered the local authority pays to the owner three-fourths of the value of the animal, the sum not, however, to exceed 30*l.*, which would be a poor recompense in the case of pedigreed shorthorns. The other incidents in connection with these orders drawn up under authorisation of the new Act are too technical for these Notes, but they will be found duly recorded in the columns of the purely agricultural papers. Before closing this paragraph, however, we take great pleasure in noting that the Peerless fathers of the child are quite delighted with the changeling sent back to them by the Commons. They hug it to their bosoms as if it really were their own, assured that it has effected a happy compromise between the towns as representing the consuming and the farmers representing the agricultural interest!

"HARD TIMES."——In the "Chronicles of a Clay Farm," a thoroughly farming-book, although written in a style which those who know nothing whatever about "turmits" can enjoy, there are some humorous chapters about "hard times" in farming and wonderfully long faces of cultivators sketched by the late Mr. George Cruikshank. Farmers are still too much disposed to cry "Wolf" at the door when the beast is actually a considerable way off. At least such is the opinion Sir Wilfrid Lawson, expressed at the Aspatria Agricultural Society the other day. He admitted that the farmers had had a series of depressing years, but they were not quite so badly off as they wished to make out, in proof of which assertion Sir Wilfrid instanced the case of a Scotch farmer, who had determined in spite of bad times to pay his rent if it was his last shilling, and said he to his factor, when he was paying: "It is my last shilling." He then threw down a roll of bank-notes. The factor counted them, and said "There is 50*l.* too much." "Oh! ay, man," said the farmer, "I put my hand in the wrong pouch." This is a good story, but hardly applicable to the "lowness" of Scotch farmers generally.

MISCELLANEOUS. —— Lord Rosebery evidently holds a different view of the farmer's situation from that expressed by Sir Wilfrid Lawson in the joke above. He has without solicitation remitted 10 per cent. of last year's rents on the Rosebery estates.—The funds towards the 15,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* required by the Royal Agricultural Society for their show in London next year now amount to 7,300*l.*—The decrease in the extent of land under cultivation in Ireland this year, in comparison with last is 62,106 acres, but the yield of all crops will be larger than usual.—The area of wheat in Great Britain under cultivation this year was 3,218,579 acres, of barley 2,402,004; oats, 2,602,077; potatoes, 508,541; and hops, 71,791, showing an increase of about 50,000 acres in the cases of wheat and barley, and a slight decrease on oats and potatoes. The cattle numbered this year 5,738,470. Sheep 28,397,274 and pigs 2,451,437, showing an increase on both cattle and sheep as compared with the previous year.—A register of trotting horses has been set on foot. Nothing in the animal world will go down without pedigree nowadays.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

THERE is a rather unusual amount of value to be found in "Among the Flowers, and other Poems," by Francis W. Bourdillon (Marcus Ward and Co.). The author is invariably musical in his utterances, and has evidently a correct ear, whilst there is a genuine air of spontaneity about his poems which makes them really worthy of the name. Perhaps the most ambitious piece in the elegant little volume is a by no means ill-written ballad called "Gertrude's Lave," but the author is unfortunate in his rather repulsive subject, and some of the minor pieces are infinitely more to our taste. Such, for instance, as "Idle Days," "Brimham Rocks, or, A New Legend of the Forget-me-not," which last is exceptionally pretty and fanciful. In a lighter strain "Ella" deserves high praise, and "The Legend of the Water Lilies" contains at least one passage, beginning "Oh, noble sun," which induces the happiest auguries for the writer's future. He is, undoubtedly, something more than a mere composer of verse.

"Lyrics and Landscapes, &c.," by Guy Roslyn (Arthur H. Moxon), does not claim any great amount of attention, although the author has attained a certain reputation, and some of the incidental pieces have already appeared in divers magazines. There is too great an air of manufacture about the verse, which is often clumsy, as in "True Words" and "The Bretby Bells," whilst "Edgar," which is the longest piece, is almost as bad as an eighteenth-century attempt at a ballad. Bishop Percy himself could hardly have written anything more ludicrously bad than

I am no ghost. I was struck down,
But I got up again
And with the three men did contend,
Till two of them were slain

At the same time, there are one or two of the shorter pieces which deserve a certain meed of praise, especially "Jilted" and "Hope and Faith."

The author of "One Hundred Holy Songs, Carols, and Sacred Ballads," original, and suitable for music (Longmans), has ardent fervour in his favour, and a good deal of sound taste, joined to mechanical skill. Strictly speaking, there is not a carol nor a ballad in the book, the nearest approach to the latter is "When Children are Sick," and the next best is "Service." But perhaps the most successful essay, amongst many which are pleasing, is "All in the city whose gates are gold," although it should be "streets" for strict accuracy.—"A Century of Emblems," by G. S. Cautley, Vicar of Nettleden (Macmillan), is an attempt in the quaint manner of bygone times, and, it must be added, a highly successful one. "The Hyæna" is exceptionally good, whilst amongst the shorter epigrams we may draw attention to "Abstinence," "History," and "Proof of Worth." The illustrations, too, deserve praise. —"Songs of Beranger, done into English Verse," by William Young (Blackwood) is a revised edition of the latest American copy. It is almost impossible that such reproductions should be more than the faint reflex of their original, but if there are any who cannot enjoy the songs in their native dress a translation may prove acceptable.—From the Clarendon Press issues a translation in verse of Schiller's "Wilhelm Tell," by the Rev. Edward Massie, M.A. It may be open to question whether it be possible to execute a work in this fashion which shall, at the same time, be of practical use to students as a crib; but as a readable translation the play may serve.—A new volume of "The Lansdowne Poets" is entitled "Nature and Life," including all the Miscellaneous Poems, with many Original Pieces," by Nicholas Michell (Frederick Warne and Co.). It is well produced, if the illustrations be excepted, and will doubtless please the author's admirers.

A LOVE SONG

Oh! heart of my heart, art thou beating
In unison sweetly with mine?
I waft from my lips this fond greeting,
And hope it will rouse one from thine.

Oh! thought of my thoughts, while my glances
Would gladly annihilate space,
Dost thou, in thy sun-woven fancies
Grant me, for a moment, a place?

Oh! soul of my soul, while my spirit
Doth struggle and pant to be free,
Doth thine, too, rise sudden and stir it,
And flee like a bird unto me?

I wander 'mid visions of bliss,—
Vouchsafe thy dream lips a dream kiss?

Oh! if it be so, though asunder,
'Tis thus we span moorland and lea;
Say, light of my eyes, need'st thou wonder
Who strung these poor verses for thee?

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Austrians are making vigorous preparations to put down the Bosnian insurrection. A large number of fresh troops have been mobilised, thus raising the strength of the army of occupation to 120,000 or 130,000 men, with 400 cannon, and Marshal Philippovich as Commander-in-Chief. These reinforcements are seriously needed, and until their arrival the Austrians are unable to assume the offensive, as the insurgents are stated to number some 100,000, all adepts in guerilla warfare and who are materially aided by the nature of the country. General Szapary in particular is anxious to advance on the Zwornik district, bordering upon Servia, where the insurgents are in great force, while he is at present hard pressed to maintain his positions. Indeed, he was nearly cut off at Doboj, on the 23rd inst., as the enemy after a nine hours' fierce conflict had almost succeeded in destroying the pontoon bridges over the Bosna, when finally routed by the Imperial troops. Subsequently, however, General Szapary blew up his own bridges and retired to the other bank of the river, where on Monday he again defeated the Bosnians. Another Austrian success is recorded from Stolatz, Marshal Jovanovic having forced the Herzegovinians to raise the blockade of the garrison, and a skirmish has taken place before Kljuc, near Banjaluka. In several places the insurgents have voluntarily surrendered themselves, while a notorious ringleader, Hadji Jamarkovic, has been captured, but it is now asserted that Hafiz Pasha, the Governor of Serajevo, who was apparently favourable to the Austrian occupation, is one of the chief heads of the rising. Order is being restored in Serajevo, a mayor has been appointed, and a municipal council composed of eighteen citizens of various creeds, the Turkish officials are to be reinstated as soon as affairs are put straight, and the only Austrian difficulty is the scarcity and dearness of provisions. The town suffered terribly from the bombardment, and there was great loss of life on both sides, but the Austrian troops appear to have behaved very well, and to have afforded little reason for the Sultan's telegram to the Emperor begging him to command leniency towards the inhabitants. Some 1,000 insurgents were captured in the houses, and a quantity of cannon, rifles, and ammunition; several millions of paper money were also seized, while the inhabitants have since been bidden to give up all arms. The Austrian losses during the attack on Serajevo have not yet been officially announced, but it is stated that, up to the 16th inst., 976 men had fallen. Meanwhile the negotiations for the Austro-Turkish Convention continue, Count Andrassy being firmly bent on the conclusion of the agreement, but he meets with considerable opposition, and public opinion in Austria is greatly against any convention with the Porte after the recent losses in Bosnia. Servia, too, is heartily reproached, for numerous Servian regulars are declared to have been engaged at Doboj, and this covert assistance to the insurgents ill accords with Prince Milan's polite messages to the Emperor and Count Andrassy, thanking them for their support of the Servian cause at the Congress.

The departure of the Russians from San Stefano has at last begun, and the Muscovite headquarters have been moved back to Rodosto. The Imperial Guard are now leaving, although their evacuation will not be completed before the first week of October. It is hoped that the whole of the Russian forces will be withdrawn to the Roumelian lines by the beginning of December, while General Todleben will then go from Adrianople to Varna, which is not yet entirely vacated, owing to the great accumulation of Turkish stores. Turkey has now postponed the surrender of Batoum to September 6th; but the population apparently are becoming more resigned, as the Lazis, after much persuasion, have resolved not to oppose the cession, and are beginning to quit the town. Yet another fortress, which the Porte delays to vacate, is Podgoritza; and Prince Nikita, losing all patience, has begun to bombard the town.—Safvet Pasha's Note to the Powers respecting the rectification of the GREEK frontiers has aroused considerable interest this week. Although not a decided refusal to comply with the recommendations of the Berlin Treaty, the Note is a virtual appeal against the decision, producing a lengthy array of arguments in favour of the Turkish cause, and begging the Powers not to jeopardise the peace of Europe by enforcing the Hellenic claims. The appeal, however, has met with small favour anywhere, and there can be little doubt that it will be definitely rejected by the signatory Powers of the Berlin Treaty, whose duty it will now be to mediate between the two nations. While awaiting their reply, the Porte is considering a British Memorandum, commending certain reforms declared, in the opinion of the Queen's Government, to be indispensable to the reorganisation of Asiatic Turkey, amongst which are the maintenance of order by a gendarmerie, the improvement of the collection of taxes, and the establishment of appellate tribunals, with European assessors. The Anglo-Turkish Convention is thus making itself felt, as it is evident that these reforms are imposed upon rather than suggested to the Sultan, although it is hardly expected that they will be carried out until Turkish territory is freed from the invader. The Porte in future will be obliged to listen to the counsels of the British representative, and his policy must be directly influenced by Great Britain.—The copies of the Berlin Treaty signed by the Sultan have been presented at Berlin.

Russia is highly indignant at the report of the Rhodope Commission, which severely condemns the conduct of the Czar's army in Bulgaria, and declares that the Turks and Bulgarians will be reconciled directly the Muscovite element is eliminated. The Russian delegate refused to sign the report; while the Agence Russe has published a violent article on Lord Salisbury's Note to the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg respecting these atrocities, asserting that Lord Salisbury is paving the way for the encroachment of English influence in Bulgaria. The Russians, too, have sent a formal demand to ROUMANIA for the surrender of Bessarabia. This action rather upsets Roumanian plans, the Bucharest Government being desirous that the territory should be taken by force, so as to afford them a subsequent pretext to appeal against the spoliation. In ST. PETERSBURG an Imperial Ukase has been issued, ordering all future attacks on State officials to be brought before military tribunals, and tried according to the laws in force in war time. General Mesentzoff's assassin has not yet been found, but he is believed to be the same person who lately killed Baron Heyking at Kieff. A "Second Eastern Loan" is shortly to be raised, with a capital of 3,000,000 roubles, the stock to be issued at ninety-three, to bear interest at five per cent., and to be redeemed in forty-nine years.

The health of the troops in CYPRUS is stated to be improving, the worst cases being 20 severely sick out of 180 at Nicosia, and 99 in 1,666 at Larnaka; 8 men have died since landing.

FRANCE.——The resignation of Marshal MacMahon is once more being talked about, but there appears little real likelihood of such an event, and the rumour is mainly due to certain Conservative prints, which are anxious to frighten such waverers as hover on the outskirts of the Republican camp, and to win them back to Conservatism. Thus it is declared that the Marshal will resign at the end of the Exhibition, and the chances of his successors are being freely discussed, yet no hint of resignation comes from official quarters, and the Minister of the Interior took a very jubilant view of the situation in an after-dinner speech at Mortagne. As English institutions are the pet models just now in France, M. de Marcère recommended the adoption of the British custom of formally discussing politics at public meetings, and spoke with enthusiasm of the success of the Republic, styling the coming January elections the crowning stroke of the edifice, and summing up his address as represented by the single word, "confidence." The Republicans are not altogether delighted with the speech, they consider that the Minister "did protest too much," and that this war-cry of "confidence" savours somewhat of anxiety to reassure the public against any suspicion of weakness in the Government. The Ministry, indeed, according to report, intend to render an account of their stewardship when the House meets, and to ask for a vote of confidence, which M. Gambetta has promised them, while it is further said that MM. Dufaure and Léon Say will retire, the latter Minister disagreeing with M. Gambetta on financial questions. M. Waddington has been more successful in his recent oration than his colleague, and his defence at Laon of the Berlin Treaty has been generally approved. He maintained the disinterestedness of France, which had won European respect, declared that the time for judging the Treaty was not yet come, and that the French Government would concentrate all its energies to its loyal execution. The Bonapartists, on their side, have not been silent, and M. Paul de Cassagnac has even admitted that the Republic has nothing terrible about it, and that as long as it remains moderate, Imperialism has no chance. Yet eventually, he believes, Radical opinions will prevail, and then back will come the Empire. Behind Robespierre there was a Bonaparte, behind 1848 there was a Bonaparte, why not behind Gambetta?

The distribution of the Exhibition prizes has been deferred till October 21st, in order to enable the Prince of Wales to be present, and the Deputies to attend in force, as the Chamber reopens on the 28th of October. A large platform is being built in the Palais de l'Industrie for the President, the foreign Princes, and the Ministers, the Diplomatic Body and officials sitting below, and bands and a large choir will enliven the ceremony, while the Palace will be extensively decorated inside and out.—A grand Peace meeting of working men took place at the Château d'Eau on Sunday, when there was a large assemblage of English delegates, and sympathetic letters were read from MM. Hugo and Louis Blanc, resolutions being adopted in favour of settling national disputes by arbitration instead of by war.—Most provincial towns will be represented at M. Thiers' anniversary mass at Notre Dame on Tuesday, the Russian Dukes Constantine and Alexis will be there, and the ceremony promises to be very imposing, as the cathedral will be entirely hung with black, and 1,200 Orpheonists will sing in the Mass.—There is no gossip proper in Paris, and the only theatrical novelty is a stupid comedietta at the 3ième Théâtre Français, Les Pensionnaires du Général, by M. H. Debry.

GERMANY.——The marriage of Prince Henry of the Netherlands, brother of the King of Holland, with Princess Marie, eldest daughter of Prince Frederic Charles, was celebrated at Potsdam on Saturday, the civil marriage taking place in the afternoon, and the religious ceremony being held in the evening, and being followed by the orthodox torchlight dance. The King of Holland was present, but neither of his sons. The Dutch are much pleased with the match, and are preparing a triumphal entry into the Hague and Amsterdam for the Royal pair. No marriage has taken place in the Royal family for twenty-five years, and there is not a Dutch Princess left to preside over the Court.—The Bill against the Socialists has been amended by the Judicial Council, and now enacts that the police authorities of the various States shall have power to prohibit Socialist associations, and substitutes a Committee from the Federal Council for the proposed Imperial Bureau for the trial of Press offences.—Nobiling is to be placed in a lunatic asylum under strict supervision, in order to decide whether his insanity is real or feigned.—Emperor William has gone to Gastein.—A serious shock of earthquake was felt on Monday at Cologne, Barmen, and the Rhine districts.

INDIA.——The prospects of success of the British Mission to Afghanistan are believed in India to have been materially improved by the death of the Heir Apparent, Abdullah Jan, Shere Ali's youngest and favourite son. This lad was proclaimed heir over his three elder brothers at the instance of his mother, who aided the Ameer to regain his throne; but Abdullah was weakly and of little promise, and his death opens up an opportunity for the British envoy to effect a reconciliation between Shere Ali and his second son, Yakoob Khan, who has been treacherously kept in prison at Cabul for eight years. Yakoob dislikes the British, but, if restored to his lawful heirship by their influence, must surely be drawn towards alliance with so friendly a Power, especially as Great Britain, unlike Russia, never acknowledged Abdullah Jan as heir apparent. Yakoob's two brothers are not formidable rivals, for Ibrahim Khan is no favourite with his father, and Ayub Khan is still in exile for rebellion; but there is a more formidable pretender in Ahmed Ali, the son of Shere Ali's favourite son, Mahomed Ali, who fell at Kajbaz. The British Mission is to reach Cabul at the beginning of October, at the end of the forty days' mourning for Abdullah Jan.—Affairs have so improved in Madras from the heavy rain, that able-bodied people are being dismissed from the relief works. In Mysore the population is increasing so rapidly that the produce of the land is becoming insufficient.

UNITED STATES.——The yellow fever epidemic is growing more serious, and in New Orleans the deaths average 40 per diem. The malady is spreading up the river, and is now affecting the negro as well as the white population. Nurses and subscriptions are coming from other cities, but the suffering and alarm are intense, all the inhabitants of Grenada being either sick or dying.—A fresh correspondence on the Halifax Award to England is to be opened by Mr. Secretary Ewarts. As however, the Senate Committee recommended that the award should be paid if the President deemed it due to the honour and good faith of the nation, it is difficult to see what purpose can be served by reopening the subject. The States also propose to negotiate a Reciprocity Treaty with Canada, the Dominion to adopt the same fiscal tariff.

MISCELLANEOUS.——There has been a slight earthquake in BELGIUM.—The Khedive of EGYPT had given up his entire estates to the State, and has accepted the report of the Committee of Inquiry into the Egyptian revenues, stating that he will adopt a radical change of system, and that his country is "no longer African but European." Nubar Pasha will accordingly form a new Ministry, in which Mr. Rivers Wilson will probably take the Finance Portfolio.—In AUSTRALIA, the Victorian Parliament has assembled and intends to discuss the reform of the Constitution, so as to avoid any repetition of the deadlock of last session.—BRITISH COLUMBIA is anxious to withdraw from the Dominion if the terms of union with Canada are not complied with by May next.

THE COURT

THE Queen and Princess Beatrice are now at Balmoral, having arrived on Tuesday from Broxmouth, where they had been staying with the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe. Her Majesty and the Prince and Princess left Osborne on Friday week, and travelling all night reached Dunbar Station on Saturday morning. Here Her Majesty was received on the platform by the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, the Earl of Haddington, the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and various municipal dignitaries, and subsequently drove with the Duke and Duchess to Broxmouth. On alighting from the train the Queen kissed the Duchess, and the Duke had the honour of kissing Her Majesty's hands. Dunbar had been gaily decorated in honour of the event, and when later in the afternoon Her Majesty drove through the town, the streets were lined with thousands of people, a thoroughfare being kept by the Volunteers and Militia. In the evening the Royal dinner-party consisted of Her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, and the Marchioness of Ely. On Sunday morning Her Majesty walked in front of the Mansion House, where her writing table had been sent out to Cromwell's Mound, and Divine Service was subsequently held in the dining-room, the whole of the Royal party being present, and the Rev. Mr. Buchanan, the parish minister, officiating. Her Majesty afterwards walked on the sea-shore with the sons of Lord Charles Kerr, and then drove to Dunglass Castle, the seat of Sir Basil Hall. The Earl of Haddington and General Ponsonby joined the Royal dinner party in the evening. On Monday, Her Majesty planted a cedar tree in Broxmouth Park in commemoration of her visit, and subsequently drove to Tantallon Castle, passing on her way through Dunbar, where five hundred girls strewed flowers in the Queen's path. At Tantallon Castle Her Majesty was received by Sir Hew and Lady Hamilton Dalrymple, and Sir David Baird was presented to the Queen. Her Majesty returned to Broxmouth, visiting on the way a gipsy encampment, in which the gipsy-queen Reynolds was staying. The gipsies, on hearing that Her Majesty would visit them, erected a platform, on which Queen Reynolds sat in a purple dress, trimmed with white lace, and attended by a woman with a yellow handkerchief on her head, and a bright crimson shawl over her shoulders, and two men in red coats and white vests. The Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold left for Balmoral in the evening, being seen off at Dunbar Station by the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, the town being brilliantly illuminated. On Tuesday morning the Royal party arrived at Balmoral, being received at Ballater Station by a large crowd of people and a guard of honour of the 79th Highlanders. The Queen was expected to be present at the Braemar Gathering on Thursday.

The Prince and Princess of Wales remain in the Isle of Wight, and on Saturday the Prince, with his sons and the King of Denmark, went for a trip in H.M.S. Thunderer and visited the wreck of the Eurydice. On Monday the Prince, the King of Denmark, and the young English Princes Albert Victor and George made an inspection of Portsmouth Dockyard, lunching with Admiral Fanshawe, and subsequently witnessing some torpedo experiments from H.M.S. Vernon. On the passage to that vessel the launch conveying the Royal party became fixed on one of the mud banks of the harbour, and the Prince and his visitors had to exchange into another boat. The Prince of Wales is expected to visit Doncaster during the races next month.

The Duke of Connaught is still in Berlin, whither the Prince and Princess Christian have also gone. It is said that Prince William of Prussia will visit Scotland for some weeks next month.—The Empress of Austria is going to Ireland for the hunting season, and has leased Summerhill House, County Meath, from Lord Langford, for her residence.—The infant Prince Imperial of Japan is dead.

CHURCH NEWS

THE NEW BISHOPRICS ACT.——On Wednesday, the Act for the foundation of four new bishopries was issued. The preamble recites that it is expedient to provide increased episcopal supervision in certain parts of England, and the four dioceses are to be Liverpool, Newcastle, Southwell, and Wakefield. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners are empowered to receive public contributions for the endowment of any of the new bishoprics, and whenever they certify to Her Majesty that the annual value of the endowment fund, with the sum to be derived from a contributory bishopric, is not less than 3,500*l.* a year, or 3,000*l.*, with contributions to raise it within five years to 3,500*l.*, then Her Majesty by order in Council may "found" the new bishopric. So long as there is not a dean and chapter of any of the four new bishoprics Her Majesty may appoint the bishop by letters patent. The new Bishops of Liverpool, Newcastle, and Wakefield are to be the subject to the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York, and that of Southwell to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The number of bishops sitting in Parliament is not to be increased.

THE WESLEYANS AND "ETERNAL PUNISHMENT."——The Manchester Examiner announces that the Rev. William Impey has resigned his office as General Superintendant of the Wesleyan Missions in South-Eastern Africa. Some time ago Mr. Impey wrote to the Mission Secretaries in London expressing his inability any longer to enforce on his brethren, or on the Kaffir converts of the Mission, the "plain grammatical sense" of the words in the Methodist standards, which require it to be taught that "hell is a dark and bottomless pit, full of fire and brimstone, in which the wicked will be punished for ever and ever, by having their bodies tormented by the fire and their souls by a sense of the wrath of God." At the request of the Secretaries he came to London, and conferred with them, and the result has been that he was compelled to resign his position. His connection with the Wesleyan ministry has thus ceased after serving as a missionary for forty years.

VARIOUS.——The Rev. K. B. Godolphin Osborne, son of Lord S. G. Osborne, has resigned the living of Dunston, and seceded to the Church of Rome.—On Saturday last the Most Rev. Dr. Macarthy, vice-president of Maynooth College, was consecrated Bishop of Kerry, in the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Killarney. The consecrating Bishop was the Right Rev. Dr. Crooke. Among the laity present was Lord Kenmare, who read an address of welcome to the new bishop.—Mr. Spurgeon, who is again laid up with rheumatism, last Sunday sent the following characteristic letter to his congregation:—"Dear Friends,—Up to the last moment of yesterday evening I cherished the resolution of preaching to you, and prepared a sermon accordingly, although I was in great pain. This morning I found myself quite unable to rise, for I am afflicted in head, shoulders, and neck with fierce rheumatism; and therefore I must lie still, and endeavour patiently to bear the great Father's will. I am grieved to the heart to be so often laid aside, but I am in hopes in this instance the evil will not last many days. I will be with you on Thursday if able to move. I cannot tell why these afflictions are sent, but I entreat your prayers that they may be sanctioned to my own grace, and your edification. With warmest love, your afflicted pastor, C. H. Spurgeon, per C. Spurgeon, junior."

MUSIC

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.——A general record of the continued success of these excellent concerts would almost suffice, but that since our last some interesting things have been done which require at least a passing notice. A feature in the programme of the "English night" was an extremely clever symphony, in F, by Mr. Hamilton Clarke, which we hope, not long hence, to have another opportunity of hearing. The performance, directed by the composer, was excellent throughout, and the symphony was received with manifest favour. Two orchestral movements, "Entr'acte" and "Rustic Dance," from Mr. Alfred Cellier's Nell Gwynne—also conducted by the composer—were found no less attractive. Mr. Carrodus (our representative English violinist) displayed to advantage his almost unlimited powers of execution in a showy and ingeniously contrived fantasia on Scotch melodies, which created a marked sensation, and the first part terminated brilliantly with Mr. Arthur Sullivan's spirited and characteristic Ouvertura di Ballet. The singers were Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Marie Davies, and Mr. Edward Lloyd, and the concert was altogether one of the best of the season. At the concert on Saturday M. Paul Viardot, son of Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia (not of Malibran and De Beriot, as has been stated), played Mendelssohn's violin concerto with great applause. This is the same concerto which introduced the very promising young artist to an English audience, at a Philharmonic Concert, not long ago. Now, as then, he was most entirely successful in the andante and finale, the opening allegro requiring still further thought and careful study to render it all that might be wished. The second début of M. Viardot was quite as successful as his first. Mendelssohn's splendid overture to Ruy Blas, and L'Arlesienne by the late regretted Georges Bizet, consisting of four movements—Prelude, Minuetto, Adagietto, and Carillon—were the other instrumental pieces of importance. Had Bizet lived to become a thorough master in the art of development, there is no knowing what he might not have done with the second movement of this suite. It is beautiful enough, however, as it stands, while each of its companions possesses marked character. The prominent feature of the miscellaneous programme was a well made and effective "selection" from Mr. Sullivan's delightful comic opera, H. M. S. Pinafore—due, we believe, to the pen of Mr. Hamilton Clarke. Under the direction of Mr. Arthur Sullivan himself, the whole was admirably executed by the orchestra, combined with the band of the Coldstream Guards; and nothing could be more finished and satisfactory than the various solos for flute, oboe, clarinet, ophecleide, and cornet, by Messrs. Radcliff, Horton, Lazarus, Hughes, and H. Reynolds. A set of quadrilles, entitled Echoes of London, written by Mr. C. Coote, jun., formed a light and pleasing addition to the programme. With regard to Monday's concert it will suffice to state that the B flat Symphony of Beethoven was played just as finely as its three precursors, and that there was a capital performance of Auber's overture to Masaniello, under the able direction of Mr. Cellier. On the fourth "classical" night (we wish some other epithet than "classical" could be chosen), the symphony was Spohr's gorgeous and picturesque Weihe der Töne (which Mr. Sullivan should know better than to translate "Power of Sound"), the only overture being Mendelssohn's prelude to the Athalie of Racine, one of the most earnest and magnificent of all his orchestral pieces. M. Paul Viardot introduced some rather time-worn variations by Corelli ("La Follia"), which he played remarkably well; and Mr. Lazarus charmed the entire audience by his truly impressive delivery of the larghetto from Mozart's clarinet concerto in A. Nothing is more congenial to the sympathetic tone and phrasing of our great clarinetist than the expressive slow melodies of the most tuneful of composers. A new young vocalist, Mdlle. Stella Faustina, with a very agreeable, if not powerful soprano, showed great acquirement, and still greater promise, in Rossini's "Una voce," and Bellini's "Ah! non giunge," the last of which she was compelled to repeat. Mdlle. Faustina, we understand, has studied with Mr. Maurice Strakosch, who first brought out Adelina Patti. The theatre has been crowded every night.

WAIFS.——Signor Boito's Mefistofele, an opera, which is making the circuit of Italy, and, if report may be believed, achieves success in every town, still awaits a hearing in London. What are Messrs. Gye and Mapleson about? Are they afraid that Mefistofele might interfere with the deserved popularity of Gounod's Faust?—Abbé Liszt has been entertained with an "aubade" by the Pirna Liedergesellschaft, at Weimar.—The Fenice at Venice will open again in the autumn, under the new management of Signor Brenello, an impresario not unknown to fame.—Madame Montigny-Remaury left London for Paris on Sunday. The performances of this lady at the Covent Garden concerts will not be easily forgotten.—Boccaccio, a new opera by that lively and popular, though rather superficial composer, Herr Suppé, is to be given at the Carl Theatre, Vienna, in the winter.—Madame Trebelli has been singing at Prague. She returns to Her Majesty's Theatre, for the performances at reduced prices, the new part assigned to her being that of the heroine of Bizet's Carmen, a somewhat trying ordeal, more especially in a dramatic sense, after the sensation created so recently by Miss Minnie Hauk.—The announcement that Mr. Carl Rosa's London season of English Opera will be held this season at Her Majesty's Theatre, though it has taken many by surprise, is hailed with general satisfaction. Bizet's Carmen, adapted especially by Mr. Henry Hersee for Mr. Rosa's company, will form one of the chief attractions; but who is to be the adventurous Carmen No. 3 has not yet been made known, though Mdlle. Dolaro has been spoken of.—Madame Christine Nilsson is in Paris, but returns to England very shortly, for her tour in the country with Mr. Pyatt, in which she is associated with Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and other distinguished artists.—The Imperial Opera House at Vienna has reopened with the Prophète of Meyerbeer. The rehearsals for Wagner's Siegfried, Part 3 of the Tetralogy of the Ring des Nibelungen, and for Gounod's pastoral opera, Philémon et Baucis, are meanwhile actively proceeding. The former will be directed by Herr Richter, whom we all remember as the Wagnerian conductor par excellence. Both Lisbon and Madrid are in treaty with Madame Christine Nilsson for the winter, but the accomplished prima donna has not yet made up her mind.—Dr. Hans von Bulow has been playing at Baden Baden. He returns immediately to his post as director of music at the Theatre Royal, Hanover, where he intends bringing out the Russian Glinka's opera, Life for the Czar.—The most popular dramatic composer for some time past at Prague is a Czech, called Smetano, who has produced several operas at the National Theatre, and who has a new one accepted by Herr Klicka, the manager. Smetano is both deaf and dumb.—The Swedish student vocalists from Upsala have been singing with applause at the Gurzenich, Cologne, where Dr. Ferdinand Hiller reigns supreme.—Mr. Mapleson has engaged our promising countryman, Mr. Pratt, as one of the principal baritones for his New York Operatic Company.—The popular Swedish composer, Hindblad (not "Lindblad") died but recently. Lindblad has been styled, not without reason, the "Scandinavian Schubert."

THEATRES

THE management of the GAIETY Theatre is hardly to be congratulated on the production of Mr. F. C. Burnand's Jeames, a dramatic version of Thackeray's "Jeames' Diary," in the guise of a "new and original comedy." "Jeames' Diary," which originally appeared in serial form in the pages of Punch, was never to our mind one of Thackeray's happiest conceptions, and it certainly has not been improved upon by being placed upon the stage, where the inherent vulgarity of the parvenu footman becomes rather repulsive and wearisome than amusing, while the utter improbability of the incidents depicted, though pardonable enough in burlesque or broad farce, is apt to jar upon the spectator when spun out to the length of a four-act comedy. In a preface to the play, Mr. Burnand tells us that in adapting the story he has "availed himself of all the exaggerations of character and incident which are of the essence of the original caricature, and has merely made such alterations as seemed to him necessary in order to suit the circumstances of the present time." Thus he has enriched his hero, William Blodder, alias Jeames de la Pluche, Esq., by means of mining speculations instead of through the railway mania of the days of King Hudson, as a caricature of which "Jeames's Diary" was originally written; while the chambers in the "Halbany" have been replaced by a house in Mayfair. The names of the characters, however, have been retained, and the main incidents of the story, with a few exceptions, generally adhered to. To briefly detail the plot, "Jeames" (Mr. Edward Terry), a footman in service of a banker, Sir John Aldgate (Mr. Squire), with the aid of some savings and a little money borrowed from his sweetheart, a fellow servant, Mary Anne Hoggins (Miss E. Farren), speculates in some shares in a gold mine, and suddenly, by a turn of Fortune's wheel, finds himself the possessor of 50,000*l.*, and the lion of the financial world. Under these circumstances, he at once enters "Society," breaks off all relations with Mary Anne, and becomes a favoured suitor for the hand of Lady Angelina (Miss E. Muir), the daughter of Lord and Lady Bareacres (Mr. J. Maclean and Mrs. Ball). After various humorous scenes, in one of which his washerwoman grandmother (Mrs. Leigh) and his gardener Uncle Bill (Mr. E. Royce) unexpectedly visit him in the midst of his grandeur, and though insulted by his guests, are welcomed by him, notwithstanding that they have driven over from Ealing in the "wegetable cart," Jeames gets up one morning to find that his agent Warren (Mr. Elton) has decamped that his banker (Sir John Aldgate) has followed suit, that Lady Angelina has eloped, that all his shares are worthless, and that he is only saved from immediate arrest through the instrumentality of Mary Anne. Jeames, now scorned by "Society," retires to his granny's cottage at Ealing, dutifully turns the mangle, and, after due probation, is permitted to marry Mary Anne, and is presented with a public-house by Lady Angelina. Although, as may be seen, Jeames is by no means lacking in incident, the dialogue is frequently exceedingly dull and spiritless, and the continued aspect of Mr. Terry attitudinising grotesquely, mispronouncing ordinary words, and misplacing his "h's," ends by becoming somewhat monotonous. Still, regarded as an interpretation of the character, Mr. Terry's portrayal of Jeames was admirable, and the contrast between the hero as the parvenu in all the pomp and glory of fortune, and as the broken-hearted washerwoman's help striving his utmost to repay the kindness of his relatives, was really excellent. Miss Farren, also, as the good-hearted Mary Anne, deserves high praise, while versatile Mr. Royce was a most life-like market-gardener. Mr. Soutar was amusing as Jeames' enemy, the butler Screw, while a meed of praise should be accorded to Miss Eveleen Rayne, who made a good deal of a small part—Emily, daughter of Sir John Aldgate. Indeed, the acting throughout was of a very high character, but the dialogue will have to be bountifully pruned before Jeames can be conscientiously pronounced a success.

The revival of Our American Cousin at its old home in the HAYMARKET calls for little comment, beyond that Mr. Buckstone has resigned the part of Asa Trenchard to Mr. Walter Bentley, who certainly has acquired—what Mr. Buckstone never did—a mastery of the idiosyncrasies of the American accent. Indeed, though his interpretation of the character is to our mind even too unrefined for a "down Vermont" man (we have never known an American who was in the habit of walking into a ladies' drawing-room with his hat on, calling the butler "Old Hoss," and doubling him up in the stomach), it is not without power; the scene where he reads the will being admirably rendered. There is no new feature about Mr. Sothern's Lord Dundreary; and the other parts, with two exceptions, were too inadequately filled to be worthy of mention. Miss Julia Stewart, however, deserves a word of praise as simple-minded May Meredith, while Miss Edith Challis fairly represents her more pretentious cousin Florence.

At the STRAND, Mr. George Honey displays his versatile powers as a comedian in a musical extravaganza, An Ambassador from Below, by Robert Brough and Sutherland Edwards, and also in Andrew Halliday's comedy of Love and Money. In the first-mentioned piece Mephistopheles junior, "the ambassador from below," plays tricks with the connubial bliss of two newly-married couples, and much fun results from the changed demeanour of the husbands and wives towards each other when "the devil is in them." Mr. Honey, who is the central figure, is ably supported by Miss Gourlay as an ingénue fresh from a convent school. In Love and Money Mr. Honey's Major Buncombe is extremely diverting, and Miss Gourlay and Miss Telbin render very efficient aid as the two daughters, one of whom marries for money and comes to beggary, while the other weds the man of her heart, a poor clerk, who by and by succeeds to a fortune. Each piece is plentifully spiced with expressions of more than doubtful meaning, but we are bound to add that these were received by the audience with evident approval and enjoyment.

The coloured troupe, as they are called, of actors and singers who have won great popularity in the United States, are to appear this evening for the first time in London at the PRINCESS'S Theatre, in a new dramatic version of Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin. "One hundred freed slaves" will, according to the announcement, take part in the performance. The company bring with them complete scenery and accessories of a picturesque and elaborate character. It is hardly necessary to say that the coloured performers will only appear in the negro parts. The part of the ruffian Legree will be sustained by Mr. Rowe, the author of the play. It is said that the most remarkable scene in the performance is the plantation festival scene, in the course of which the company will sing and perform on their instruments a great number of plantation songs and choruses, and will dance a variety of characteristic dances.

The GLOBE Theatre, which has passed into the hands of Mr. Henderson, will re-open this evening with a new domestic drama in two acts, entitled, Rag Fair and May Fair. The author is Mr. Mackay. The drama will be followed by Les Cloches de Corneville, transferred here from the FOLLY, with some new features.—Mr. Phelps is, we are glad to learn, recovering from his recent severe illness. His return to the stage is shortly expected. The season at the COURT Theatre will be brought to a close on Saturday next, when Olivia will be performed for the last time.—The ROYALTY Theatre, lately in the hands of Miss Fowler, is to be opened shortly, under the management of Mr. W. H. Stephens.—The DUKE'S Theatre will re-open on Saturday next, under the management of Messrs. Holt and Wilmot, whose intention appears to be to devote the house to melodrama. The stalls and amphitheatre are to be abolished; pit, gallery, and boxes are accordingly to be the only recognised divisions.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.——The success which previously attended the removal of the site of the firework display to the Japanese Village induced Mr. James Pain, the Palace pyrotechnist, to repeat the experiment on Saturday last. The entire village and grove were illuminated by coloured fires, which, with the clouds of smoke that rolled upwards, produced a novel effect, the scene looking really like a wood on fire. The display also included a revolving device commencing with a triangular form in diamond jets, changing to larger intersecting circles studded with various gems, and surrounded with circlets of crimson and gold, the whole concluding with a revolving iris wheel of great brilliancy. There was also a "Great Japanese Fire Dragon," which the visitors however were unable to see in consequence of an ill wind that blew the smoke in an unfavourable direction. An important feature of the programme is the series of English Operas which has been running some time, the work selected on this occasion being Wallace's Maritana. Mr. J. W. Turner as Don Cæsar earned some well-merited applause, as also did Madame Blanche Cole, as the heroine. The Nubians bade farewell to the public, shaking hands with the audience with an easy unaffected grace. To-day, Auber's Crown Diamonds is the opera selected.

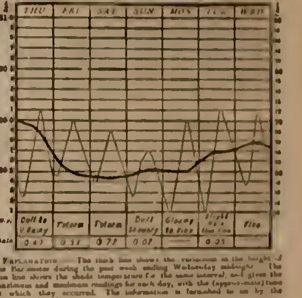
AUGUST 22ND TO AUGUST 28TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——We have again to record a week of wet, changeable weather in which thunderstorms of unusual severity have been experienced all over the country, accompanied by large quantities of rain. The rains on Thursday (22nd), Friday (23rd), and Saturday (24th inst.), amounted to no less than 1·7 inches, and the thunderstorm on the last named day was exceptionally heavy, even in a stormy year, in and around London. Sunday (25th), Monday (26th), Tuesday (27th), and Wednesday (28th), were much finer in the south-eastern counties, but at midnight on Wednesday (28th inst.) the appearance was again threatening in the south, and on Thursday morning (29th) another thunderstorm passed over London, giving [illegible] of rain in [illegible] minutes of duration.

The barometer was highest ([illegible] inches) on Thursday (22nd); lowest ([illegible] inches) on Saturday (24th); range, [illegible] inches. Temperature was highest (70°) on Thursday (22nd) and Tuesday (27th); lowest (51°) on Monday (26th) and Tuesday (27th); range, [illegible]. Rainfall. Total fall was [illegible] inches on five days; greatest fall 0·72 inches, on Saturday (24th).

THE NOBLE REDSKINS AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION are not altogether "what they seem," if we are to believe a Transatlantic contemporary, which states that "some 'real' North American Indians are masquerading at the Paris Exposition in a disguise consisting of beads, buckskin, and paint. The Parisians are led to believe that this is their native costume, whereas Americans know well enough that [illegible] Indian of the period wears an old stovepipe hat, dilapidated trousers, and a coat with a whiskey-bottle in the pocket."

Mr. Justice Keogh.——The Evening Telegraph of Dublin states that Mr. Justice Keogh had been since the last assizes suffering from a malady which, it is believed, culminated in homicidal mania. On two or three occasions lately he exhibited symptoms which led his friends to anticipate that his services as a judge would soon be closed, and they have now placed him under medical care and strict surveillance. Mr. Edward Keogh, of the Temple, however, writes that this report is premature, the learned judge's health being such as to give every hope that he will be able to resume his duties at the usual period. Some of the 'national' papers in Ireland have attacked the character of the unfortunate judge in the coarsest and most revolting language. The Irishman says that his fellow deceiver Sadleir, like Castlereagh, avenged his country by slaying himself, and "Men thought the patience of the Lord was long, but now, behold, we have seen Providence delayed over the greater culprit that his punishment might be the most awful of all." The Nation says that "Out of evil sometimes comes good. He will never again be allowed to indulge in fits of temporary insanity on the Bench. We shall have from him no more such insane performances as the Galway judgment, and the charge to the Derry Grand Jury." The Weekly News asks whether he will be put on his trial for the attempted assassination of his servant; complains that the Belgian police took no steps for the vindication of justice, and hints that there is a conspiracy to hush the matter up. It adds "John Sadleir killed himself, so the story goes, and now Keogh tries to kill another. The latter has not yet come to the end of the chapter. When he does he may find by experience that though 'the mill of God grinds slowly, yet it grinds exceedingly small.'" These comments have excited the greatest indignation amongst all classes in Dublin. The Evening Mail remarks, "Such brutal language is used, such shocking profanity indulged in, and such glaring glee fiendishly expressed, as it must pain every true Irishman to see printed on Irish soil."

The Metropolitan Police.——Another new department is to be formed at Scotland Yard, the "Public-house Register Department," in connection with which Mr. J. E. Davis, the legal adviser to the Chief Commissioner, has issued an order to the whole of the divisions within the metropolitan district, calling for returns of a most voluminous character. A report is to be furnished by the various superintendents, of every public-house on their grounds, and all particulars connected therewith. The value (approximate), the rental, and the rateable value of each house is to be given; also whether it was licensed under the old Act or new; the number of tenants it has had since the passing of the Act of 1872, what they were before they entered the business, and (in the case of those that have left the house) what they are doing now, whether the house bears a good name, or whether there have been any convictions against it or the holder of the license. The Committee of the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society have advised the members of the trade to decline to answer any such queries. The Home Secretary has approved of the report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the pay and organisation of the Metropolitan police, and the alterations with regard to wages and promotion recommended by them will take effect from the 19th inst. The concessions thus granted are only looked upon by the men as an instalment of the good things in store for them.

Miscellaneous.——The longest Act of Parliament passed in the recent Session was to consolidate and amend the law relating to public health in Ireland. There are 294 clauses in the statute, and several schedules, extending to thirty-four sheets. The Act is divided into several parts, and treats on sanitary matters and infectious diseases. Among the penalties is one of 10*l.* for any person holding a "wake" over a person dying of an infectious disorder.—Mr. Knox, the senior magistrate at the Marlborough Police Court, has retired from the bench owing to continued illness. He was appointed about thirteen years ago.—Horsemonger Lane Gaol is to be closed from to-day (Saturday). Remanded prisoners from the South London police-courts will be sent to the Clerkenwell House of Detention, and others to Wandsworth Gaol.—M. Lambri's action for libel against Truth will be removed by writ of certiorari to the Court of Queen's Bench in the event of a "true bill" being found against the defendants at the Central Criminal Court.—Mrs. Roushy has quarrelled with her husband about the possession of their child, a girl aged eight; and each declares that the other is not a proper custodian. The case was last week heard before Mr. Justice Manisty, who ordered the child into the keeping of Mrs. Roushy's sister, with liberty to the mother to have access to it from time to time.—Mr. Scott Russell, the well-known engineer, and four of his workmen, were last week charged with committing an assault upon a solicitor's clerk who had been sent to take possession of Mr. Russell's house and lands at Sydenham on an order of foreclosure. Mr. Rook, the complainant, said that he produced the legal documents, but Mr. Russell refused admission to the men he had brought with him; and struck him several times. He was eventually ejected from the house. A cross-summons was taken out by Mr. Russell, who deposed to being assaulted by Rook while forcing a second entrance into his house. With regard to forcing Rook and his two men out, he had sanctioned his gardener to get the assistance of eight or nine men to remove the intruders, and the men engaged were ordered not to use violence, and nothing but "gentle violence" was used. Rook was followed by three men along the hall, and walked down the stairs of the back kitchen, and passed out of an open door into the road. The case was ultimately adjourned to the Quarter Sessions at Maidstone, the defendants' recognisances being accepted.—On Sunday last the police made a raid upon a gaming house in Whitechapel. They forced their way in and saw eleven men sitting at two tables on which were piles of money and cards. There was an immediate rush, some making for the door, others for the window, and some scrambling for the money on the tables. When quiet had been somewhat obtained, and the men told they were all in custody, the house was searched. Large quantities of playing cards were found. The occupant of the house, his wife, and eighteen men were arrested on Monday, and taken before the magistrate, who discharged the woman, but imposed a fine of 50*l.* on the keeper of the house, and one of 5*l.* upon each of his guests. Some of the fines were paid, but the majority of the prisoners were locked up. One of the accused said that in three weeks he had lost 25*l.* in the house at card playing.—A young man is in custody at Dover on a charge of robbing his father of 1,150*l.* worth of foreign bonds. He appears to have fallen in love with a girl whom he met in the town, and, being unable to obtain his father's consent to their union, he absconded with the cashbox and got married secretly.—The other day a "confidence trick" practitioner was cleverly checkmated by a gentleman whom he sought to victimise. They met in one of the parks, and the usual story of suddenly acquired fortune and charitable intentions having been told, the gentleman was asked to show his confidence by giving up his money for a short time. He, however, pretended that he had only an order for 1,000*l.* with him, and agreed to meet next day, and when the unsuspecting rogue kept the appointment he was given into custody. Some "Bank of Elegance" and "Bank of Engraving" notes were found upon him, and he now lies under remand on a charge of attempted fraud.—At Bristol a boy-burglar, aged fifteen, is in custody for a series of robberies committed during the past six weeks at houses the occupants of which had left home for their summer holiday. The stolen property found at his lodgings, and produced in court, consisted of books, pictures, linen, and other articles, and was valued at several hundreds of pounds. His plan was simply to break into the house and pack a portmanteau with any valuables which he could find, and then go off by tram or cab. Various house-breaking tools were found in his rooms, some sensational books, including "Jack Sheppard" and a periodical called "Jack Harkaway in America," the covers of which were adorned with engravings of revolvers and bowie-knives. The youthful cracksman is said to be respectably connected, but he has already served two years in a reformatory.—There is something in a name, after all. A man named Joseph Grimaldi was taken before Mr. Flowers on Tuesday charged with being drunk in Regent Street on the previous evening. The magistrate thought that it would be a pity that such a famous name should be disgraced by a conviction, so the offender was let off with a caution.—On Sunday night a convict under sentence of fourteen years' penal servitude for burglary escaped from Chatham Prison. He tore up the stone pavement of his cell, and made his way through some brick-work into the ventilating flue, at the end of which he removed some bricks from a wall, and thus got into the corridor, and thence to the yard, the wall of which he scaled by means of a gas-pipe which he tore from the building. All this was done without attracting the attention of the night-watchmen on duty inside and outside the prison. After regaining his liberty he is supposed to have broken into a house occupied by the engineer of the prison, and helped himself to some wearing apparel, a knife, a hammer, and an opera-glass; and subsequently to have visited a barge at one of the wharves, from the cabin of which he took some more clothing and some money. The usual reward of 5*l.* is offered for his re-arrest.—Some curious statistics are furnished by the Lunacy Commissioners of the causes of insanity, supplementary to those which were published some time ago. Out of 1,221 paralytics admitted into asylums, &c., in England and Wales in one year, it seems that the insanity of 49 was attributable to domestic trouble and bereavement, 9 to religious excitement, 76 to business anxieties and pecuniary difficulties, 1 to a love affair, 58 to mental anxiety, 6 to fright and nervous shock, 272 to intemperance, 42 to over work, 38 to sunstroke, 57 to accident or injury, 103 to hereditary causes, whilst in 178 cases the cause of insanity was unknown.

WASTING DISEASES OF CHILDREN.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bt., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod Liver Oil as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. PROSSER JAMES,
Lecturer on Materia Medica, London Hospital.
"Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod Liver Oil contains the whole of the active ingredients of the remedy, and is easily digested. Hence its value, not only in Diseases of the Throat and Lungs, but in a great number of cases to which the Profession is extending its use."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician to the Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod Liver Oil possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod Liver Oil, that Dr. de Jongh's Oil was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

Topics of the Week

THE COLLISION ON THE THAMES.——By a curious coincidence, the inquiry into the loss of the Eurydice had hardly come to an end when the country was called upon to sorrow for an even more awful calamity. Scarcely a single element of horror is absent from the dreadful collision which happened on the Thames last Tuesday evening. The Princess Alice, with a freight of some 700 happy holiday people on board, was steaming up the river just below Woolwich, when, through one cause or another, she came into collision with an outward-bound screw collier, and within five minutes the pleasure boat went down like a stone. During the brief interval between the collision and the sinking the wildest panic seems to have prevailed on board, so that nothing could be done by the captain or crew towards saving the passengers' lives. Indeed, had every one remained perfectly calm and collected, the result could not have been otherwise than it was, as the means and appliances for saving life on board the Princess Alice were utterly inadequate for so many people. As to which vessel was to blame for the collision, a considerable conflict of opinion exists among those who witnessed the tragedy. We believe that the saloon boats do not very readily answer the helm, while their great length necessarily makes them somewhat slow in turning. From the account given by one of the survivors, it would almost appear that the captain of the Princess Alice did not see the big collier until a collision was inevitable. There must have been nearly complete darkness when the accident happened, as it was about eight o'clock, and no moon up. The question that presents itself in presence of this fact is as to whether both vessels carried the regulation lights. As a rule, sea-going steamers are very particular in this respect, but we have known the precaution postponed on board pleasure-boats until some time after darkness had set in. On the river below bridge it is commonly said that every one had better get out of the road of steam colliers, as they make room for nobody. We are not aware whether any grounds exist for this innuendo, but the utterly unaccountable nature of the accident leaves no room for doubting that there must have been the most culpable negligence on board one vessel, if not in both. A more awful calamity has rarely happened under circumstances which were apparently all on the side of safety, and it is due to those who now receive the heart-felt sympathy of the nation that the fullest and most searching inquiry should be made into the cause of the catastrophe which has wrenched from them their nearest and dearest.

PHYSICIANS' FEES.——This subject, in its various bearings, has been pretty well threshed out in our daily contemporaries, and need not here be discussed at any length. Our inclination is to side with the physicians. If a physician's opinion was worth a guinea in Queen Anne's time, it is surely worth two guineas now, not only because the purchasing-power of money has diminished, but because the modern physician has (owing to the two centuries of progress which have since intervened) a more valuable commodity to sell than the contemporaries of Radcliffe had. We suspect that the people who growl at the two-guinea fee belong for the most part to that valetudinarian tribe, who run about from one physician to another, and who are always anxious to have a fresh opinion on their case. But why should the amount of the fee which a physician considers to be his proper due be made a matter of such delicacy and mystery? In their aversion to the methods pursued by quacks, respectable medical men are apt to rush into the opposite extreme. Why should it be contrary to etiquette for a physician or surgeon to advertise his business in the public prints? Already he advertises himself by placing his name in the Post Office Directory, and still more by fixing a brass plate on his door. Why should a brass plate be the right thing, and a newspaper advertisement be utterly objectionable? They are both means of attaining publicity. As matters now stand, a man who, after years of sound health, has occasion to consult a physician, finds himself quite at a loss where to go. He neither knows the names of the best men, nor who is likely to be the best man for his special case. The local practitioner could tell him, but he does not always care to ask the local practitioner such a question. It is like asking a disengaged cabman the way to a place without hiring his cab. We think the leaders of the medical profession generally would do well to put some of their dignity in their pockets, and take means to inform the public (collectively, if they please) of their hours of attendance, the fees which they expect, and the class of ailments to which they pay special attention. If they shrink from advertising in the newspapers, why should not a board containing the above information be hung in the entrance halls of the principal London hospitals? One result, we feel sure, would be that a good deal of money which now goes into the pockets of quacks and humbugs would be earned by men who would give what the Scotch call "excellent value" in exchange for their fees.

THE SITTINGBOURNE RAILWAY ACCIDENT.——The coroner's inquest on the victims of the shocking railway accident at Sittingbourne has terminated in a verdict equivalent to a finding of manslaughter against two of the employés. As these men are now awaiting trial, the question of their guilt or innocence cannot be touched upon. But there are some circumstances in connection with the disaster which are open to comment. The evidence given before the coroner showed that, even if the best possible form of brake had been fitted to the express train, a collision must have been inevitable, as the train could not have come to a standstill before reaching the goods vans. Colonel Rich even gave it as his opinion that the safest course would have been for the driver of the express to put on high speed and rush his train through the obstruction. It seems, however, that had the interlocking system been adopted at Sittingbourne, and had continuous brakes been fitted to the express, the driver would have had just sufficient time to pull up before collision. A suggestion has been thrown out in some quarters that no shunting should be allowed at any station when a through train is expected. We quite agree with this opinion, so far as shunting on to the main line goes. But to stop shunting on sidings in this peremptory fashion would bring about a congestion of the goods traffic, and this might have the untoward effect of increasing the number of accidents. Nor do we make much of the proposal that through trains should slacken speed when approaching stations at which they are not intended to stop. If this nervous counsel were followed, there would soon be an outburst of public indignation against the inordinate slowness of the railways. Even as it is, the general complaint against the southern lines runs somewhat to this effect, and there would be a pretty to-do if Brighton, or St. Leonard's, or Ramsgate were removed another hour's rail journey further from the metropolis. The chief requirement on the holiday railways seems to be the doubling of the main lines within twenty or thirty miles of London. Delays are constantly being caused by the congestion of traffic within this radius, and, of all the causes of railway accidents, a want of punctuality is perhaps the most fertile.

GERMAN versus ENGLISH CLERKS.——The commercial clerk—unless he possesses a special knowledge of goods or markets, in which case he scarcely comes under the denomination of clerk—is rarely too well paid. Nor can he venture to try and better his position by striking for higher wages. When the masons employed at the Law Courts struck last year substitutes had to be procured from the Continent and from America. But there are so many men who can write and cipher, who can make out invoices and answer letters, that the place of a recalcitrant clerk is very easily filled up. It is for this reason, no doubt, that in many commercial houses (to the detriment of the regular professional clerks) so much of the work is done by unpaid youths whose parents send them into the City in hopes that they will there find the road to competency. But of late years the old-fashioned clerk has found himself confronted with a new and a still more formidable competitor. Foreign houses — especially German houses — have increased enormously in number. It was natural that these houses should employ clerks of their own nationality, but by degrees these German clerks have overflowed their original limits, and are now found serving English firms to the manifest displacement of home-grown quill-drivers. What are the special merits of these Teutonic invaders? They are patient and persevering, they live cheaply and are therefore ready to accept low pay, but, above all, they are excellent linguists. The great majority of them are thoroughly conversant with three languages, whereas it is rare to find an Englishman of the clerk class who understands any tongue but his own. The reason of this of course is, not that the English are naturally more stupid than the Germans, but that it is of more consequence for a German to learn English than for an Englishman to learn German. A German who only knows German is practically deaf and dumb directly he leaves the Fatherland, parts of Switzerland and Austria excepted; whereas the Briton may circumnavigate the world, he may cross the American Continent, and penetrate to the Antipodes without quitting the company of English-speaking men and women. The fact that we have an Empire on which the sun never sets decidedly tends to make us bad linguists. And if the French, like ourselves, are awkward at foreign languages, it is because they also have an Empire, not of material acres, but of art, of grace, and of wit, which extends all over the civilised world. It is, however, cold comfort to possess world-wide empires, whether intellectual or material, provided you cannot earn a living. The Frenchman in Paris finds himself elbowed out by the Belgian and the Italian, just as the Englishman in London is displaced by the German. Meanwhile, what can be done to place our clerks on a par with their foreign rivals? The only real remedy is to afford our middle classes the opportunity of as cheap and efficient an education as their German cousins receive. And surely this ought not to be impossible. Otherwise, in these days of keen competition, we run serious risk of being outdone, not merely in the counting-house, but in almost every department of enterprise.

AUSTRIA AND THE PORTE.——There are not wanting some indications that the Porte has at last determined to withdraw from any further resistance, direct or indirect, to the wishes of Europe. It is true that the projected Austro-Turkish Convention hangs fire, but, on the other hand, the resistance of the Bosnian Mahomedans appears to be languishing for the want of more effective assistance from the Turkish commanders. Away in Armenia, the conditions of the Berlin Treaty are receiving practical ratification by the withdrawal of the Ottoman forces from the territory annexed by Russia. The Lazis, too, who a little while ago were so full of fight, are now reported to be more inclined for emigration. They appear to have entertained a conviction that, in the last resort, the Sultan would give Dervish Pasha orders to retain possession of Batoum and the neighbouring territory at any cost, thus, perhaps, bringing England into the field. Fortunately, the Sultan saw the uselessness of continuing the abortive struggle, and there accordingly seems every reason to expect that Batoum will pass into Russian hands without fruitless bloodshed. While trusting, in the interests of humanity, that this may prove the case, it is impossible to help feeling profound pity and sympathy for the Lazis. Muscovite government may possibly be the most charming thing in the world, but these primitive people fail to see it in exactly that light. They prefer—it may be a strange aberration of taste—the form of rule which they and their forefathers have lived under with tolerable contentment from time immemorial. The Turkish Pasha is not, perhaps, the most capable administrator in the world, for, sooth to say, he possesses a terribly itching palm. But in this respect, a Russian general is fully his equal, while the latter has the additional demerit, in Moslem eyes, of being a pestilent infidel. If Wales were suddenly handed over, "bag and baggage" to the high-souled Shah of Persia, the sons of the Cymry would, we fancy, be mightily disposed to emigrate into England, sooner than live under the beneficent rule of that exalted Paynim. The Bosnians and Lazis are quite as strict patriots as the Welsh, and hence there will be little reason for astonishment, if they forsake their native countries before the advancing tide of Austrian and Russian civilisation. The necessity is deplorable, but submission to kismet seems every way preferable to a profitless slaughter of human beings, even when they happen to belong to an "unspeakable" race.

THE SO-CALLED "SILLY SEASON."——When electric telegraphs were unknown, and railways were in their infancy, there was some propriety in the time-honoured jokes about the "silly season." In those days editors did really sometimes run short of news, and so were ready to give admission to paragraphs about gigantic gooseberries and other wonderful phenomena, which they would ruthlessly have excluded during the busier months of the year. But now that steam and lightning have practically reduced the whole world to the size of a county, and when special or occasional correspondents are dotted about all over the globe, there is never any lack of news. At the same time there is, from a journalistic point of view, a good deal of difference between June and September, and, so far from September being the height of the "silly season," the newspapers are, in the opinion of many people, more interesting now than when all the world is in London. There are no public banquets with their carefully-reported speeches; there are no Drawing-rooms or Levées, with their serried ranks of proper names; above all, there is no Parliament, with its long-drawn debates. The space thus saved can be occupied with other matter, and many newspaper readers incline to think that a lively discussion as to whether a physician ought to be paid one guinea or two, or as to the true shape of a bee's cell, is quite as interesting and profitable as the name of Lady Sophonisba Jones in a portentous list of fashionables, or a platitudinarian after-dinner speech, or a Home Rule squabble in the House of Commons. Moreover, the political foreign correspondent is no longer to the fore this autumn as he was during the spring and early summer, and when we remember that the few grains of solid fact which he imparted to us were usually served up in a huge quantity of vague surmise and rumour, we do not regret that he has temporarily retired into the background, and that his place is supplied by descriptions of sundry holiday resorts. Altogether, so far from this being the "silly season," we hold that the daily newspapers display some of their most attractive features during those balmy weeks when summer is gradually gliding into autumn.

THE LOSS OF THE "EURYDICE."——The Eurydice Court Martial has terminated in a finding evidently attributable to the influence of the maxim, De mortuis nil nisi bonum. It was only natural that a tribunal composed of officers belonging to the same service as Captain Hare, who were aware of how greatly that most gallant gentleman was respected and loved in the Navy, should find it impossible to say a word against the dead man. Yet the finding cannot be considered satisfactory, for it affirms that the loss of the Eurydice was beyond human power to prevent. In other words, that whenever one of Her Majesty's ships is caught in a squall near the Isle of Wight, she must inevitably go to the bottom. While wishing to pay every honour to the memory of as fine a seaman and as zealous an officer as ever trod a British quarter-deck, we must demur to the Court's finding that no one was to blame for the foundering of the ill-fated Eurydice. The facts of the case are so very simple that it does not need much nautical expertness to arrive at reasonably sound judgment. In the face of a steadily falling barometer, Captain Hare covered his ship with canvas from deck to truck, and at the same time left some of her lee ports open. This was risky work enough, in all conscience, but he increased the danger by hugging the land, so that any squall coming over the Wight could only be seen from the deck of the ship just before it struck her upper sails. And, when matters were in this perilous state, a large portion of the crew were allowed to go below, instead of remaining on deck to lend a hand at taking in sail. It is scarcely possible to doubt that the Eurydice would have reached Spithead in safety, had her commander adopted only one of three possible precautions. It was open to him to give attention to the stern warning of the barometer either by shortening sail, or by closing the lee ports, or by giving the land a wide offing. Justifiable pride in the seamanship acquired by his originally "ragged" crew unfortunately made him over confident, and it also may have influenced him to carry on so close to land by way of showing the smartness of his well-loved lads. Thus there is an ample field for extenuation, and we quite agree that it would be an evil thing for England if her naval commanders were to show any lack of daring. But to say that no one was to blame for the loss of the Eurydice seems to be stretching the De mortuis maxim to the breaking point.

A NEW SOCIALIST ORGAN.—England is confessedly the land of free speech, and for this reason doubtless has been chosen as the birthplace of a Socialist Revolutionary journal called La Guerre Sociale, the first number of which (published in French and Italian) is to appear on the 20th inst. We doubt if any Continental Government would sanction the publication of a journal preceded by such a thoroughgoing—not to say bloodthirsty—prospectus as that which lies before us, but perhaps, for the sake of attracting subscribers, the prospectus is more violent than the forthcoming journal, just as the painted lion outside the wild beast show is far bigger and fiercer than the real lion inside. The prospectus begins by frankly stating that journals are all very well, but that the musket is by far the better weapon of the two, and that mere discussion is of little avail when a cannon is pointed at your breast. La Guerre Sociale is intended "to plead the cause of the hungry against the full, of the workmen who ask for bread and freedom in exchange for their labour against those who lord it over the world seated on a pile of corpses." With regard to property; all property, whether consisting of land, machinery, or of other instruments of labour, is to be held in common, the right of their complete product being reserved to the producers. In this last sentence there is nothing very terrible to the political economist if it means, as we take it, that each workman is entitled to the additional value which his labour has conferred on a commodity. But when we go on to read that wages, inheritance, and usury are all to be abolished, we feel that we are stepping out of the actual world into a Utopia. Hitherto we have steered clear of theology. But the next paragraph informs us that La Guerre Sociale, "the foe to God, will join issue with this monstrous metaphysical conception in order to avenge Science, and to confound the band of hypocrites who by the perpetuation of this fable have for long carried on a base and scandalous traffic." When we bear in mind that the God here spoken of is God as depicted by the Roman Catholic priest, we need not be surprised at this outburst. What surprises us far more is that these modern Socialists are so oblivious of the teachings of History. Against whom would they use the muskets of which they boast? We presume they intend to use these weapons against kings and capitalists. But these words "king" and "capitalist" are capable of indefinite extension. They soon come to mean anybody who exercises any authority, or who has any property. Thus it was that the Socialists of 1793, who began by cutting off the head of a king, found themselves within a twelvemonth shedding torrents of plebeian blood. And the worst of it is that this violence is invariably followed by despotism. As M. de Cassagnac says, "After Robespierre marches Bonaparte." After the frothy absurdities of La Guerre Sociale, it is quite refreshing to turn to the programme of the Trades Union Congress which meets next Monday at Bristol. Here, possibly, we have Radicalism, but it is good, sturdy, English Radicalism, which courts discussion, and proposes to achieve its aims by fair argument and persuasion.

THE RHODOPE COMMISSION

As soon as the Berlin Congress had concluded its work an International Commission was formed at Constantinople in order to investigate the grievances of the malcontents in the Rhodope Mountains, where the Mahometan inhabitants of the surrounding districts were maintaining open insurrection against the Russians, and also to inquire into the state of the refugees in the neighbourhood, and the ill-treatment which it was asserted they had received at the hands of the Russians and the Bulgarians. A Russo-Turkish Commission had already vainly tried to induce the Rhodope insurgents to come to terms, but it was thought that an International Commission composed of Austrian, German, British, Russian, French, Italian, and Turkish delegates, as representatives of the Seven European Powers, would be able to exercise a stronger influence. The Commissioners accordingly started towards the end of July for Philippopolis, but finding that the roads thence to the mountains were bad, and that considerable difficulty would be experienced in reaching the villages, they returned to Adrianople, and travelled to the Rhodope range by way of Lagos. On arriving in the affected districts they at once entered diligently upon their work of inquiry, visiting the various points, and making personal investigations into the complaints of the refugees and of the insurgents. Although the official report has not yet been published, it is manifest that the most revolting details of outrages and cruelties committed by the Bulgarians and the Russian soldiery were proved to be true, the most horrible stories of the ill-treatment of women and girls, literally by the score, and of the bayonetting of children, being related by the unfortunate refugees, while whole villages were found to have been destroyed, and their inhabitants expelled and despoiled of all they possessed. The Russian delegate left the Commission and returned to Constantinople before the inquiry had terminated, declaring his dissatisfaction at the mode in which it was being conducted, and alleging that the Commissioners were rather seeking out Russian outrages than performing the work for which they had been appointed—to ascertain the best means of ameliorating the condition of the refugees and of restoring them to their homes. In fact, the Russians had been averse to the Commission from the beginning, and had at first attempted to confine the sphere of the inquiry to outside the Russian lines. The Russian people are also highly indignant at the stories which have been published of the cruelties committed by their troops, accuse England of trying to gain popularity in Bulgaria, and are discounting the official report by declaring the Russian commanders incapable of committing such atrocities. Our sketches represent two episodes during the stay of the Commissioners at Gabrova. The first represents the reception of a Russian flag of truce by Hydayet Bey, a chief of the insurgents, and the unblinding of the Russian Parlementary. The Turkish officer unblinding the Russian messenger [Colonel Dimitrieff] is the aide-de-camp to Rahi Bey, and the officer sitting down is Hydayet Bey. The other personages are as follows, beginning from the right: Hadji Ibrahim Effendi, second secretary to Hydayet Bey, Skinder Bey and El Hass Bey, aides-de-camp, Mullah Murad, and Fesulah, the Chief of the Insurgent Cavalry. In the second sketch the European Commissioners are busy at work at Gabrova, examining the victims of Russian brutality at Kuskalar. Consul Fawcett is interrogating the unfortunates; and the remaining Europeans are the various members of the Commission.

THE TYNEMOUTH AQUARIUM

The new Aquarium and Winter Garden at Tynemouth, which was last week opened by Mr. T. E. Smith, M.P., the hon. member for the borough, has been erected by an enterprising company at a cost of about 80,000*l.*, the architects being Messrs. Norton and Mason of London. The building stands upon the precipitous cliff overlooking the Long Sands, and has a magnificent sea frontage. It has two floors, the lower being devoted to the Aquarium and the upper to the Winter Garden. The Aquarium Hall is 210 feet in length by 50 feet in width, and upon the same level are refreshment saloons, dining room, billiard room, cellar, and apartments for the attendants. In the basement beneath are an arcade of novel construction, and the heating chamber, reservoir, and engine room. The Winter Garden is above and of the same dimensions as the Aquarium, and the walls are of stone filled in with glass, the dome shaped roof being of iron and glass. The wings, which are not yet completed, will each contain an entrance-hall, supper and billiard room, with various business offices, and a high tower upon the roof of which a large water tank will be placed as a means of protecting the buildings from fire. The Winter Garden is already well supplied with choice plants of many varieties, and a grand organ has been erected at one end of the hall. The Aquarium, though by no means full, has yet a great many interesting specimens collected by Mr. Howard Birchell, the Company's naturalist, who has been engaged during the past twelve months in preparing the tanks for their reception. There are nineteen tanks in all, ten of which are filled with fresh water, and the remainder with sea water, and through these a constant circulation is kept up at the rate of 14,000 gallons per hour.

from England, is one of sixteen steamers employed by Messrs. Donald Currie and Co. in the Cape and Natal Royal Mail Services. She is 342 feet long, 38 feet broad, and 28 feet deep, has a tonnage of 3,000 tons, and was built by Messrs. R. Napier and Co., of Glasgow, the well-known Clyde builders, who also constructed her engines, which are of great power. Her average speed is twelve knots per hour, and she can accommodate a hundred first class, seventy second class, and a hundred third class passengers. The cabins are of the most ample description; every arrangement being made on board for the comfort and convenience of passengers. The dining-room is a square saloon extending across the ship, lighted from the sides and by a cupola in the centre, securing excellent ventilation.

The ladies' cabin is a commodious and handsomely-furnished apartment, and the state rooms throughout are well ventilated. On the upper deck there are extra state rooms and a smoking room, and in order to prevent the inconvenience arising from cooking on the spar deck, which is common on many vessels, the galley, with excellent bakery, butcher's shop, vegetable lockers, and other conveniences attached, is placed upon the upper deck. In the centre of the vessel an extensive promenade deck is provided for passengers.

"Bringing in Kaffir Prisoners" was an every-day incident at King Williamstown, at the time when our artist's sketch was taken. The native soldier marching proudly behind belongs to the friendly Fingoes, who have fought with us against the rebel tribes. The Army and Navy Gazette says that the local defences are about to be entirely re-organised by General Thesiger and his staff. The corps of Mounted Riflemen is to be resuscitated, and will consist of 1,000 men, and there is also to be a force of Yeomanry Cavalry 3,000 strong, and a Burgher Force in which every man from 18 to 30 years of age will be called upon to serve in the event of danger. The statements that the war was practically at an end in consequence of the death or capture of the principal rebel chiefs appear to have been premature. The Times of Tuesday last contains a letter from Kimberley dated July 31, in which the writer says that no greater mistake could be made than to think so. If we were lulled into any such idea, and for one moment lacked our vigilance, there would be a general rising of the blacks, who would then show us no mercy. There is certainly something more than ordinary in the wind, for at Litaklong the other day several of the prisoners captured belonged to tribes living hundreds of miles away. They came on business—and that business was war. If that surmise is right, we shall want about four times the number of European troops, or, what would be as good, natives from India, to cope with them. The blacks are for the most part well armed, fight well, and in some instances, I think, are commanded by Europeans. In a few of the fights I have noticed orders being sent to the front from certain points in the rear, and that is certainly not the way a native chief would carry out a battle or conduct himself during one. Again, the earthworks we took at Litablong were never planned by any Kaffir. I never saw anything like them in this country; and how could they know anything about such works?"

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE IN THE HOLY LAND. V.

At the foot of Mount Gerizim is situated a cistern which Jews, Christians, and Muslims agree is the Well of Jacob, mentioned in Genesis xxxiii. 19. The cistern is seventy-five feet deep, and a long rope is required for the purpose of drawing water. It was formerly deeper than now. In summer it is often dry. It is seven and a half feet in diameter, and is lined with masonry. The ruins of the church once built over it (which had been destroyed by the time of the Crusaders), and the numerous stones that have fallen or been thrown into it, have probably raised its bottom. If, as is probable, this well was the scene of our Saviour's conversation with the Samaritan woman, the tradition had already attached to it that this was Jacob's Well, and that around it was the field which he purchased, and where Joseph was afterwards buried.

The modern En-Nâsira is situated in a basin on the south slope of the Jebel-es-Sikh, on the site of the ancient Nazareth. The appearance of the little town, especially in spring, when its dazzling white walls are embosomed in a green frame-work of cactus-hedges, fig and olive-trees, is very pleasing. The population amounts to some ten thousand souls, of whom about four-fifths are Christians of various denominations. Most of the inhabitants are engaged in gardening and farming, and some of them in handicrafts, and in the cotton and grain trade. In their costumes and general appearance the Nazarenes have retained many peculiarities. At weddings the women wear gay embroidered jackets, and have their foreheads and breasts laden with coins, while their riding camels are mostly caparisoned with shawls and strings of coins. As "Mary's Well" is the only spring which the town possesses, it is all but certain that the Child Jesus and his Virgin Mother were once among its regular frequenters. The motley throng collected around the large and antiquated marble trough, especially towards evening, presents a very picturesque appearance, and the interest of the scene is greatly enhanced by the thought that it is probably very similar to that which might have been witnessed upwards of eighteen hundred years ago.

GARDEN PARTY AT MARLBOROUGH HOUSE

Concerning this engraving, which is from a sketch taken in the grounds of Marlborough House, on the 13th July last, our artist writes thus:—

"The grounds at the back of Marlborough House are more extensive than is easily imagined, and contain a great many trees chestnut, lime, and elm. Above the well-trimmed box hedge which almost surrounds the garden the trees of the Mall appear, and so the visitor hardly realises that he is in London. It is well to be a Prince, and enjoy such a retreat in the heart of a great city.

"On this afternoon the sun shone out beautifully, and the sunlight alternating with the shade from the trees was most charming. At the other side of the lawn, opposite the House, was erected the tent given to H.R.H. by the Maharajah of Cashmere, and here I understood from the Prince himself that he would receive his guests. But when the first of them arrived the Princess and he were standing in the centre of the lawn, and I never saw any one enter the much-prized tent. Away to the right, at one end of the grounds, was another tent reserved for Her Majesty the Queen: at the other extremity of the grounds was the band of the Rifle Brigade. Nearer was another, but smaller band, the Hungarian Bohemian band, from the Paris International Exhibition. This band, though small, played very beautifully and with the greatest spirit, and appeared to be extremely popular. The guests began to arrive at five o'clock, and the lawn was occupied by several hundred guests till past seven. The Queen arrived about half-past five, and remained for about an hour and a half."

"MY LOVE IS LIKE THE MELODY"

The best commentary we can make on this picture is to quote Burns' song in its entirety:—

My Love is like a red, red rose,
 That's newly sprung in June;
My Love is like the melody,
 That's sweetly played in tune.

As fair art thou, my bonny lass,
 So deep in love am I;
And I will love thee still, my dear,
 Till a' the seas gang dry.

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
 And the rocks melt with the sun;
O! I will love thee still, my dear,
 While the sands of life shall run.

Then fare thee weel, my only love,
 And fare thee weel awhile;
For I will come again, my love,
 Though it were ten thousand mile.

SHERE ALI, AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN, AND HIS SON, THE LATE ABDULLA JAN

Abdal, descended through successive generations from an Israelitish house of the Captivity—so runs the Afghan tradition—was the founder of the Abdalli tribe. He left three sons—Fufal, Barak, and Alako. Barak was the father of Sarfal, the father of Daru, the father of Nek, the father of Ismail, the father of Kaisar, the father of Omar, the father of Mahomed, the father of Yaru, the father of Usaf, the father of Sarfraz (Payandah) Khan, the father of Dost Mahomed Khan, the late (1829-63) Ameer of Afghanistan, the father of Shere Ali, the present Ameer. Dost Mahomed had about twelve sons, of whom the best known, beside the present Ameer, are the late Afzul Khan, the father of Abdul Rahman Khan, the pensioner of Russia; and the late Akbar Khan, the assassin of Sir W. Macnaughten (Dec. 25, 1851), and contriver of the massacre of the Kyber Pass. Shere Ali, it may be remembered, was the son whom Dost Mahomed had selected as his heir, and on the death of Dost Mahomed in 1863 his brothers at first appeared to acquiesce in their father's will. Ultimately, however, Shere Ali had to fight for his kingdom with his elder brother Afzul Khan, and for some time was unsuccessful, so much so, indeed, that the latter entered Cabul in triumph on May 21, 1866, and was subsequently proclaimed Ameer. The Indian Government, however, refused to recognise him, Sir John Lawrence alleging that Shere Ali was still in possession of a large portion of Afghanistan, and in 1868 Shere Ali, on the death of his brother, was enabled to repossess himself of Cabul, and resumed his sovereignty. The Umballa Durbar of March, 1869, at which Lord Mayo met Shere Ali, is too much a matter of history to need any description here, but we may mention that during the same year Shere Ali conceived the idea of an invasion of Bokhara, from which he was only restrained by British counsels. Since the Seistan Arbitration in 1871, when by the advice of a British arbitrator a large slice of territory in dispute between Persia and Cabul was yielded to the former country, a certain coolness has always existed between the Ameer and the British authorities, which culminated in 1876 in the complete severance of political relations, and the withdrawal of the native agent. After this incident, and the refusal to permit Sir Douglas Forsyth to pass across the frontier—to quote the words of The Times—the British Government has maintained an attitude of "haughty passivity," until the action of the Russian Government in sending the mission which has recently been so well received by Shere Ali compelled us to despatch the special embassy, which, under Sir Neville Chamberlain, is now at Simla in readiness to start for Cabul as soon as the answer is received from Shere Ali to the letter of the Governor-General, expressing this intention. Of the present Ameer's sons, the only two whose names are generally known are the youngest, Abdulla Jan, who has just died at the age of sixteen, whose mother was a daughter of Afzul Khan, the son of a half-brother of Dost Mahomed Khan; and Yakoob Khan, who is about thirty years old, whose mother was a daughter of the Chief of Salpura, and a woman therefore of far inferior family and rank to the mother of Abdulla Jan. On the death of Dost Mahomed Khan, Yakoob Khan materially assisted his father against his brother, Afzul Khan; but finding that his father was determined to nominate Abdulla Jan as heir apparent, he became discontented, and after stirring up all manner of intrigues, in 1870, broke out into open rebellion, ending at length in his being cast into prison in 1874, at Cabul, where he is probably still a captive; for the story of his escape during the confusion following on Abdulla Jan's death is not believed in India. Abdulla Jan was recognised by the Indian Government as Shere Ali's heir in January, 1874; and now that he is dead, it has been very generally assumed that we should urge the recognition of Yakoob Khan on Shere Ali as his successor. But the time has passed for attempting to secure our hold of Afghanistan by such clumsy and uncertain intrigues. In view of the establishment of Russia in Kars, Ardahan, and Batoum, political control over Afghanistan has become more than ever important to us. It is a proverb throughout the East, that "he who would rule in India must first make himself master of Afghanistan," and only when we are in virtual occupation of Afghanistan will the people of India believe, without questioning, in the security and permanence of the dominion we have obtained over them.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL, ANTANANARIVO, MADAGASCAR

"Madagascar," says Mr. Keith Johnson in his admirable book on Africa, published in Mr. Stanford's series of Geographical Handbooks, "forms an independent kingdom under the rule of a Hova dynasty (the dominant tribe of the three which inhabit the island), and had till lately always entertained extremely hostile feelings towards Europeans and European influences, although Christian missionaries have long been stationed in the country. The last Queen was a zealous heathen, but at the coronation of her successor, Ranavalona, all the old religious observances were abolished, while the Gospel lay at her right hand during the ceremony. She was subsequently baptised, and on September 8th, 1869, all the idols of the whole nation were by her orders committed to the flames. Thus at length took root the seed of the Gospel planted here by the London Missionary Society seventy years previously. Such a thorough and rapid religious revolution has probably never been witnessed in any other part of the world."

Since the Queen and Court have embraced Christianity, Divine service has been held in the Palace twice every Sabbath, conducted by native ministers, a Christian Church has been formed, and the ordinances of religion regularly administered. This has rendered the erection of a suitable building, in which the Queen, Prime Minister, and Court may worship, necessary, and Mr. W. Pool, of the London Missionary Society, was requested to prepare plans and superintend the work. The result is the building of which we give an engraving. The chapel itself is a parallelogram, intended to accommodate some four hundred and fifty worshippers, having at its south-west corner a tower, with spire rising to the height of 112 feet, and on its east side a minister's vestry, with entrance to the platform, also a private room for the use of the Court, the Royal residence being situate on high ground immediately to the east of the church, and an ornamental bridge has been built so as to afford ready access by a staircase to the private room, and from thence to the church. A law requires that in all public assemblies the Sovereign should occupy the highest seat; hence, the erection of an elevated floor or pew was imperative. The base of this pew is of a coarse native marble, panelled, with projecting ornaments between the panels. The enclosure, framing, and panels, the staircase, the platform, altar-rails, and pillars, the canopy with its handsome soffit, as well as the base, are good specimens of native carving, and took a very long time to execute. The wood used is handsomely veined, and somewhat resembles light rosewood. The church is filled with benches of the same kind of wood, but of the colour of oak; beneath the trellis in the canopy scarlet velvet will be introduced.

The Italian style is in harmony with the surrounding buildings, hence its selection, and great freedom has been used in the work of ornamentation. The church is built with native stone, found immediately on the primary formation. It is supposed to be granite, with dull felspar crystals, having earthy matter consolidated between the crystals—one would suppose by the action of water. It is worked with chisels and chisel-shaped hammers, whose handles can easily be removed for sharpening. The natives work very creditable mouldings with these rough tools. The shafts of the columns inside the church are of a dull red-coloured clay or soapstone; the keystones, the carved band, and the frieze, with other work inside, and two large panels on the outside of the building intended to receive the engraving of a Royal proclamation, are of this material. Care has been everywhere taken that no pressure other than its own weight shall be on it; this material would seem to harden after exposure. The roof is the only one in the country covered with slates; they were quarried some five days' journey south of the capital. The arrangements of the building are for the Congregational form of worship, which form is thoroughly esteemed by the Court and people generally. The building itself exhibits the results of instruction given to the natives by the agents of the London Missionary Society, to whom they are also indebted for their knowledge of several useful arts other than those connected with buildings. The geometric stained-glass windows were supplied by Messrs. Camm, of Smethwick; the ceiling ornaments by Messrs. Jackson, London; and the organ (a fine instrument with two manuals, and two and a half octaves of foot-notes) by Messrs. Hill and Sons, London.

In the Church Quarterly Review for July there is an interesting paper entitled "Religion in Madagascar," from which we learn that there are more than 150 churches in the country (which contains a population of about 5,000,000) in connection with the palace church. The writer of this paper believes that before long there will be a State Church of some sort. At present, as indicated by Mr. Pool, the national feeling gravitates towards some form of Congregationalism, meanwhile the Malagasy have in their country missionaries of the most varying Christian denominations, Independents, Quakers, Anglicans, Norwegian Lutherans, and Roman Catholics, so that they have an opportunity, which was not afforded to early converts from Paganism, of examining different forms of the Christian creed, and deciding which is best suited to their own needs. With regard to Government, the Malagasy, like ourselves, have a prejudice in favour of female sovereignty. But though the Queen is nominally at the head of the nation, her husband, who combines the functions of Lord Beaconsfield and the Duke of Cambridge, really exercises almost absolute sway, being held in check only by a limited body of nobles.

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS

Cerinia or Tzerina, the ancient Cerynea, which is supposed to have been originally founded by the Dorian colonists, under Praxander and Cepheus, is a quaint and pretty old town, or rather village, and is the only port or harbour on the Northern coast of the island, and is the place of direct communication with Karamania, on the mainland of Asia. A cluster of tall, flat-roofed houses surrounds the little harbour which, enclosed by a tumble-down Venetian mole, is just big enough to contain its dozen little gaily painted white-winged boats. With the exception of the citadel it is a small dirty place, almost exclusively inhabited by Mussulmans. The sturdy old Venetian fort gives a solid, if somewhat old world air of security to the place, and on the day the accompanying sketch was made the Turkish crescent floated for the last time over the battlements where it had reigned supreme for three centuries. The Union Jack now waves above the principal gateway over which the seamen of H.M.S. Raleigh have painted the words "Fort Raleigh." The F Company of the 42nd Highlanders have now removed from Chiftlik to within half a mile of Cerinia, where water is so plentiful, and the general conditions so favourable, that they have dubbed the place "Camp Edan." Behind the town a well cultivated, but hot and dusty plain, relieved by a few gaunt palm trees, gradually rises into the olive-clothed slopes which form the bases of the hills. From the swathing belt of olives the jagged peaks start up to 2,000 or 3,000 feet above the sea. Among these peaks, rugged and rock-strewn, are several old strongholds perched like eyries, overlooking the sea and commanding a magnificent view of the rich gullies and brown plains and even the misty hills of Asia Minor far away.

THE MONASTERY OF LAPAIS

About three miles from Cyrenia on the lower spur of one of the hills stands the beautiful mediæval Monastery of Lapais, built by King Hugo III. about the end of the fourteenth century. It belonged to the Latin Church, but was destroyed by the Turks when they captured the fortress of Cerinia. The abbey occupied one of the most picturesque spots in the whole island; still standing is a large hall 100 feet long by 32 in width, and 40 in height, which is supposed to have been used as the refectory. Beneath this is another apartment divided into two chambers, the vault of which is supported by massive columns. In the courtyard, piled one upon another, are two large marble sarcophagi of Roman workmanship one of which is ornamented with flowers, nude figures, and bull's heads in bold relief. Upon the lintel over the doorway are engraved three shields, one representing the Cross of Jerusalem, another the Royal Arms of the Lusignans, and the third a lion rampant. The Gothic chapel of the abbey has been partly repaired with sun-dried bricks and plaster, and is used by the resident Greeks as their place of worship, portions of the churchyard serving as their cemetery. Though now in ruins, it is lovely in its decay, and the view of it in the early morning, when the graceful building stands out boldly above its surrounding trees, backed by the shadowy mountains, is very fine.—Our engravings are from sketches by Mr. T. R. Swinburne, of H.M.S. Black Prince.

THE BOULOGNE DEEP-SEA HARBOUR

On Monday the much-talked-of fêtes at Boulogne will begin in connection with the new Deep-sea Harbour which is to be made to the westward of the existing port. We have already (No. 448, June 29, 1878) published a view of the proposed harbour taken from the sea, and we now give a general panorama of the forthcoming works drawn after the plans exhibited in the Paris Exhibition by the Boulogne Chamber of Commerce. The following description will fully explain the various points of interest introduced by our artist at Boulogne, Mr. V. J. Vailiant. On ascending the steep zig-zaggy lane which from the Boulevard Ste. Beuve leads to the Fishermen's Calvary on the East Cliff, and entering the enclosure of this newly re-constructed road, an extensive sea prospect lies before the spectator. In the south-west the horizon is bounded by the bluff headland, Cape Alpreck (A), and its outer defence, Fort de l'Heurt (B). The next point bears the signalling station (C) on Mont de Couppes; betwixt lies in shelter the quaint fishing village, Le Portel. In D stand the butts, where rifle practice takes place; and at the foot of the bold cliffs, and over their eastern slope, is seen Châtillon (E), partly intercepted by the Port Battery (F), which is bounded in its rear by the Creek (G), where boat-building and repairing are carried on; and on the eastern face by the beginning of the West Jetty, whose head (H) is shown by the Tide Signal Tower; while in I stands the North-east Pier Head, with its port lighthouse; and in K one of the Humane Society's lifeboats. Between the two piers is the present port channel. The large and handsome building (L) which stands in the middle of gardens (N) close to a Skating-rink (M), artificial rocks (O) which contain an aquarium, and the harbour-master's office (P), is the well-known Etablissement des Bains, which justly rank second to none of the sea-side casinos abroad; in front of it extends the splendid, smooth, level sand-beach (R), which makes Boulogne almost unrivalled as a bathing-station. The Humane Society's Receiving House (Q) shows its roof in the nearest foreground on the right.

All these parts, designated by letters, portray things as they now are. Those marked in ordinary figures record in a bird's-eye view those portions of the Deep-sea Harbour works, for which a vote of 17 million francs was taken in the Chamber of Deputies in May, and by the Senate in June, 1878. These works comprise (1) a south-west stone pier, running for 1,472 yards in a straight line from a point at the foot of the cliffs, half-way between the rifle butts (D) and the semaphore station (C); then, by means of a curved portion 218 yards in length, it joins (2) the deep-sea breakwater 654 yards long. North of this is a passage 272 yards wide, with a minimum depth of nearly twenty-six feet of water at low spring tides, (3) is a stone mole 544 yards in length, affording a second entrance, 163 yards wide, to (6) the anchorage and Harbour of Refuge, which will cover an area of 137 hectares (340 acres); 4 shows an extension (1,570 yards long) of the present north-east timber jetty. The international passenger and goods traffic is provided for by the erection, upon (5) the Steam-packet Pier, of an extensive railway station, to and from which trains will run in direct connection with the Paris, Brussels, and Calais lines, whilst general commercial purposes will be served by the ample accommodations given by (7) quays 672 yards long, and by warehouses to be built upon (8) the ground recovered from the sea. In addition to the above described works, which constitute the Deep-sea Harbour of Boulogne according to the plans laid by Mr. Stoecklin, resident chief engineer, and for which funds have been provided by the Legislature, the requirements of the fishing interest and of trade at large claim an extension of the original scheme, which will have to be provided for by further grants of State money. These additional works are indicated by Roman numerals. They include (II.) a fishing-boat harbour, with sixteen feet of water at lowest spring tides; (III.) a lock leading to (IV.) a wet dock, with a length of about 2,181 yards of available quays; (V.) ship-building and repairing yards and slips; (VI.) ground recovered from the sea which will afford building spaces for warehouses, offices, &c. X. shows the head of a lock intended to connect the future with the present port. It is meant to run through the battery (F), which will ultimately be levelled, and to open into the existing wet dock and the river Liane in its rear.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The Solicitor-General, addressing a meeting of his constituents at Launceston on Saturday evening, spoke principally on the Eastern Question. He denounced Russia as an unscrupulous Power bent on a career of aggrandisement, and condemned the conduct of Mr. Gladstone, which, he said, he had reason to believe was disapproved of by many leading Liberals and by the great bulk of the Liberal party.—Mr. Hanbury, speaking at Longton on Tuesday, also condemned Mr. Gladstone's attack upon the Government, and declared that many men had been imprisoned for using language of a far less seditious character.—Mr. Cowper Temple, addressing a Liberal gathering at Romsey, said, that the scheme of attempting to influence the civilisation of Asia would turn out all moonshine, and that Cyprus would never be worth what we should spend upon it, much less the enmity and jealousy which its occupation had created.—Colonel Stanley, speaking at an Agricultural meeting at Lancaster, expressed his satisfaction with the present attitude of the country, which, he believed, in this hour of repose gave full credit to the Government for the good efforts they had made for the preservation of the peace of Europe.—Mr. Mundella, in part fulfilment of his threat of making his voice heard five times as much as though no attempt had been made to drown it, on Monday delivered a long discourse on things in general to a select audience who were admitted by ticket to the Albert Hall, Sheffield. The meeting passed a resolution condemning the misconduct of those who had disturbed the Paradise Square meeting; and another declaring, "That the experience which the country has had during the last five sessions of the deteriorating influences of Tory government makes it more emphatically than ever the duty of Sheffield to secure the return to Parliament at the first opportunity of Mr. Mundella and Mr. Waddy, whose candidature it hails with the highest satisfaction."—Yielding to the solicitations of the American Ambassador, the Government have remitted the remainder of the sentence on the Fenians Condon and Melody, who took part in the outrage at Manchester in 1867, when Sergeant Brett was murdered. They will be immediately released on condition that they shall not reside within Her Majesty's dominions.—Sir F. M. Williams, M.P. for Truro, died suddenly at Heanton Court, near Barnstaple, on Tuesday from the rupture of a blood-vessel on the brain, causing apoplexy. He was only forty-eight years of age.

The "Eurydice."——After twenty-three weeks of almost incessant labour the wreck of this ill-fated vessel has at last been raised, and brought into Portsmouth Harbour, where she will probably be broken up, as the whole of her hull is in a very shattered condition. On Saturday the inquiry on board the flag ship Duke of Wellington was brought to a close, and Cuddeford, one of the survivors, stepped forward and paid a tribute to the memory of his captain. He said, "I should like to say, before the court martial is concluded, how much we all loved and respected our noble captain. We had unbounded confidence in him; knowing that, as a sailor, he was surpassed by none, and I am sure he had the love and the respect of every officer and man in the ship, for he studied their comfort and happiness in all respects. We were proud of our captain, of our officers, and of our ship, looking upon her as admirably adapted for the service upon which she was employed." Fletcher, the other survivor, also signified his concurrence with these sentiments. On Monday the Court delivered their judgment, exonerating every one on board from blame, and attributing the sad accident to pressure of wind upon the sails during a sudden and exceptionally dense snowstorm which overtook the vessel when its approach was partially hidden by the proximity of the ship to high land. They add that the upper half ports being open was justifiable and usual under the state of wind and weather up to the moment of the sudden storm.

Miscellaneous.——On Friday last some members of the Reserve Forces' Relief Committee attended before Mr. Alderman Figgins at Guildhall, and contradicted some of the statements made on the previous Wednesday by the Reserve man Kinsman. The Marquis of Exeter had given not 500*l.*, but 15*l.* to the fund, and their total receipts had been very small compared with their needs.—Much damage to property and some loss of life was caused by the heavy gales and storms which prevailed in various parts of the country and around the coasts in the latter part of last week.—The news of the week is altogether of a most gloomy description. Besides the disasters consequent upon the recent rough weather there have been an unusual number of fatal boating accidents on the Thames and elsewhere, and to them have to be added the dreadful railway accident at Sittingbourne, by which five persons were killed, and about forty others injured. Both the guard and under-guard are to be tried for manslaughter, but, in spite of Colonel Rich's opinion, it is difficult to believe that the collision could not have been prevented had the express train been provided with continuous brakes. Then, too, there is that appalling catastrophe on the river off Woolwich, on Tuesday, when the saloon steamer Princess Alice, with some seven hundred persons on board, was stove in by a large screw collier, the Bywell Castle, and sank immediately, the majority of the passengers being drowned, although every possible effort was made to save life. The details of the occurrence, and of the subsequent scenes when the recovered bodies were brought ashore, are of the most heartrending description. As yet it is by no means clear upon whose side the blame should rest. Next week, we shall be able to give a full account of the disaster, together with some illustrations.—Another fatality is reported from Ennis, in Ireland, where a fire broke out in a house in O'Connell Square, and two persons were burnt to death and several others severely injured by jumping from the windows to escape from the flames.—Another large fire occurred on Tuesday in Thames Street, at the stores of Messrs. Price, the candle makers. It burst out about four o'clock, and burnt for six hours, although twenty-two land engines and four floating engines were throwing water upon it nearly the whole time. A barmaid employed at a public-house in the City has died from the effects of drinking carbolic acid, which she is supposed to have taken while in a state of somnambulism.—The Shakers are still on the roadside at Hordle, the authorities having granted them another fortnight in which to seek an asylum. A gentleman has offered to purchase for them the field from which they have been ejected, and Mrs. Girling has bid 250*l.* for it, but a much larger sum is demanded. On Sunday last there were many visitors to the camp, and Mrs. Girling had "a visitation of the Spirit." For nearly an hour she moved about with arms distended, with her eyes shut, and gesticulating furiously, declaring herself to be next in rank to God's Holy Spirit, of whom she was the special messenger; that the time was at hand when all enemies of Shakerism would be eternally punished; that she could see Jesus Christ, who was coming to claim His own. Somewhat of a scene ensued, the crowd, in rather strong language, expressing disapprobation at the proceedings.

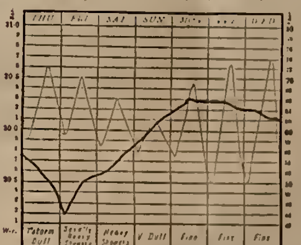
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

August 29th to September 4th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The weather at the commencement of the week was very stormy and unsettled. The barometer fell quickly during Thursday (August 29th) and the morning of Friday (30th), and thunderstorms, with very heavy showers, occurred on the former day, while the latter was distinguished by rough, squally, and rainy weather. During Monday (September 2nd) and Tuesday (3rd) a decided improvement occurred, and dry weather has been experienced in this part of the kingdom since the new month commenced.

The barometer was highest (30.30 inches) on Tuesday (Sept. 3rd), lowest (29.20 inches) on Friday (Aug. 30th), range 1.10 inches. Temperature in the shade was highest (74°) on Wednesday (Aug. 28th), lowest (50°) on the same day, and on Wednesday (Sept. 4th); range, 24°. Rainfall. The total fall has been 1.14 inches on three days; greatest falls 0.43 inches on Thursday (Aug. 29th) and Friday (30th). Wind, variable both in force and direction; light easterly at the close of the week.

Scraps

Mrs. E. Prentiss, the well known American authoress of "Stepping Heavenward," has died at Dorset, in Vermont.

Bull-fights have been revived at [illegible], in the French Landes, where they had been discontinued since 1869. Three matadors were injured in the first representation.

The Colorado Beetle has been successfully exterminated in Prussia. Not a sign of the insect is visible in the neighbourhood of Schildau and Mulheim, where the beetle was so active last year.

Cremation becomes legal in Gotha on October 1, when the process will be inaugurated by the burning of the body of a deceased engineer in a handsome building specially erected for such ceremonies.

Luminous Watches are now being manufactured at Chaux-de-Fonds, the great watchmaking village of Switzerland. The figures on the watch-dial are submitted to a peculiar process, which renders them phosphorescent and visible in the dark if exposed for a few moments each day to the sunlight.

An "Assassins' Symphony" is projected by a German composer now at Kissingen. The work is to be divided into three parts; the first will musically illustrate Prince Bismarck's escape from Kullmann at Kissingen, the second will depict Hödel's regicidal attempt, and the third will represent the crime of Dr. Nobiling.

The Captive Balloon in the Court of the Paris Tuileries made 271 ascents in the first month of its existence, there being six out of thirty-one days when the weather prevented any experiments. Without reckoning the aeronauts and the officials, 7,750 passengers have made the ascent, and the receipts have amounted to 8,904*l.*, a large portion of which was paid by persons merely entering the courtyard to watch the departure.

A Wholesale Emigration is projected by the inhabitants of Marsala in Sicily, who have placarded their walls with an announcement that 35,000 citizens of Marsala, in view of their inability to support their burden of taxation, wish to sell their city. They hope, says the placard, to find buyers who can satisfy the cupidity of the vultures who lay waste the fair regions of Sicily, and that by emigrating en masse to Australia they may escape for ever the talons of the harpies.

The Floral Wreaths on M. Thiers' Catafalque at the anniversary service at Notre Dame nearly covered the imaginary tomb, and the most remarkable souvenir was a curious wreath from the Italian Consul at Lille. It consisted of three circles, the outer one of black flowers, an inner one of white pearls, from which sprung white roses and foliage, and in the centre was an alabaster chapel in miniature, containing a gold cross, surrounded by ivy, roses, and lilac, and surmounted by another gilt cross, encircled by an ivy wreath.

London Mortality decreased again last week, and 1,365 deaths were registered against 1,433 in the previous seven days, being a decline of 68, and 83 below the average. There were 148 deaths from diarrhoea (a fall of 51), 50 from whooping cough (a decrease of 18, a lower number than has been registered since December), 29 from scarlet fever (a rise of 5), 23 from different forms of fever (an increase of 7), 15 from diphtheria (a rise of 1), 7 from measles (a fall of 3), and 6 from small-pox (a decline of 4). There were 2,404 births registered against 2,491 in the preceding week, exceeding the average by 34. The mean temperature was 61.8 deg., 1.7 deg. above the average, and there were 27.5 hours of sunshine out of the 96.4 hours during which the sun was above the horizon, being at the rate of 29 per cent.

Princess Maria of Germany, the bride of Prince Henry of the Netherlands, is reported to be one of the most highly cultivated women in Germany. Devoted to scientific studies, she is also a good musician and artist and an excellent linguist, being particularly well acquainted with Latin, while directly her engagement with Prince Henry was decided the Princess began to learn Dutch. Prince Henry is remarkably wealthy, is at the head of several mining enterprises, and possesses ninety-nine estates in Holland, the law in Holland prohibiting any Dutch citizen, even the King, from possessing 100 separate properties. The Prince gave his bride a wedding present of a magnificent sapphire and diamond parure valued at 50,000*l.*, after a design in a picture by Holbein. A grand ball was held at the Potsdam Chateau to celebrate the marriage, and so many guests were invited that a battalion of soldiers was first ordered to dance in the ball-room to test the stability.

"Dublin Illustrated."——In answer to an anonymous correspondent, who impugned the accuracy of some of the historical statements contained in our descriptive sketch, Mr. George Wheeler, the author of the article in question, writes us:—"The expression 'after the defeat of Roderick by Strongbow none dared to oppose themselves to the English,' is Hume's own. See 'Student's Hume,' page 118. James II. was only present at the one great battle at the Boyne. He lost 1,500 on the field, while the Prince of Orange lost 500, 'having no army left to him he abandoned Dublin, and hastened to Kinsale, from whence he sailed to Brest on the 9th July, 1690.' It is true that the remains of his French and English and Catholic armies held Limerick, Athlone, and Aughrim, until they were stormed or starved out, but all the towns were occupied by William's troops before 1691, and James was not present at any assaults, or in Ireland at all at the time."

A Revolver-Purse is the last novelty in firearms. It has been invented by a German, Herr Frankenau, and in appearance is to all intents and purposes a somewhat bulky porte-monnaie, with the usual compartments for gold and silver. On pressing a spring, however, a trigger flies out, and the owner suddenly finds himself armed with a miniature five-shooter, the barrels of which are hidden within the frame of the purse, the outlet for the bullet being made by a valve, which also opens upon the pressure of the spring. The mechanism is certainly ingenious, as the weapon carries a five millimetre Eley cartridge, and will send a bullet some sixty yards; but we cannot help expressing a fervent hope that such an invention will never become popular. We no longer live in the days of Claude Melnotte, when travellers were politely asked for their purse or their life, and robbers nowadays are careful to attack you in a manner in which a firearm would be useless, while any attempt to introduce the Transatlantic practice of carrying such weapons about the person is one that should be most heartily denounced as being both useless and dangerous. One drawback to the revolver purse, however, will probably prevent it from being generally used—namely, its weight, which is far above what most people would care to carry about in their pockets.

CHAPTER XIX.

She had scarcely spoken the words when I heard Lucy's voice in the garden. I never knew whether the Princess Corleoni voluntarily shrank back at the sound, or whether I instinctively pushed her aside into a corner of the room not visible from the window, but she was out of sight by the time Lucy came up, and standing on tiptoe—for the window was at a height of some five feet from the ground—brought her eyes above the level of the sill, and called to me. "Catherine, dear, will four o'clock be too early for our start on Saturday? Here is Mr. Rutherford come back; I told him that you were warranted to get up fresh, calm, and in a good temper, at any hour of the day or night. But he won't be satisfied until he has your own word. Who's that in the studio with you?"

"The great bear, little white pigeon," said Signor Sandro, coming forward, and leaning his elbows on the window-sill so as to fill up nearly the whole space. "The great bear, very growly, and in a very surly mood; so run off before you are made one mouthful of."

"Don't let Catherine work herself to death, Signor Sandro. She has been here all the morning, ever since—oh, long before I was up. Mr. Rutherford wants to say a word to her about the excursion. Make her come. I can't entertain him all by myself."

"I will come, darling. I will come. Go upstairs. Ask Mr. Rutherford to wait for a minute. No, no; don't stay there in the garden. Go up to our sitting-room, Lucy. I will follow you."

She went away with her usual gentle docility. And then I turned to the Princess, and told her that I neither knew, nor had any means of knowing, where her son was, and that I was astounded at her supposing for an instant that I should know.

"You are determined to be revenged on me," said the Princess, with an agitated voice. "If you do not positively know where Vittorio is, you have some clue, some information. Think: it is a mother who is in anxiety about her only son. Then if you do not know, your sister can tell me something. Let me ask Lucia."

"Not for the world," said I. "I will not have her distressed. And I must go to her at once."

"If you are afraid of my saying anything to her on religious subjects, I will promise not to do so," and the Princess absolutely took hold of my gown to detain me, with an imploring gesture. Signor Sandro came to my rescue. "Go, Caterina," said he. "I will remain with the Princess." Then turning to her, he continued, "Donna Olympia, I am in the place of a father to these young women. I know the whole story. What information there is to be given I can give you better than Caterina. And if I can help you I will. You can trust me. Go, my daughter."

He almost thrust me from the studio, and as soon as I was on the outside of the door I heard him lock it.

I joined Lucy and Mr. Rutherford in the sitting-room. They both said I looked tired, and they urged me to come out with them to the terraced walk among the olive trees overlooking the Campagna, and steep myself in sunshine and laziness. "There's an old olive tree that you promised you would sketch for me in black and white," said Lucy; "so if your conscience requires an excuse, take a pencil and paper with you, and draw my tree as you sit on the grass in the shade."

After a moment's reflection I decided to do as they wished. It was better that I should keep Lucy safely out of Princess Corleoni's way. So we three set out to walk through the dirty and narrow streets of Tivoli, towards the lovely terrace I have mentioned so often. Before quitting the house, I left word with S'ora Nanna to tell my master where we were gone. Preoccupied as I was with the Princess's visit, and her strange words and ways, I was yet not too much so to be able to enjoy the beauty of the day and of the scene. Donna Olympia had no hold on my feelings. I know not whether I am more hard-hearted than my neighbours, but I must own that I recognise in myself a large reserve fund of indifference to the opinions and sentiments entertained about me by persons whom I neither love nor esteem. Perhaps this was what the Princess had meant when she talked of the English being "made of stucco!"

We rambled on slowly when once clear of the town; Mr. Rutherford and I adapting our pace to Lucy's, which was still rather languid, and all three stopping every now and then to gaze upon the landscape flecked with flying shadows as the soft wind chased white fleecy clouds across the clear blue sky.

"Let us sit down here," said Lucy at length, selecting a sheltered spot, covered with spring grass and wild flowers. And as she spoke she spread her shawl on the ground, and seated herself. I objected that we were still somewhat far from the old olive tree she had wished me to draw, but she declared she was tired, and would go no farther. "But you won't mind walking just those few yards, Catty dear," said she in her coaxing way, "and just making that tiny sketch for me, will you? And Mr. Rutherford will walk with you to have a look at our favourite ravine. You haven't seen our ravine, Mr. Rutherford? Do go, please. And if you could bring me a few ferns—they grew in that moist place—it would be very kind."

I demurred a little at leaving her alone, but she urged it so strongly that at last I yielded, and pursued the path towards a wilder and more sequestered point which we called our ravine. I thought as we walked that Mr. Rutherford would probably not like being taken away from Lucy's side, to escort me and gather ferns. However, he complied with a very good grace.

"And what is the news in Rome, Mr. Rutherford?" said I, as we walked.

"Well," he answered gravely, "I chanced to be witness to a very painful scene there. I believe you know one of the parties concerned."

"Indeed? I do not know many people in Rome."

"I conclude that you know this man, because Signor Santi told me that Miss Lucy had given lessons in the family, and you also taught drawing there, I believe."

My heart made a great bound, and I could not help glancing round to be sure that Lucy was out of earshot. "Do you mean the Corleonis?" I asked.

"Yes; the man I speak of is the son, Don Vittorio, as they call him."

"Is he an acquaintance of yours?" I asked, wonderingly.

"No, but I have seen him several times at a club to which I was introduced by an Italian friend of mine, and I have heard a good deal about him. I hope you will not mind my saying that I believe him to be a thoroughly worthless scoundrel."

"I don't at all mind your saying so; but I am surprised that you——"

"That I should use such strong terms?"

"That you should know Don Vittorio so well."

He laughed his frank, hearty laugh. "How quaintly and quietly you say that!" he exclaimed.

"But I have a request to make to you, Mr. Rutherford, which is no laughing matter. I beg that you will not allude to this—to the family of Corleoni before my sister. I cannot fully explain to you why, but the subject is a painful one to her."

"I think I know why, and I have carefully refrained from mentioning the Corleonis before her," he answered. And then in response to my look of surprise, he said quickly, "I had heard something of the behaviour of those people to you and your sister before I came to Tivoli."

I felt hurt and distressed for a moment, but I strove to conquer the feeling. Whatever Mr. Rutherford had been told, it was clear that it had not lessened his liking and respect for Lucy. So I made an effort to regain a frank and unconstrained manner, and asked him what was the painful scene he had witnessed in Rome. "I will tell you when we reach our destination," he said. "The path is so narrow here we cannot walk abreast."

We went on in silence until we came to the ravine. It is a narrow gash in the mountain, through which a stream of water forces its way down to the plain. The sides of the ravine are clothed with dwarf oak and a variety of shrubs and brushwood, and at its mouth, where it suddenly widens out, it is spanned by a stone bridge. The spot is very picturesque: on the one hand, the upward-sloping hills scarred by the torrent, and on the other, the vast Campagna seen through a tracery of olive branches and silver-grey leaves. On the farther side of the bridge stood—and I hope still stands—a singularly fine old olive-tree, gnarled and hoary.

"Here is our tree," I said. "This will be about my point of view." And having arranged my plaid for a cushion, and placed myself, I got out my paper and pencils and began to sketch. Mr. Rutherford came and leant up against the bole of another tree close to me. He was a pace or so behind me, looking over my shoulder at the drawing, so that I did not see his face when he said, "Before I tell you what happened yesterday, I want to say a word to you on another subject."

He paused a little, and then went on: "I want to be able to speak to you with full and free confidence. But as it is, I feel that I am in the position of a mere stranger whose interference may seem impertinent."

As he here stopped again, and seemed to hesitate, I said, "I am sure you are incapable of impertinence in any case. And as to being a stranger—friendship is not always to be measured by time."

"And love still less! I want to have a better right than simple friendship, to take care of you and Lucy, and be trusted by you. Forgive me if I am too abrupt. Have I startled you? I thought you could not be quite unprepared for what I have so long been wishing to say."

"I'm afraid I am prepared for it," said I, sadly. For now that he had spoken I felt more sorry and down-hearted to think of his inevitable disappointment than I could have imagined beforehand.

"Afraid! Why afraid? Don't say that, Catherine."

A sudden tremor and shyness so overcame me that I was unable to make him any answer. He had never called me by my name before; and perhaps it was that,—or perhaps something in the tone of his voice,—or perhaps—— Briefly, I cannot explain why, but I fell into a trembling silence.

"Don't say you are 'afraid' to hear what I want to tell you, Catherine."

"For your sake," I stammered, scarcely knowing what I said, "I am so sorry."

"Sorry that I think you the best, and truest, and dearest woman in the world? Sorry that I love you with all my heart, dear Catherine?"

"Me!"

I dropped my pencil, which rolled away in one direction, whilst a puff of wind carried my sketch in another, and I sprang to my feet with a feeling of dizzy bewilderment. Rutherford had left his post at the tree-stem and come round to stand before me when he spoke. And he now caught my two hands in his, and held me firmly.

"You, Catherine Wilson. Whom else should I love? And what did you imagine I was going to say to you, except that I do love you, and honour you, and want you to be my wife?"

"I thought you loved Lucy," I cried, blurting out the truth in my surprise and agitation.

"So I do. But I want her to be my sister, not my wife. And—oh, Catherine, is that why you said you were 'afraid' and 'sorry'?"

"I—yes; I thought,—I feared——"

"Then you don't dislike me; you don't reject me? Catherine Wilson, tell me true, can you give me a little love in return for so much,—so much, that I have given to you?"

"I don't know. I never thought of such a thing."

"Will you think of it now, Catherine?"

"I can't think. My mind is all in confusion. I feel as if I were dreaming and striving to wake. It seems so very strange and surprising."

"I think it will surprise no one but you, dear."

"What will Lucy say,—and Signor Sandro?"

The mention of Signor Sandro recalled to me all my master's plans and projects with regard to Rutherford, and I stopped short.

"As to Lucy, she is my best friend. And she found out long ago what seems so surprising to you. And do you know what she said to me only this morning when we were walking in the garden? She said that it would make her very happy to have me for a brother."

I sank down again on my plaid, and, covering my face with my hands, tried to collect my thoughts and regain some measure of composure.

"Won't you say a word to me, Catherine?" asked Rutherford.

I looked up, and, with as much firmness as I could command, begged him to leave me for a while to my own reflections. He complied at once; taking me simply at my word in a simple-minded, straightforward fashion, for which I was grateful.

"Well, Catherine," he said, "it shall not be said that I refused the first request you ever made to me. You bid me go, and I go. It might not answer with some women, but"—shaking his head and yet smiling a little—"you have a terrible way of meaning what you say. I'll go and gather Lucy's ferns for her."

And in a few seconds he had recrossed the bridge and disappeared into the ravine with the bold, sure step of a practised climber.

When he was gone, I sat for some time with my face buried in my hands so as to shut out all external objects. I need not record the thoughts which passed through my mind, at first with unmanageable and confused rapidity, but finally with some reasonable sobriety and coherence. Whosoever has perused this simple narrative thus far will be at no loss to guess at the tenour of my meditations. I grew calm sooner than I had thought possible in the first shock of the great surprise I had had. For it was not merely the unexpected declaration of Mr. Rutherford's attachment to myself which had agitated me; it was the revulsion of feeling—the necessity in which I found myself of modifying, and changing, and re-arranging all my thoughts and views in connection with him.

However, as I have said, I regained my composure very shortly;—or at least I so far regained it as to be able to think with some clearness, and to resolve on what I would say to Mr. Rutherford. Then I pushed my hair back from my forehead and lifted my head and looked up at the blessed daylight once more; and as I did so I found a pair of very fierce and handsome dark eyes gleaming at me out of a forest of tangled locks, surmounted by a shabby peaked hat.

"Don't be frightened, Signorina," said the voice belonging to the eyes, in the accents of a peasant of the Campagna. "This is your's, isn't it?"

At the same moment a young man, dressed in the costume of the mountaineers, called ciociari (of which costume sophisticated specimens may be seen got up for pictorial effect, in the persons of the Roman models who haunt the Trinità de' Monti), handed to me my unfinished sketch of the olive tree which the wind had wafted away.

"Yes," said I. "Thank you."

"Niente!" said he; meaning that no thanks were needed. And then he seemed to be moving away in the direction of the ravine, but suddenly stopped and asked, with what seemed to me assumed carelessness, if I were going to remain there long.

"Until the English gentleman, who is with me, returns," I answered. And there was something so wild and savage in the look of the man, although his manner was perfectly inoffensive, that I was well pleased to let him know that I had a protector within hail.

"How? The English gentleman?" re-echoed the peasant. "Is he English,—that man with the blonde whiskers?"

"Certainly. As English as I am."

"Are you speaking truth?"

"Of course. I don't understand you, friend." To say truth I began to be very much frightened, so strangely did the man glare at me. To add to my terror, I just then caught sight of a pistol stuck into his belt, and partly hidden by his loose jacket. However, I remained quiet, looking at him steadily, although my heart thumped hard against my side the while. For a second he stood irresolute, and then we heard the voice of Rutherford as he climbed up from the ravine to the level of the bridge.

"Here are some ferns for Lucy and some flowers for you. May I come and give them to you?"

My strange interlocutor seemed satisfied that those were the tones of an English voice; for, after listening for a second, he nodded to himself sullenly, swore a deep oath, and turning round, without further notice of me, disappeared rapidly up the hill-side in the opposite direction to Tivoli.

CHAPTER XX.

RUTHERFORD came up to me with his hands full of ferns and flowers. He laid them down on the grass, and, looking at me earnestly, asked if I would now give him an answer to his question.

I told him that I would answer him with the utmost sincerity that I was capable of, that I was grateful for his attachment, and honoured by it, but that it had taken me utterly by surprise, and I was unable to say that I returned it as it deserved to be returned.

"Do you think it impossible you ever should return it, dear?" he asked, very gently.

"What am I to say? Would it be fair or right to keep you in suspense on such a subject—to bid you wait and hope, and then, perhaps, say, 'No, I find you are not so dear to me as the man should be whom I take for my husband?' I know very well that, as regards all worldly circumstances, you would be offering everything and receiving nothing in exchange."

"There is only one thing I want, or ought to want, in exchange, Catherine—the true heart of a true woman."

"Yes, and that is what you deserve to have; but I cannot tell you that you have mine yet."

"Ah," he cried, eagerly, taking my right hand between both his, "that 'yet' is a drop of honey enough to sweeten many harsher words than you have said, or are likely to say to me!"

"But pray understand—believe that I am speaking the sheer plain truth from the depths of my conscience—I promise nothing."

"Catherine," said he, still holding my hand, and looking at me with a smile that was very tender and sweet, "I almost believe—I do begin to hope—that you have a wee bit of love for me hidden in some corner of your heart."

"I think so too," I answered simply; "only not enough."

"Will you let me ask you again for an answer to my question at the end of this week? You talked of its not being fair to keep me in suspense, and to make me wait, but would it not be more unfair to turn me off whilst you are still uncertain of your own feelings? I understand now that the very circumstance which I thought would help my suit with you has been against me. But sweet little Lucy's conversation had a special charm for me—she talked, and let me talk, of you."

"I never guessed—how could I guess?" I murmured.

"May I ask you again in a week? Meanwhile I promise not to importune you; and don't fear that I shall reproach you if you are unable to give me a favourable answer. You have been as honest as the day with me. He must be a false loon himself who could misinterpret a soul so crystal clear. May I ask again in a week? Come, a fair 'Yes' or 'No'!"

"Yes."

"God bless you, Catherine." With that he dropped my hand, and resumed his usual manner—a considerate delicacy of behaviour to which I was not insensible.

"And now," said Rutherford, "before we rejoin Lucy, I want to tell you what I saw and heard during my stay in Rome. I was in the studio of an artist of my acquaintance in the Passeggiata di Ripetta, which, as you know, borders the Tiber. We were standing at the window looking at the sunset light on the river, and the glow in the sky behind the dark mass of St. Peter's dome, when I noticed a young woman walking to and fro in a strange, agitated manner. Sometimes she stopped and looked up at the sky, or down at the river, and then began again pacing up and down, up and down, like a caged animal. My friend and I noticed her particularly, for the place was solitary at that hour, and she was the only person walking there. There was a small open carriage drawn up at a little distance, apparently waiting for some one; and I saw the coachman looking at the young woman, and evidently making some jeers about her to a groom who stood near him."

"Was the woman dressed like a lady?"

"She was miserably clad—squalid, almost in rags; but her clothes seemed to be the remnants of tattered finery, and she was very handsome, although haggard and wretched-looking in the extreme. But what struck us both was the singular air of desperation—I can call it nothing else—about her.

"Presently there came leisurely clattering over the stones from the direction of the Porta del Popolo, a horseman on a showy chestnut; he pulled up and dismounted. The groom advanced and took his horse, and the coachman of the little open carriage touched his hat. The vehicle had evidently been ordered to wait there and take him home after his country ride. 'I know that man's face,' said my artist friend, 'it is young Corleoni.' He it was, sure enough. No sooner had he sent off the groom leading his horse by the bridle, than the young woman intercepted him as he was about to step into the carriage, and began to speak to him. We could not hear what she said, but her action was imploring and vehement. Don Vittorio had started back in manifest surprise on first seeing her, but then he stood still, frowning and looking as wicked as ever I saw a man look in my days. Once or twice he tried to pass her and get into his carriage. Each time she plucked him back by the sleeve, and then clasped her hands, and was evidently pleading with him hard. I threw open the window and leaned out, and then the woman's voice being raised, I distinctly heard her say, 'I have been almost starving—starving, do you hear?' Don Vittorio made some reply which I could not catch, and she answered with a burst of passionate sobs, 'I know you said that if I ever came back you would do nothing for me; but why was I to be banished? I couldn't stay away any longer; I wanted to see some human being belonging to me, but they're all dead or gone away; there's not a single soul left that cares for me. Have some compassion on me, Vittorio!' And the poor creature laid her hand on his shoulder. He threw her off with brutal roughness, so that she staggered, and then he turned to mount into the carriage. For one second she stood looking at him with a face I shall never forget, and then, throwing up her arms above her head, she rushed straight down the bank and plunged into the river."

"Good God, how terrible!"

"Don Vittorio's coachman started up on the box, and gave a loud cry, but his master leaned forward in the carriage, snatched the whip from the man's hand, and lashed the horse, which set off at a furious, frightened gallop."

"Without waiting to ascertain the woman's fate?"

"And the wretched woman?"

"She was drowned. They got the body out of the river very quickly. Some boatmen were at hand, and lost no time. There was a great tumult, and a crowd that seemed to spring out of the earth, as street crowds do. My friend and I tore down the stairs, and fought our way through the throng, and saw the poor, dripping corpse carried into a cab to be taken to the hospital. But she never recovered consciousness."

"What a horrible story! Is it known who the unfortunate woman was?"

"Originally a peasant-girl on an estate of the Corleonis in the Maremma. Don Vittorio enticed her away with him to Rome when he was little more than a boy in years, though a veteran in wickedness. It is altogether a black, black story."

"How did you learn this?"

"From an old woman with whom the wretched girl had lodged in some miserable den in the Trastevere. We saw her at the hospital. My friend and I went there to see if we could do anything for the girl, but, as I told you, she was beyond human need or human help. Ah, it is well for Don Vittorio that the institution of coroners' inquests is unknown in his country. If any public inquiry were made he would cut a mighty ugly figure."

"But do you know that he has left Rome?"

Then I related the Princess's unexpected visit, and what she had said to me and Signor Sandro. Rutherford listened attentively, and then expressed his opinion that the real cause of Don Vittorio's sudden departure was to be found in the tragedy of the suicide, although he might choose to let it appear to have arisen from his quarrel with his mother. He would in all probability simply keep out of the way until the whole matter had blown over and been forgotten. Mr. Rutherford was of opinion that this would soon be the case. I asked him if he thought that the Princess was ignorant of the suicide. And he said he thought it very possible—nay, probable—that she was. No newspapers except clerical organs ever made their way into the Palazzo Corleoni, and those journals would take care to hush up a matter in which the name of so devout and noble a family was implicated.

"A miserable woman drowns himself in the Tiber. No one knows anything about her. The pious people, if they happen to see the statement, shrug their shoulders and declaim against the increase of suicide and general wickedness brought into Rome by the Italians. The next week it is all forgotten. Nay, I almost wonder at Don Vittorio's thinking it worth while to run away even for a day, except that I fancy he was seized with a sort of panic terror. It was panic that made him flog the horse and gallop off from the drowning girl."

This shocking story quite drove away any shame-faced feeling I might have had in meeting Lucy again after Rutherford's declaration. Nay, it put out of my mind for the moment my encounter with the wild-looking ciociaro, about whom I did not think again till we were all once more safe back at Tivoli."

As we approached the house where we lived I felt nervous lest we should come upon the Princess Corleoni, the unexpected sight of whom would, I knew, terribly agitate Lucy. Just when we were emerging from a narrow lane into the principal piazza of the town, a carriage dashed by us so close that Rutherford put out his arm to draw Lucy out of danger from the rapid wheels. I think he guessed who might be the occupant of it, and turned my sister in the opposite direction. It all passed like a flash, but I, who was walking a pace or two behind them, caught sight of the Princess's pale face at the window. She let the glass down, and thrust out her head to look after Lucy and Rutherford, with a softer expression on her face than I had ever beheld there before. And then she was gone. I never saw her more.

I felt so worn out with the events of the day that I shrank with a sensation of bodily weariness from the interview with Signor Sandro, who was waiting for me when I got home, stalking up and down the garden, smoking one of his favourite long black cigars with a straw in it. But the interview had to be gone through. Lucy went at once to the sitting-room, when I told her that I had a word to say to my master. "Don't put on your painting-blouse again, Catty, dear," she said. "You were at work before seven o'clock this morning." Rutherford lingered for an instant at the garden gate to ask if he might come and see us in the evening. But I said no; I must have breathing time—time not only to think, but to feel, for I was as one stunned.

"You are too tired," said he. "Pray go to rest early." And although his lips uttered not a syllable more, his voice and his eyes seemed to set the bald words to a kind of pleasant tune.

"Well, master," I said, when Signor Sandro and I were alone in the studio, "and what was the end of your interview with that high and mighty dame?"

"She is gone back to Rome, Caterina."

"I know she is gone. I saw her."

"Poor Olympia! She is sorely troubled about her son. Ah! Well, child" (rousing himself from a reverie), "it seems that that chivalrous young gentleman reproached his mother for sending Lucia away, and had a scene of great violence with her and Monsignor Chiappafotte. And then to spite his mother, he quarrelled with the Campograssos. To spite his mother, as she said; but I think myself he was in one of his devil's moods, and sought only to wreak his wrath and malice, let it be on whom it might. And then he is as proud as Lucifer, and believes that a Bastiani-Corleoni would confer a distinction on Olympian Jove himself by marrying into his family. And the Campograssos think as much of their fat Lombard acres as he does of his pedigree (they are not badly born, either, the Campograssos), and so, he being in the mood aforesaid, a little spark would set ablaze a big conflagration."

"But why did the Princess think it likely that I should know anything of her son's whereabouts?"

"Oh, it seems he threatened her that he would make matters up with Lucia. And he dropped a hint of the same sort to the Campograssos which made them furious; les they were inclined to be jealous of the fair-haired English girl already. And the Princess thought, when he took himself off in that mysterious way, that he had probably come after your sister."

With the horrible story of the drowned girl fresh in my mind, the thought of that wicked, hard-hearted man approaching my pure Lucy made me shudder from head to foot.

"But," pursued Signor Sandro, speaking with more blunt plainness than one of my own countrymen would have used to me on such a subject, "that was not likely. For as to marrying Lucia, the Princess was right in saying that he never had the remotest intention of such a thing; and he has no doubt found out by this time that there is no hope of carrying off our little white dove on any other terms."

Every nerve in my body tingled as if with bodily pain as I answered, "And it was to the wicked and lying and abominable pursuit of this man that the Princess Olympia knowingly allowed my innocent young sister to be exposed! Yes she did know it. She knew everything that went on in her house. Oh, Master, how could any woman be so base and cruel? And, in God's name, why?"

"Child," answered Signor Sandro very solemnly, "she would never have done it if she had not taken to devotion. Ah! you stare,—you don't understand. But I see it all. Partly I guessed it before, you know; and partly Olympia let drop words and hints enough to convince me. Chiappaforte marked down Lucia from the beginning. She was soft and pliant, and—had fifty thousand francs of dote. Just the thing for our pet convent, and a soul saved into the bargain. But perhaps it might not be so easy to detach a bright, pretty creature like that from the world. Oh, but the saints take care of their own. (They say the devil does; and I believe it!) Here is Vittorio philandering about the blonde Inglesina. She is a good little thing. No real evil will come of it, and if she gets a little heart-ache, a disappointment,—why so much the more readily will she turn to the consolations of religion—and the convent. There's your plan mapped out neat, complete, and all ad majorem Dei gloriam;—for the greater glory of God. Unfortunately there intrude unforeseen factors into the working out of the calculation. A stiff-necked sister, Anglo-Saxon obstinacy and honesty, and, now, Vittorio's outbreak of rebellion. Rather than let the broad acres of the Campograssos slip through the fingers of such well-affected children of the Church as the Corleoni, give up the nun and the dower,—and even the soul, if needs must. I made my bargain. Olympia will do our Lucia justice in the face of the world; and in return I will find out where her precious son is. I have means of doing so without scandal. The grand thing is to make no scandal. The Princess might have taken other means to get at her son, but they would have involved the confession that he had gone off in anger. Now that must not be known to the world. No washing of our foul linen in public, for mercy's sake! Ecco!"

I could not but observe that Signor Sandro, albeit sincerely disapproving the conduct of Vittorio (and perhaps still more intensely that of Monsignor Chiappaforte, whom I believe he secretly considered responsible for all the evil that had happened in the matter), and with equal sincerity sympathising with Lucy, yet had a certain enjoyment in being mixed up with secret machinations, and inquiries, and the rest of it. And, moreover, he was far from being entirely antagonistic to the Princess Olympia. As to her desire that her son should marry into a wealthy and influential family, that he deemed not only natural but laudable. To arrange such matters on such bases was the duty of a parent. My notions on the subject were the notions of an alien: well enough, perhaps, for sea-sundered Britons, but inadmissible for Continental civilisation. But the kind old man had our interest at heart, as he understood it. And, although I thought it misplaced, I could not but be touched by his chivalrous tenderness for Donna Olympia.

"Don't think all ill of her," he said. "She has a real affection for Lucy. Yes, yes; she has, I tell you, in spite of all that has passed. There were tears in her eyes when she spoke of her 'longing to bring that young soul into the true fold,' and how she had prayed to the Blessed Virgin for her. You know how they talk, these devout folk; but she meant it, she meant it. I know her, and I know that she meant it."

The remembrance of the pale, handsome, haggard face, with the yearning look in it, which I had seen gazing out of the carriage window after Lucy, rose up in my mind. "God knows!" I said, thinking of that look. "Perhaps she did mean it. I won't judge her so harshly as she judged us."

Signor Sandro pressed my hand. "Good girl!" he murmured. "Women ought to have some heart for each other, for I fear that we brutes of men lead them but a bad life of it. Lovers, husbands, sons, we cost them tears from beginning to end, poverette!"

With that he kissed my forehead and went away.

Lucy and I spent the evening quietly together. She was more cheerful than I had seen her for a long time past. In order to escape the effort of talking, I asked her to read aloud, whilst I sewed. She chose a merry tale, and laughed over it. And when we lay down in our beds, side by side, she was still talking cheerfully, and looking forward to our excursion on Saturday. After we had bade each other good-night, I determined to think out all that had happened during the day. But instead of thinking, I could do nothing but live over again the minutes I had passed with Rutherford; recalling all his looks and words, as I lay with closed eyes, as vividly as if I actually saw and heard them. "This is mere idle, feckless dreaming," said I to myself severely. "I mean to master my vagrant fancy." But just when I had taken this good resolution, I fell fast asleep. I was so tired.

"Benjamin du Plan, Gentleman, of Alais," from the French of D. Bonnefon (Hodder and Stoughton).—From the suppression of the revolt of the Camisards, the Huguenot Churches cease to fill a conspicuous place in the history of France. Protestantism, A.D. 1710, seemed indeed generally stamped out. The majority of its adherents—the men whose resolution failed them at the thought of prison or of exile—had taken refuge in a nominal conformity. Cases of "relapse" were keenly watched for and rigorously punished. Attempts to revive the "Churches of the Desert," nay even, when the storm was at its height, persistent obduracy in the Reformed Faith caused men to be sent to labour in the galleys and women to pestilential prisons like the Tower in the marshes of the Aigues Mortes. The work of the Pastorate was left to a few wandering missionaries, owing their lives from day to day to the completeness of their disguises or the nearness of the refuge-lands of Geneva or the Vaud—most prominent among them the famous Antoine Court. In the ranks of the Huguenots themselves were sects and parties—successors of the old "prophets of the Cevennes" in the shape of seers of visions and dreamers of dreams, who called themselves "the Inspired," and needed to be put down by the stern judgment of the Synod. Persecution, though relaxed after a time, was ever ready to renew its work at the first pretence, and did so again and again in '24, in '51, in '60, until it fled away at last before the first breath of the Revolution. Among the Huguenots of the South in these latter days, the nobleman of Alais, whose life has been written with loving care by M. Bonnefon, the present Pastor of the ancient town, was a burning and a shining light. Not a preacher himself, but friend and confidant of the preachers, above all of his young countryman, Antoine Court; protected for some time from the consequences of his obduracy by his high connections in the province, but compelled at last, at the age of thirty-seven, to save himself by flight; thenceforward Deputy (by nomination of the Synod) of the Reformed Churches of France at the Courts of the great Protestant Powers, he sums up in the copious letters still preserved in the Library at Geneva, or in the hands of his English descendants, with the story of his personal fortunes, the story, too, through all that time of the Reformers of Southern France. It is a narrative not undarkened by other shadows than those of Romanist tyranny—for Du Plan had enemies within the Synod for his supposed sympathy with "the Inspired" in his earlier years, in his after life from the meaner jealousies suggested by his position as collector and distributor of foreign aid to the victims of the persecutions—but a narrative well worth following in light and shade, whether as a picture of a lofty Puritan career, or as a general, but life-like, outline of a little known period in the history of Protestantism abroad.

In "Chess Openings, considered Critically and Practically" (Dean and Son), by H. E. Bird, the amateur who might be repelled by bulkier volumes of chess-lore will find an excellent and condensed account of the most approved openings in attack or defence, with examples from the great masters of the game from Steinitz and Zukertort up to those rivals of a now distant date, Macdonnell and La Bourdonnais. The appendix of variations on the openings most in vogue with leading players at the present moment will be of especial interest to the enthusiastic follower of champion matches and chess tournaments.

The pretty little volume, "Designs for Cottages and Other Buildings to be Constructed on the Patent Cement Slab System, W. H. Lascelles" (121, Bunhill Row, E.C.), "from sketches by R. Norman Shaw, R.A.," may convince the most sceptical that the patent slabs, whatever their other merits or demerits, are not incompatible with grace, as well as convenience, of design. A "Cottage Hospital," a "Seaside Bungalow," a row of "Shops for a Village Street"—to name no others—seem to us all that could be desired in the way of sound, unpretentious, but not unornamental, work.

A "Wine-Grower's and Wine Cooper's Manual," by William Hardman (W. Tegg and Co.), claims to make good a long-experienced want—the absence of any handy book in English on the chief facts about vine-growing and wine-making which the true "wine-cooper" (to use the olden phrase) should have at his finger's ends from his apprenticeship. Chemical analyses of different soils, varieties of the grape and in the modes of culture, cures for the diseases of the vine, treatment of wine when made by the various processes somewhat unjustly maligned as "doctoring," methods of measuring alcoholic strength, tests for detecting the amount of saccharine and extractive matter, and last, though very far from least, the care and management of the casks, form each the subject of successive chapters—too technical, of course, for readers not in "the trade," but indisputably useful for the young wine-grower.

Much experience of the crass Conservatism of English carriage-makers, their reluctance to move out of the old-fashioned grooves, and the growing superiority on many points of their French and American rivals has moved Mr. Henry Richardson—though not a carriage-maker—to throw together, under the title of "Notes on the Construction of Carriages" (Coultas and Volans, York), a number of stray reflections on the differences of English and American work, the proper proportion in the respective weights of the horse, the carriage, and the load, the cost per mile of every unnecessary hundredweight, the work to be got out of horses drawing separately or together, &c. This brochure, like the one last noticed, is strictly technical, but like it, too, it sometimes "hits a blot."

A "Soldier's Pocket Guide to Shooting," by W. G. Underhill, Sergeant Instructor, 26th Cameronians (W. Clowes and Sons), quite deserves a circulation beyond the limits of the writer's regiment. Clear, practical, and to the point, dealing with the minutiæ of musketry drill and target practice as only the trained instructor possibly can do, it never leaves the shooter without help or puzzles him with too much explanation. One can hardly rate too highly such an essay from the ranks in days when good soldier and good marksman are pretty nearly convertible terms.

Prettily illustrated and capitally arranged, "London School Series Readers" (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.)—a graduated course, from the Infant Primer to the Sixth Standard Reading-book with its selected passages from Kingsley and Macaulay—should be as successful in awakening the interest of a Board-School class as will the "Public School Series of Geography," in four parts, by the same publishers, in storing their memories with information at once accurate and fairly up to date.

Among manuals of a somewhat higher order a new volume of English School Classics (Rivingtons), in the shape of a neat edition of Milton's "L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, and Lycidas," by the Rev. E. Storr, with notes explanatory and etymological and brief but able memoir and introduction; among books for English readers of all ages a new edition (Hatchards) of that most entertaining specimen of verbal criticism, "The Dean's English," by G. Washington Moon, hardly require ampler commendation.

Under the title of "Newport and Cardiff as Shipping Ports; being Speeches delivered by J. C. Parkinson, J.P., and Other Gentlemen" (H. Mullock, Newport), we have an amusing résumé of the recent war between the younger and the elder of these South Wales ports for the right of independent railway communication with the inland coal [illegible], and of the controversy between the advocates of Newport and Cardiff respecting the Cefn-y-Wrach shoal outside the latter haven—a controversy in which the somewhat contradictory statements of the Manager of the Bute Docks find little mercy at the hands of his more skilful antagonist. Still all this is purely a matter of local interest. The general public will be content to say with the now victorious Newport, "There is room enough for both."

"Orationes Creweianae" (Parker and Co., London and Oxford).—Classical scholars, as well as University men, will read with interest the collection of Latin Orations, just published from the MSS. of the late Public Orator of Oxford. Dr. Michell, by whom the speeches were delivered, was for a period of more than fifty years one of the best known and most popular men in Oxford. He was also, without any parade or ostentation, as sound and thorough a Latin and Greek scholar as was ever produced at either University. It is not surprising, therefore, that these Orations should be worth publishing as elegant specimens of modern Latinity formed upon the classical models. They are sixteen in number, of which fourteen were delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, in alternate years, from 1848 to 1876, at the Commemoration Festivals, while the other two were congratulatory or inaugural addresses, when two successive Chancellors—the late Lord Derby and Lord Salisbury—were admitted to their office. They are now edited, with very copious English notes and introductions, which explain almost every difficulty that can arise in the text, and make the whole volume intelligible, even to a very unclassical reader. An appendix is added containing a complete history of the Public Orator's Office from the time of its original institution.

The struggle of the London poor is no new theme nowadays. London's heart, jealously closed by the poor themselves from prying eyes, has yet been laid bare by visitors and missionaries, and reformers have surely learnt that the safest means of alleviating poverty is to help the poor to help themselves. Most fully is this theory borne out by "Work About the Five Dials" (Macmillan), the experience of steady labour in some of the most wretched metropolitan districts. Sad records of suffering are these—saddest of all those instances of persons raised from misery, who, either by circumstances or from innate depravity, lapse into their former condition, their last state being truly worse than the first—but avalancing how many have been restored to comfort by timely and judicious assistance. Let all who project district visiting read this book. They will find what disappointments await them, what tact, patience, discrimination, and sympathy are needed, but they will also find plentiful encouragement. Nearly every subject connected with the relief of the poor is touched upon here with thorough good sense and clear-sightedness, and we can heartily wish the authoress worthy assistants to train in the path she has so well trodden. Though following in some measure the same road as the preceding, "The Romance of the Streets," by a London Rambler (Hodder and Stoughton), relates more nearly to the efforts of the missionaries of the London City Mission. As the work has reached its seventh edition, praise is superfluous, but it may be added that the scenes are here more forcibly drawn, as the "Rambler's" researches were in a larger field, easier of access to men than to women. Messrs. Ward also send a [illegible] edition of Miss Brewster's "Em," which has already won its way to favour.

In "Domestic Medicine and Hygiene," by Dr. W. J. Russell, M.B. (W. H. Everett), the intention of the author is to describe the principal diseases in language free from technicalities in order that they may be treated by persons having no knowledge of medicine. Dr. Russell has undertaken an exceedingly difficult task, and has attempted to do too much in too small a space. It is hard to understand how any patient is to recognise with certainty the disease from which he is suffering by means of the very meagre description Dr. Russell gives of the symptoms. We doubt even if the disease were recognised whether Dr. Russell has always suggested the remedies which will most benefit his patient, for instance, under the treatment of heart disease we find no mention of digitalis. Books written with this intention are perhaps of some use in the colonies, where it is impossible always to obtain medical advice, but we think that their use is not to be encouraged where this condition does not exist. There are doubtless many simple complaints which can be well treated without necessarily calling in the aid of the doctor, and if Dr. Russell had confined himself to describing more fully some of these ailments, his book would have a greater practical value.

In "Hidáyat ul-Hukumá: A Guide to Medical Officers and Subordinates of the Indian Service," by George S. A. Ranking, B.A., M.B. (Thacker, Spink, and Co., Calcutta), Dr. Ranking may be congratulated on writing a book which will be of great use to young medical officers who on arriving in India are suddenly called on to perform various official and professional duties necessitating some knowledge of Hindustani. It is impossible for the most industrious student to become well acquainted with this language until he has been some time in India, whereas, almost immediately on arrival, he needs some knowledge of the subject to enable him to carry on his daily work. He will find Dr. Ranking's little book valuable in giving him in a few pages the knowledge he will require for immediate use. The first few pages which are devoted to grammar serve to explain briefly the structure of the language, following these are a few notes on caste and caste prejudices, together with some hints concerning the duties of a medical officer when attached to a regiment. The latter part of the book is occupied by a quantity of well-known phrases in Hindustani and English, and by a copious vocabulary. Medical [illegible] going to India for the first time should make themselves thoroughly acquainted with this little work before leaving England.

The mercantile world has received a valuable addition in "Letts's Commercial [illegible] Atlas" ([illegible]). This capital volume is [illegible] for an [illegible] cheap [illegible] thus [illegible] the latest [illegible] and [illegible], and is [illegible] devoted to a [illegible] of maps [illegible] the [illegible] and manufacturing centres of the [illegible] particularly of America and the [illegible]. There are the usual European maps, Russia and Switzerland somewhat needlessly [illegible], but the really notable features are eleven maps of America with her railway system, the space accorded to Africa and the Cape, the two sheets of Australia, with the routes of recent discoveries, and the Asiatic series, [illegible] the [illegible] through Egypt and the Red [illegible] and the East Indies; [illegible] concerning population, &c., is appended, the whole being printed with special clearness.

FASHIONS

London and Paris are delivered over to tourists, great and small, during this month, hence it is not in the Row nor in the Bois that we must look for the fashions, but for their preparation in the workroom of the modistes, and their completion at the seaside or on the mountains at home and abroad.

First as to the useful, then as to the ornamental. Experience has taught us that for hard-working holiday pleasure the lighter and simpler the costume the better; to quote the words of a little girl, "Make my frock any way, mother, but don't put any trimmings, I am so unlucky with them." A travelling dress may be made stylish without tearable or embarrassing trimmings. For example, a costume of bronze green, Navy blue, or wood brown Estamene serge, made thus: Skirt to touch the ground, with three large patent hooks and eyes to raise it at least three or four inches when needful; the front and top of the hem embroidered or braided in a bold pattern; jacket with a deep basque to correspond; sham outside pockets on the dress openings at the side seams, right and left, the real pockets being in the petticoat on either side made flat and very deep, capable of holding many useful things, amongst which should be included a large ice-wool fichu, a pair of soft kid slippers, a pair of cuffs and a collar, a fresh bright coloured bow or tie, and two or more pocket-handkerchiefs, together with a pocket-comb and three or more narrow slices of soap, the two latter wrapped in strips of fine but old linen; only those who have met with abrasions of the knuckles or elbows will appreciate the comfort of this suggestion. As to hats to be worn on mountain excursions, soft felt, with a silk band, and an eagle's feather stuck therein, are really the most serviceable for genuine work, but for picturesque effect a Robin Hood hat of green velvet, bound with a deep gold cord terminating in two gold tassels; a species of jockey-cap made in any material to match the costume wherewith it is to be worn, or in black velvet with a broad ostrich feather round it; or shaped like a Highlander's bonnet, with plumes ad libitum—chacun à son gout is the order of the day. One fact is certain—that those who would enjoy a mountain climb must cast aside all tied-back costumes.

Those of our readers who are content to settle down at a watering-place, at home or abroad, and go through the routine of three or four changes of dress daily, will find an embarrassing variety of toilettes ready at hand. Morning wrappers of cambric, batiste, or cashmere, trimmed with torchon or Valenciennes lace, and bows of ribbon, or strips of art embroidery, made for the most part with Watteau or treble pleats. Then for the morning promenade a costume of combined woollen materials, a mixture of plain foundation, and polonaises of delicately mixed colours, so well blended as to baffle description. A material, brought out by one of our leading firms, is Bedouin Chuddah cloth, a remarkably soft fabric, made in a variety of art colours, plain and mixed. We may remark en passant that Scotch plaids are struggling for supremacy everywhere; for children of either sex nothing can be prettier or more appropriate; for grown-up people, young or old, they are only admissible as trimmings, sparingly used; for example, a costume of black silk or cashmere, trimmed with "Prince Charlie," or Argyll plaid velvet, and gold or silver buttons, made thus: train skirt of black cashmere, velvet, or velveteen, cut in deep vandykes or squares, over a band of plaid poplin, the front arranged in graduated points from the throat to the hem, fastened at each point with a gilt or silver button, over a plaid velvet plastron; collar and cuffs to match. Jacket bodices are sometimes worn, terminating in front with a point of extraordinary depth, and carried up over the hips to the waist; they will become one in a hundred figures, and make the ordinary wearer a subject for ridicule. The polonaise and jacket bodice promise to supersede the graceful Princess robe, at least for a time. The fish-wife tunic is still in favour for serge and batiste seaside costumes; the former material is often trimmed with Indian red piping, and a wide scarf tightly swathed round the narrow skirt of Navy blue; far more graceful are the trimmings of narrow white or black braid; from three to five narrow capes are worn with these costumes. As to the batiste costumes, they are simply and gracefully made for our English seaside places; but abroad, at Homburg and Wiesbaden, for example, the most fantastic and extravagant combinations of batiste or linen foundations, trimmed with costly lace, satin, and silk, may be seen.

So-called art-costumes, which at first were inclined to run riot, have now somewhat settled down. We were recently shown a charming costume of velours frappé and beige—two shades of bronze; the same may be repeated in Navy blue, dark myrtle green, or claret colour. Some of our leaders of fashion have adopted cloth costumes, braided à la militaire, for morning wear—very neat and stylish they look; hats of the same material, or of soft felt, with a dark wing, are worn therewith.

The Gossamer waterproof, an American invention, will be found most useful and convenient for showery and even stormy weather; it folds up into a very small compass, and is easily carried in a gentleman's pocket, or by a lady in her hand.

The materials used for dress toilettes are remarkably artistic and elegant. For bridesmaids' dresses nothing could be prettier than a train skirt of pearl white silk with a satin stripe, a polonaise of white silk gauze, embossed with wild roses, made high to the throat and finished off with two falling ruffs of Brussels lace or tulle; a wreath of wild roses from which should fall long lappets of lace or tulle. This embossed gauze may be had in a most exquisite shade of blue, called "azuline," which is also made in satin, and when mixed with old gold colour or bronze is most effective.

To a slender figure the so-called bébé dress is most becoming made with a deep yoke and narrow tucked bodice, back and front, and skirt to correspond.—The same may be said of a still more trying style which is adopted, with more or less success, namely, the bodice made with a back as narrow as possible, the sleeves arranged with one or two very large puffs, high upon the shoulder, a puff at the elbow, the front with a deep yoke from which the skirt comes in small, very close pleats to the hem; the skirt at the back is arranged in a short train, the waist is confined by a a wide band; pearl white or cream coloured cashmere with a few touches of colour in cardinal red, rose pink, or blue, look very stylish.

There is little to say upon the subject of bonnets and hats, which are much the same as last month, cardinal red, wide brimmed hats and diminutive bonnets of gold are amongst the startling headgear to be seen at foreign watering-places. A simple but striking bonnet was recently worn by a lady at Homburg; it consisted of two deep folds of white soft silk gauze and a loose crown, two long ends were crossed at the back and fastened with a dark crimson natural rose and foliage; the ends were brought forward and fastened at the throat with a rose; the effect was very original.

As yet the form of jackets or mantles to be worn this autumn is not quite decided; sleeveless jackets and dolmans, to match the costume, or in black, are adopted for the present, pending something more original. For evening wear caps are superseded by wreaths of flowers fastened by velvet or ribbon bows.

Magazines

I.

The recent crisis, and the questions that have arisen out of it, still hold the foremost place in the contents of the new number of the Nineteenth Century. With Mr. Gladstone's article, "England's Mission," we need not greatly concern ourselves. It is but an angry re-statement of his indictment against the Ministry for their course of conduct all along, and against the constituencies who have not withdrawn their confidence from the Ministry for all his protests and warnings. But Mr. Gladstone has now made the discovery that a "blustering" foreign policy is never unpopular in this country, seeing that "the dominant passion of England is extended empire." Whatever may be thought of this truly marvellous assertion, may we once more suggest to Mr. Gladstone that, as he has taken abundant care that no one should be in any doubt as to his opinion on the late troubles and the settlement arrived at, the time has now come for him to hold his peace, or speak to us of something else?—Whether the foreign policy of Great Britain should be "Imperial" or "Economic," is discussed in a paper, which shows his customary lucidity and power, by Mr. W. R. Greg, who begins by admitting that each of the two schools or systems of foreign policy he has thus named "has a great deal to say for itself, each can be defended by very powerful arguments, each sets before itself respectable and even righteous issues." Mr. Greg says he is "not inclined to pronounce dogmatically in favour of either," and proceeds to set before his readers some of the pleas that may be urged in favour of each with evident impartiality, as far as intention goes, though from his manner of stating the case, it is clear that his judgment leans towards those "Economic" principles which guided the foreign policy of this country from 1830 to 1875. We can at any rate speak of the paper as one deserving careful study.—Mr. Grant Duff gives us in "Echoes of the Late Debate"—which he describes as "perhaps the most historical which has taken place in our times"—a very clever and often humorous summary and exposition of the principal views and opinions put forth and maintained by the Ministry and their opponents in the debate with which the Session closed, abounding in keen and pungent criticism—as when he calls the Treaty of Berlin "a gigantic bet upon the continuance of the proverbial good fortune of Austria"—but of criticism, already just a little out of date, and therefore useless. In Mr. Edward Dicey's paper, "Nubar Pasha and our Asian Protectorate," we have a translation of a very interesting Memorandum, drawn up by request by Nubar Pasha before the meeting of the Congress, on the future administration of Turkish Armenia. The principal reforms which this eminent statesman, himself an Armenian by race, deemed necessary for bringing about a reasonable degree of prosperity in Turkish Armenia, seem to be such as the appointment of governors not liable to removal at the caprice of the Porte, the establishment of a local gendarmerie, the suppression of taxation by tithes, &c. It is obvious, is Mr. Dicey's contention, that a reorganisation of Asiatic Turkey, based upon such lines as these, would not involve the gigantic liabilities and responsibilities which have been described as the necessary consequences of our Protectorate over Asia. There would be no occasion for our setting aside the Sultan and governing in his place.—Mr. G. J. Holyoake's explanation of the nature of "The New Principle of Industry"—Co-operation; and Miss Agnes Lambert's elaborate inquiry into the use of Flowers among the ancients for religious and ceremonial purposes are also to be mentioned as noteworthy articles.

In Fraser Mr. M'Coan gives us a valuable paper on "The Resources and Products of Asiatic Turkey," forming a worthy companion to that on its various races published in the preceding number.—In "The Multiplication of Universities" Mr. Bass Mullinger discusses the question whether reformers should aim at the remodelling of our two great national Universities, or at the creation of new and independent centres, untrammelled by traditions—deciding in favour of the former course; inasmuch as, if universities are to be centres of intellectual culture, rather than of mere acquisition, such centres do not admit of indefinite multiplication.—Mr. Hardern continues his pleasant series of papers on Burmese life, concerning himself here with the climate of Burmah—which presents marked differences, chiefly for the better, to that of the neighbouring Indian peninsula—and its varied fauna and flora; and from Mr. James Rowley we have an essay—depreciatory in its general tendency—on the "Public Career and Personal Character of Francis Bacon." Bacon, contends Mr. Rowley, was not a man to whose moral character superlatives, whether eulogistic or "dyslogistic," can fairly be applied. "Base" and "despicable," "noble" and "generous" are adjectives out of place. Morally, Bacon stood on the same level as the crowd of courtiers and politicians by whom he was surrounded; he was neither worse nor better than the rest. "The truth seems to be," it is said, "that Bacon hardly ever touches Humanity on the moral and emotional side." The paper is worth reading; and so to are the picturesque sketches—the first of a series—entitled "Holidays in Eastern France," signed with the well-known initials "M. B. E."

The best paper in Temple Bar is a very full and carefully-executed sketch of the career of the famous John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee. The writer does his best to hold the scales evenly; and his estimate of this greatest of the Jacobite heroes seems to us in the main a sound one, but it seems a little strange that he should scarcely refer to the splendid picture of Claverhouse Scott has given us in "Old Mortality," a novel of which he is unquestionably the real hero. The conception, all evidence seems to show, is as true historically, as it is fine and impressive artistically. We have also in the magazine another chapter of by-gone theatrical gossip on "Garrick's Rivals and Associates," especially the celebrated Mrs. Abington, the original Lady Teazle.

In The Month we have some remarks on the contrast between the attitude assumed towards the Anglican Bishops by the old "Tractarian" party, such as it was in Dr. Newman's day, and the behaviour of their successors the modern Ritualists.—The Rev. J. Rickaby attempts a refutation of what he calls the "materialistic" psychology of Mr. Herbert Spencer and others; and we have, too, a really learned paper on the history of the Angevin Monarchy in Hungary during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The Gentleman's Magazine contains the first instalment of a sort of story by Mr. G. A. Sala, the fun of which strikes us as not a little forced and sought after, as though it had been written when the author was not in a happy vein for fooling.—Mr. R. A. Proctor communicates a paper on the "First Fruits of the Eclipse Observations," which will be of interest to astronomical students; Mr. Barton Baker tells over again—and tells it well enough—the oft-told tale of Richard Brinsley Sheridan's fortunes and misfortunes; and Mr. James Mew gives us some account of those fifteen minor novels of Cervantes which, though still read in Spain, are here all but unknown even by name.

Chambers's Journal, as usual, gives its readers no cause to complain of want of variety. Among its many papers of interest we may mention as specially worthy of note the "Story of the Marquis of Montrose," by "W. C.;" the account of the Cagots of the Pyrenees; and that of the French Oyster Nurseries at Arcachon, Ile d'Oléron, Cancale, Vannes, and Auray; whilst of Scribner's it is this time sufficient to say that it continues to stand facile princeps among magazines for the excellence and high finish of its many illustrations.

GRESHAM LECTURES, PAST AND PRESENT

There were seventeen of us when the lecture began, including one lady; and a few more droppers-in presented themselves. We entered a porch at the corner of Gresham and Basinghall Streets, and were directed by two live beadles, resplendent with gold lace, up a series of forty or fifty stone steps to the Lecture Theatre, a place capable of accommodating some four hundred persons. The hour was six in the evening, the lecturer was a Dean of the Established Church, and his subject was Geometry. He proved to us, and we endeavoured to feel gratification in the fact, that the three angles of every triangle exactly equal two right angles; together with many other triangular propositions, truthful if not exhilarating. And then at seven o'clock we took our leave.

These old-world Gresham Lectures remind us of the abuses which in past times grew up within and around the municipal and corporate privileges of the City of London—abuses very imperfectly remedied even now, and requiring unceasing watchfulness in the interest of the public. The outline of the story is tolerably well-known. Sir Thomas Gresham, the wealthy merchant who built the Royal Exchange, resided in large mansion running through from Bishopsgate Street to Broad Street. He determined that, after the death of himself and his wife, this mansion should be converted into a College or seat of learning, and endowed with the rents derivable from the Royal Exchange. By his will he made over the Royal Exchange and the mansion to the Mercers' Company and the City Corporation, who were conjointly to nominate seven competent professors to read lectures successively, one on every day of the week, on the seven subjects of Divinity, Astronomy, Music, Geometry, Law, Medicine, and Rhetoric (the physical, chemical, and natural sciences were but little cared about in those days). The lectures were to be delivered, and the professors comfortably lodged, in the mansion known as Gresham House. The salaries were to be 50*l*. per annum each, equivalent in purchasing power to 400*l*. or 500*l*. a year at the present time. The lectures were to be given in Latin, in the middle of the day, and gratuitously to all citizens who chose to attend them. Although Sir Thomas announced his plan in 1575, and died in 1579, it was not until the close of the century that the death of Lady Gresham (a grasping old woman who greatly disliked his liberality to any one but herself) permitted the commencement of the new arrangement at the mansion.

Until quite recent times, the Mercers' Company and the City Corporation cared much more for the Royal Exchange rents than for the Gresham Lectures. At first, matters went pretty smoothly. The College (the old mansion transformed) was the fixed abode of several learned men, who filled the offices of professors or lecturers, and became the centre of union for scientific and literary persons. It was under this roof that the first step was taken towards the foundation of the Royal Society, and in its rooms the first papers of the Society read. The Great Fire of London in 1666 destroyed the Royal Exchange built by Gresham, but not the mansion or College. Before the century ended, the College could boast among its Professors such men as Dr. Barrow, Sir William Petty, Dr. Hooke, Sir Christopher Wren, Briggs the mathematician, and Dr. Bull the composer.

The next century was disgraceful to the corporate and pampered Trustees of the College. They frequently left the Professors unpaid, and in 1701 petitioned Parliament to allow them to depart from many of their obligations; but this was refused. The audiences fell off; and (to use the language of one of the biographers of Sir Thomas Gresham) "the City magnates thought that any man was good enough for a dumb or non-lecturing professor; in some instances putting broken-down tradesmen, connections, dependents, or mere lacqueys into the College, in order that they (the Trustees) might draw the annual salaries which the founder had intended for the support of competent and eminent men. The institution became contemptible in the eyes of the citizens." So matters continued throughout the reigns of Anne, George I., and George II. The Trustees sold the building out-and-out to the Government in 1767 for conversion into an Excise Office. The citizens, indifferent to the reading of lectures which had become ridiculous, were equally indifferent to this demolition of the College building, and forgot or ignored the liberal intentions of Sir Thomas. To compensate the (now) nearly worthless professors for the loss of their apartments, their salaries were raised from 50*l*. to 100*l*. each. A small, dirty, dusky room, in an upper storey of the new or second Royal Exchange, was set apart for the Gresham Lectures; and there a few persons assembled, sometimes only three or four, to wonder at prosy lectures in which no spark of scientific or literary ability was displayed.

When the Royal Exchange was again destroyed by fire, in 1838, the Gresham Lectures were delivered for a time in the City of London School; until at length the present Gresham College was built and opened for the purpose in 1843.

Matters have improved in the last thirty years. But, to show how slow the improvement has been, we may advert to a letter sent to The Times no further back than April, 1875, by the Rev. J. T. Bell, then the Head Master of the Bluecoat School, or Christ's Hospital. He had been advised to take some of his boys to hear a Gresham Lecture or two, in Latin, as a means of improving them in the knowledge of that language, and increasing their stock of scientific and literary erudition. Mr. Bell accordingly took two of his Grecians (senior and most advanced scholars) to hear one of the lectures on Physic or Medicine. "At six o'clock, the advertised time for the lecture, we found two persons waiting. Before the Lecturer appeared three young men joined us; and ultimately the audience, including ourselves and some friends of the Professor, reached the number of twelve. The lecture, beginning at 6.15, was apparently read from a MS. somewhat illegible and unfamiliar to the Professor. It appeared to open with a short description of an eruption of variola or small-pox, and the symptoms were described with some minuteness. At 6.24 the lecturer, finding perhaps that the subject was wanting in interest, suddenly passed into 'An Inquiry on the Hindrances to Length of Life in a Populous City;' and wound up at 6.28." If the measure of time is correctly given, this wonderful Latin lecture on an abstruse subject lasted just thirteen minutes.

Such a letter, coming from a Head Master of the Bluecoat School, occasioned a little stir among the Trustees. Sir Charles Reed, a member of the Gresham Committee, wrote to The Times to say that several improvements were in contemplation; among which would be a rule for appointing the professors for only one year at a time, in order to afford an opportunity for introducing new blood, if necessary. We need not stop to enumerate the changes made in long gone-by years. Sometimes the lectures have been given at one in the afternoon, sometimes at six or seven in the evening; sometimes in Latin only, sometimes in English only, sometimes in both consecutively. At present, three times a year, a course of twenty-eight lectures is given, in English, and at six in the evening; four on each of the seven subjects of Astronomy, Divinity, Civil Law, Physic, Rhetoric, Geometry, and Music; and the professors for the present year are certainly competent men. Music is always the most popular of the series. If the Lectures on this subject were popular concerts and nothing more, the Hall would be filled on every occasion; but this would obviously not be a fulfilment of Sir Thomas Gresham's intentions. Still, although not a concert, each lecture engages the services of a few vocalists and instrumentalists, to illustrate the styles of music treated by the lecturer; and this gives a liveliness to the display hardly to be expected from dry scientific lectures.

Improvement is still needed. What, we may ask, is the amount of the ground-rents available for the maintenance of the Lectures? Is any, or too much, of the sum spent in Gresham Committee dinners? Will the law permit such a departure from the strict literalism of Gresham's endowment as to permit of a wider usefulness in the scope of the Lectures?

THE LAST OF THE VULGAR DOG TRIBE

CANINE creatures of low degree have enjoyed but a short spell of peace. Scarcely three months have elapsed when, armed with cord and bludgeon, the blue-coated huntsmen of Scotland Yard cried "Havoc!" and for full sixty days, and pausing to take breath only on Sundays, kept up the exterminating chase after those unlucky dogs who could not prove by a license, duly signed by an excise officer, their right to existence. How fearfully the slaughter raged, and how terribly the ranks of the four-footed victims were thinned, are faithfully preserved in the records of the Home for Unowned Dogs at Battersea. The "Home!"—heartless mockery. For the few it may be so, but for the many it is a howling wilderness of despair, a gloomy prison, with but one outlet,—a dreadful door, which opened at intervals reveals beyond baits tempting enough to beguile even a ratting terrier, but in the shadow of which crouches the executioner with his phial of prussic acid. A grip on the scruff of the neck, a momentary sensation of glass grating against the teeth, and ——!

One might have supposed that, with that terrible massacre fresh in their memory, the authorities would not have regarded it as needful to take the field in usual force now that the dog days have come round again; but the fatal edict has again gone forth. Surely all the really houseless dogs must by this time be destroyed, and a merciful deliverance for themselves and for us. Although from a dog's view, no doubt, it seems hard that, because an animal possesses a spirit of independence superior to that of the majority of his kind, and which leads him to prefer to earn a livelihood by his own unaided exertions to licking, for meat and lodging, the hand of treacherous man, who at any moment is capable of giving some one sixpence to take and lose his affectionate quadruped companion, or even to doom him to ignominious death by drowning, with a brick attached to his neck, in order that he may evade payment of the paltry dog-tax. If matters go on as at present, the end is inevitable. All dogs, excepting those who exist in a state of abject slavery, and whose tether of liberty is a six-foot chain, stapled to a wooden prison, called a kennel, will be swept from off the face of so much of the Queen's dominions as comes within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Police Act. The number of faithful mongrels, the scores and hundreds of dogs of lowly birth, but none the less honest on that account, and aspiring to nothing higher than back street society, will rapidly dwindle and dwindle, and in a short time their tale will be told. It does not follow that they will all proceed, by way of Battersea, to that bourne from which neither dogs nor men return. When matters grow very desperate, it is more likely that the remaining few—the mere hundred or so of clever old roadsters who have hitherto been successful in evading the machinations of their enemies—will, on the eve of some contemplated raid, hold hasty council, and in a body turn tail on and evacuate a metropolis in which their lives are no longer worth a day's purchase. But there is pretty sure to be one dog left—the last of his tribe—the sole survivor of the once lively and numerous family of the vulgar dogs of London! And if that last dog could but speak! It is said of monkeys that they could talk if they had a mind to, but that they cunningly refrain from doing so lest mankind should set them to work. We have amongst us learned dogs—and, singularly enough, it is those of humble birth and breeding, and lowly social position, who display the greatest intelligence and quickness of perception. We are all acquainted with wise creatures of the species who will fetch and carry at command, and who, without command, but out of doggish good nature and devotion and love of biped creatures, have saved many a poor drowning wretch at his last gasp in deep water. We hear of dogs who are learned in arithmetic, and of some who are tolerably good actors on the stage, and adepts at dancing; but the dog endowed with the gift of speech has yet to make his appearance. It would be strange, indeed, if he should turn up in that last left of the London vulgar dogs! Should it be so, when he opens his mouth a guilty people will hang their heads in shame and remorse. If he is able to speak, he will probably be able to laugh as well, and he will laugh us to scorn for our past foolishness. He will be able to convict us by recorded evidence. He will call for the chronicles of the Home at Battersea, and he will lay a paw, trembling more in sorrow than in anger, on the incriminating pages, and he will exclaim, "Oh, ye worthy followers of that Simon the Simple, who cut open the leathern belly of his mother's bellows to find out where the wind was hidden, behold in me the last of two hundred thousand faithful and intelligent mongrels, who once lived amongst you, and loved and honoured you; look on me, and tell me to what purpose you have slain my nineteen hundred and ninety-nine thousand and ninety-nine brothers and sisters? Your purpose was to discover the rabies that in your wisdom you were convinced lurked within us. It was there, and you were resolved to find it and to stamp it out. Did you succeed in discovering it? Ask your appointed canine-criminal investigator at Battersea! A stern man, and one rigorously resolved to do the duty imposed on him, but withal, he is just and impartial. Moreover, he is a man of skill, and with a profound knowledge of all the ills to which dog-flesh is heir. Here is his book, and this is what in effect he tells you: He has been long on duty at the Battersea home in the course of years—eighteen or more, nearly a quarter of a million dogs, mostly of the mongrel tribe, have passed literally through his hands, and he has found not one animal afflicted with rabies. You have exterminated your faithful and loving four-footed servants in pursuit of a phantom. You have cut open the bellows, and the wind is,——nowhere! Your unreasonable panic has led you altogether astray. It is not amongst my tribe that the terrible malady was abiding, but amongst those dogs that lead pampered and unnatural lives, who have little or no exercise, and who are dieted on food that rots their teeth, ruins their digestions, and brings their blood to a state incompatible with a healthy brain. Another thing, too, and one which you have hitherto strangely overlooked. What as to the 'in-breeding,' that in the human kind produces results so disastrous? Why should not the same evil effects attend restricted breeding amongst canine creatures? As for we free rovers, Nature is the only 'fancier' who takes an interest in us, and we are faithful to Nature. It is different as regards the aristocracy of dogdom. No matter whether the dandy in dogskin be a big carriage dog or a silken pet for the lap, its breed is sacred, and though the 'family circle' may be extended, strangers are rigidly excluded. The dog breeder has his pocket to consult, and though a dog from another county and precisely of the same kind be offered to him, he cannot be sure but that some dormant family blemish may not in the next generation develop itself, and he therefore rejects the new blood in favour of the old stock. 'Of course I do not pledge myself," the last of the honest mongrels would probably hasten to add, on observing the consternation his remarks had roused amongst his hearers," I do not positively say that this last hint of mine provides a key to the mystery; but, now that you have put an end to my unfortunate race and got it off your mind, it might, perhaps, be worth considering."

"NOT AT HOME"

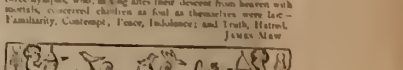
"TRUTH," says the Spaniard, "is green." This mystic utterance is supported by a pun which in our own language can be poorly represented, if we may borrow an epithet from the "Vulgar Errors" of Sir Thomas Browne, by Verity is virent. When the Spaniard makes use of it, he does not, as might be supposed, intend to convey the idea of the vigour of truth, nor of its sickness, nor indeed of its novelty; he simply desires to say that it is indigestible,—that you must not swallow much of it. That it is rather the seasoning of meat than meat itself. That, however one may grow fat on a feast of lies, no man in this world can live upon truth alone. This proverb, the aphorismatic result of the collected wisdom of years of experience, expresses a sad fact in English as well as in Castilian society, a fact to be regretted as deeply in the one nation as in the other. In our own tongue the conviction that the truth is not always to be spoken, however widely it is opposed to the suggestions of our conscience, the dictates of our morality, and the laws of our religion, is being rapidly rounded off into a proverb. A plain-spoken man, by which we may understand one who tells the truth more frequently than his neighbours, is felt to be a thorn in the side of society. Polite circles exclude him. He is cast off as an evil humour, a boil or blain on the fair-skinned surface of civilised life. He is very apt to disagree with his audience. He is not easily digested. In a word, he is green. In the glorious summer of the fashion of this world he seems to the eyes of its worshippers pale and unripe, however ripe and mellow he may seem in other eyes than ours, however fit to be garnered in that world where Truth will at last prevail, and all change of fashion be unknown.

It would never, to cull a convenient piece of slang from the counting-house, pay to declare to all so-called morning callers, people who profess to be our friends, and come to us solely to reveal their latent but harassing solicitude concerning the continuance of our good health, it would never pay to declare roundly to this inestimable folk that we have no time for idle talk, and so without further circumstance at all decline to see them. Marry no! such conduct would not be tolerated. So we say, or rather tell our servant to say, "Not at Home," a conventional form of complimentary expression, nailed to which many an honest truth-seeking man has suffered moral crucifixion. On the one hand Society loudly bids him be unabashed. None but a fool, says that blatant idol, could consider such a phrase, well understood by every one, and little likely to be received by any in a sense other than that intended, as a lie. It is a mere façon de parler. It is a social Barcelona nut which covers with a smooth shell its wrinkled kernel. We know when we give it perfectly well that we are giving two things, and that by the experienced the one will be taken and the other left. But, on the other hand, intelligence, natural intelligence, dislikes and kicks against it. Education suggests that it is scarcely consistent with Locke's definition of truth, and Conscience continually whispers, so long as she can be heard, that it stands at all events on the confines of casuistry and chicane. So much at least is certain, that few of those servants in whose mouths the sentence is almost exclusively found are sufficiently subtle to perceive the nice distinction subsisting between a falsehood and an assertion which, on the face of it, is decidedly false—our stalwart footman is seldom strong in Covarrubias, and to our kitchen vestal Escobar is commonly unknown—and it is sadly to be feared that if we countenance what she, poor, plain, uninstructed woman, cannot distinguish from the lie, known to her as a "downright wopper," or "whopper," for its orthography is undetermined, she, in her turn, and encouraged by our example will, of her own accord, utter statements respecting the voracity of our cat, in the matter of pickles or bottled ale, which no student of natural history could for one moment entertain.

On very high authority might the question of the morality of the phrase, "Not at Home," be decided, could it only be proved that it was for the benefit of the person to whom it was addressed. When the generous Rahab, with the good faith which is always to be found in those of her profession, distinctly told the king of her country that Joshua's spies, whom she had hidden [illegible] stalks, had gone out from it, she told what the most unscrupulous person must allow to be a lie, but, to Saint Augustine, her conduct was, on the whole, satisfactory. In such a case the pious father, neglecting, perhaps a little unfairly, the interests of the King of Jericho, considered solely the advantage which accrued to Joshua, and determined that Rahab's benevolence to the Jews counterbalanced her deceit to the Gentiles, and that her benignity condoned her falsehood. Thus it would seem that if the answer of "Not at home" to the morning caller could be shown to be for his or her advantage the lie, if it be a lie, would lose much of its grossness. And to show this is, perhaps, not impossible, or indeed difficult.

But the expression, "Not at home," is but a type of a large class of expressions which are either sunk in the bog of mendacity or trembling upon its borders—expressions which are exacted from us on our entrance into good society as a sort of payment before the farce. The green truth is cooked in many another guise than that of "Not at home," nor does there seem any sufficient reason, other than the frequency of its use, why the Tower of Siloam of public inquiry should fall upon this rather than any other expression of the class to which it belongs. Perhaps it were best to confess at once that politeness is not always consistent with veracity, and that every man is animated by a natural desire to avoid giving offence or incurring dislike. Plain speaking is not the only good which in this world unfortunately is followed by evil. None of us forget the unfortunate [illegible] of the three nymphs, who, [illegible] after their descent from heaven with mortals, conceived children as foul as themselves were fair—Familiarity, Contempt; Peace, Indolence; and Truth, Hatred.

JAMES MEW



"FREDA," by the author of "Mrs. Jerningham's Journal" (3 vols. Bentley).—No one can hope to enjoy this book who is not ready for the nonce to cast all care for sense [illegible] and probability to the winds, for we can no more accept Freda's adventures in sober earnest than those of "Alice in Wonderland." A beautiful, wayward, light-hearted, and light-headed child of eighteen, she runs away from the husband to whom she has been married three months, who loves her passionately, but does not understand her, and irritates her by remonstrances and fault-finding, and delights her fancy by playing at being servant. Then the husband from whom she is separated is believed by her and the rest of the world to have been killed by a fall from his horse in Brazil, and, finally, she is wooed and won by him again—this time seriously—under another name, and disguised by a wig and a red beard. Other people also are brought together after the oddest and strangest fashion, and everybody all round is left very happy at the last. But, extravaganza as the book is, it is very clever, original, and amusing. Like the "Lewis Carroll" of whom she so often reminds us, the author possesses the rare gift of being able to write charming nonsense; and Freda, whether masquerading as parlour maid in the household of the respectable bachelor clergyman, whom she bewitches, against every impulse of his better judgment, into making her an offer of marriage at the end of three days—an offer she is compelled regretfully to decline, because, as she informs him, though "it sounds the nicest plan," she is married already; or reproaching herself for not having learned ventriloquism—"How useful a knowledge of it would often be through life," she says, "and yet it is neglected, while trumpery useless things are learnt with the greatest expense and trouble!" or wondering if she "should like to be a good example," and thinking that she might "for a very short time, just at first," is, if quite impossible, nevertheless exquisitely entertaining. Nor is she without really fine and noble qualities, which develop more and more as with the birth of love within her she learns at last that she has a heart and soul. The book will be delightful to those who can understand and enjoy genuine humour, and for those only could it have been intended. Let us add that some of the many little songs put into Freda's mouth are exceedingly pretty in their way.

"Scotch Firs," by Sarah Tytler (2 vols. Smith and Elder).—Miss Tytler may complain that we are hard to please, as we have on former occasions charged her with a tendency to diffuseness, and must now express the opinion that "The Principal of St. Ninian's," the story which fills the greater part of these volumes, would have been much the better for expansion. There is no indistinctness in the author's conception or presentment of her leading characters—the vigorous, masterful, and somewhat "dour" Dr. Graham, Principal of the University of St. Ninian's, who is yet so tender and gentle with his invalid wife; the bright and ardent young Highlander, Professor Neil Colquhoun, the leader of the party in the "Senatus" which has set itself to resist the Principal's despotic authority; the weak and loving Mrs. Graham, whose life is so bound up in her husband; and the mysterious young lady, Miss Marget Graham, who plays the part of mistress of the Infant-school, but whom St. Ninian's gossip declares to be the daughter of the deceased elder brother of the Principal, and unrighteously kept by him out of her lawful inheritance of the [illegible]. Yet we feel that we do not understand and realise any of these as we ought, simply through not being allowed to see enough of them. Mackenzie, too, the "canny" Scotch "tacksman" and speculator, is far too well-conceived and life-like a personage to be wasted, so to say, upon a single scene; and the life of a Scotch University is so unworked a theme that we should have been glad to hear a great deal more about it than we do here. All the same, the tale is one of much excellence, and the author very skilfully succeeds in keeping her readers in the dark as to the real wrong of which the Principal has been guilty till the proper moment comes for disclosing it. It is quite in keeping with artistic fitness that the end of the story should be as gloomy as it is, though some will be inclined to regret that Miss Tytler did not relent, and allow the Principal, when he had atoned for his error, as far as atonement was possible, to enter upon a happy old age.

"Julia Ingrand," from the Spanish of Don Martin Palma, by J. W. Duffy, M.D. (3 vols. Elliot Stock).—This is a story of life in Chili by a Chilian gentleman, whose aim seems to have been to achieve the fiercest of onslaughts on the system of confession as practised in the Roman Catholic Church. Don Martin Palma is said by his translator to be himself a Catholic, but the character of his book would lead us to think that from long disuse of the observances of his religion he [illegible] forgotten what they really were. Unless the Roman Catholic Church in Chili is of a type wholly different from what it is in European countries, this story gives a very [illegible] picture of its workings. The book is the work of a man with no sort of gifts for the task of the novelist; it is but [illegible] translated; it is anything but pleasant reading; it is of exceptional length, and most wearisomely shaped and [illegible].

[illegible] BARRISTERS, who are [illegible] of the respect due to the Judicial Bench in a certain [illegible] court, undergo a very unpleasant penance. The Judge [illegible] on all barristers who appear in his Court donning full gown, wig, and bands, in the hottest weather, and if he finds the least attempt at long-winded discourses, or impertinence, he has the punkah stopped immediately—a plan which immediately brings back the suffocating lawyer to a proper frame of mind.

The Eastern Question.——The capture and occupation of Serajevo by the Austrians appear to have broken the backbone of the Bosnian insurrection, and, with the exception of Eastern Bosnia, where General Szapary finds it difficult to hold his own at Dobjoi, the insurgent bands are breaking up and returning to their homes, while the Turkish soldiery are quietly yielding up their posts, and are being sent to Constantinople. The Austrians, however, are greatly in need of reinforcements, and there is much talk about a further mobilisation taking place which would raise their forces to 170,000 men. Thus Marshal Philippovitch, until the arrival of his fresh detachments, has confined himself to pacifying the neighbourhood of Serajevo, which he now declares to be free from insurgents, while, as we have said, Count Szapary is compelled to act entirely on the defensive, as the main body of the insurgents is congregated near Tuzla. Hadji Lodja, the insurgent leader, is seriously wounded in the foot. In the Herzegovina, General Jovanovitch is also waiting for reinforcements, but in the meantime has occupied Nevesinje and Driena, and is advancing upon Trebinje, where a pitched battle is going on between the insurgents and the Turkish garrison, who refuse to surrender the town and citadel except to the Austrians. The calm and yet determined attitude of General Jovanovitch is bearing good fruit, and is exciting universal approbation; in fact, the conduct of the Austrian troops throughout is said to be worthy of the highest praise, although at Constantinople there is a vague rumour that atrocities have been committed similar to those of which the Russians are accused in Bulgaria. The Austrians are suffering very severely from sickness, there being no climatic medium in Bosnia between the tropical heat of the plains and the icy blasts of the mountains, and dysentery and fever are rife amongst the troops. The Austro-Turkish Convention has not yet been signed, although the Turks have waived their condition that the occupation of Bosnia should be declared "temporary." The Austrians, however, now appear in no way anxious to conclude the Convention at all, and, indeed, an amicable arrangement seems as far off as ever from being concluded. There is a great feeling of irritation throughout Austro-Hungary, and the large returns of killed and wounded have roused considerable excitement.

To turn to Turkey herself, the Russians are gradually evacuating San Stefano, and transports are continually leaving the Golden Horn for the Black Sea ports. About 20,000 men have already been conveyed to Russia, and it is expected that by the end of next week the whole of the Guards will have left. The British fleet is also preparing to quit its present position, and will probably steam to Artaki, on the southern shores of the Marmora, some time next week. Thence, when the Russian evacuation is complete, the fleet will go to Gallipoli. The Porte has as yet made no reply to the Memorandum of the British Government, which was presented by Sir A. Layard last week, although numerous Cabinet Councils are said to have been sitting upon it. The Sultan, however, as a mark of esteem to Her Majesty, has presented the Queen with a handsome album containing portraits of himself and his family. The Sultan has telegraphed to the Czar complaining of the outrages asserted to have been committed by the Russians in Bulgaria, and has received a reply to the effect that the Czar hopes that the reports are exaggerated, as he would never allow such a state of things; and the Imperial commanders have been expressly desired to "watch over the security and prosperity of all." As we have stated elsewhere, the Rhodope Commissioners are preparing their reports which, owing to differences of opinion, are to be separate, instead of, as at first proposed, collective. Those of the British, French, Italian, and Turkish delegates, however, are identical. In the meantime the Rhodope insurgents hold out; and for the future a cordon of Turkish regular troops will separate them from the Russian lines. There is considerable excitement at Constantinople respecting the sentence and death by the Russians at Philippopolis of two prominent Turks, Azif Agha and Shaban Agha. The Turks argue that, according to the amnesty declared by the Czar, the men are entitled to their liberty; but the Russians pronounce them to be criminals and not mere political offenders.

In Asia the Turks are now evacuating Batoum in earnest, and the inhabitants are showing every disposition to accept the occupation as inevitable. Considerable emigration, however, is taking place, and the chiefs of the Lazis, having discussed the promises made by the Russians, have unanimously resolved to emigrate, and the Porte has made them a grant of land on which they may re-establish a settlement. The Porte is considering various schemes for railway and other improvements in Asia Minor, but appears to have rejected all excepting the scheme of the Duke of Sutherland, which is still under consideration.

Greece is growing impatient at the inaction of the Porte with regard to the "recommendation" by Congress that Turkey should cede Thessaly and Epirus to her, and also at not having received any answer to a Note she had addressed to the Porte on the subject, and threatens to invoke the intervention of the Powers. Perhaps this threat may be inspired by the example of Montenegro, whose Prince, taking the law into his own hands, commenced hostilities against the Turkish troops, who declined to evacuate the territory which Congress had assigned to him. This has brought forth a very polite Note from the Porte, stating that Mehemet Ali had been despatched to make all the necessary frontier arrangements.

From Cyprus there is little or no news beyond that Sir Garnet Wolseley has gone on a tour of inspection, and that the health of the troops is improving. The Turkish Government have essayed to raise a loan upon the guarantee of the revenues of the island which are to be paid by the British Government, but have failed in the attempt, as it is thought not unlikely that the British Government will itself retain the money in payment for the interest of certain guaranteed loans which the Porte has failed to liquidate.

France.——The anniversary of M. Thiers' death has been commemorated by a grand service at Notre Dame, at which some 8,000 people were present, including the Ministers, the Corps Diplomatique, some 1,300 provincial deputations, including delegates from every Department for which M. Thiers had ever been elected. (In 1871, after the war, it may be remembered that he was simultaneously elected for eighteen Departments.) The Marshal did not attend the service owing to its avowed political nature, the Republicans having apparently adopted the 3rd of September as a day of partisan demonstration in much the same way as the Orleanists commemorate the death of Louis XVI., and Bonapartists that of Napoleon III. The Paris Municipality were also officially unrepresented, but for diametrically opposite reasons, M. Thiers having incurred their displeasure by his vigorous action during the Paris Commune, while the demonstration, partaking of a religious as well as a political nature, was by no means to the taste of such "irreconcileable" gentlemen. The service was in every way impressive, the Cathedral being sumptuously decked and lighted, the front being hung with silver-bordered drapery bearing the initials "A. T.," and the words "Patriam dilexit, veritatem coluit." Madame Thiers of course was present, together with her sister, Mdlle. Dosne; and the former, at the close of the service, held a species of informal reception of the deputations. Afterwards Madame Thiers drove to her husband's tomb in Père La Chaise Cemetery, where a number of deputations, including one of the Paris students, another from Belfort, and a third from Metz, deposited floral offerings upon the grave of "The Liberator of the Territory."

There is little or no political news beyond an official contradiction by the Moniteur that the Marshal has now, or has ever had, any intention of resigning. The whole story is now regarded as a mere electioneering manœuvre on the part of the Conservatives, though it still continues to excite considerable comment. The forthcoming Senatorial elections are attracting comparatively little attention, as the result is regarded as a foregone conclusion, though M. Lemoinne, with his characteristic caution, warns the Republicans not to be too sanguine that the Conservatives, disorganised as they undoubtedly are, will cease all dangerous opposition to the Republic. The Marquis of Salisbury is in Paris, where he is said to be conferring with M. Waddington on Egyptian matters.

In Paris the members of the various Congresses and Committees connected with the Paris Exhibition continue to dine together, and to compliment each other in prettily worded speeches. The list of Exhibition prize winners will be ready on the 15th instant. The number of paying visitors to the end of July amounted to 5,056,139, as compared with 3,846,479 in 1867, although the opening that year was a month earlier.—The International Horse, Donkey, and Mule Show has been held in the Esplanade des Invalides, and has been very fairly successful. Sixty-five horses were of English breed, although many were owned by the French Government and other breeders, but two of the chief features of the show were the Hungarian and Russian exhibits, both of which excited considerable attention.—There have been two first representations—a three-act opera-bouffe—La Croix de l'Alcade, the music by M. Perry Baggioli, at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, and a five-act drama, Une Erreur Judiciaire, by Charles Belle, at the Château d'Eau.

The weather in the south of France has been excessively hot, and out of a detachment of Reservists marching from Lyons to to Heyrieux, several died from the heat, and a large number had to fall out by the way.

Russia.——Considerable anxiety is now being openly manifested by the Government respecting the disorganised social condition of the people, and the Official Messenger has published a long article, declaring that the patience of the Government had become entirely exhausted by the series of criminal acts "committed by a large number of ill-disposed individuals, culminating on the 16th ult. by the assassination of General Mesentoff," and that for the future "inflexible severity" will be the rule in treating such offenders. The Government accordingly makes an appeal to "society itself—to all classes of the Russian people to eradicate an evil which has its root in false doctrines." The Russian people are said to be exceedingly pleased at this frank appeal of the Government to their good sense, but at the same time the whole of Russian society is so honeycombed by secret societies and Nihilistic doctrines as to afford little hope of any remedy being speedily found for the evils which are now threatening Russia. In the mean time Count Schouvaloff has been appointed Minister of Police, a step which is looked upon as exceedingly judicious.

United States.——The epidemic of yellow fever in the south is still increasing, and last week the mortality at New Orleans exceeded a thousand deaths. The disease also is rapidly spreading, and the most intense panic reigns in the affected district. The Government are taking energetic steps to relieve the poor, but great suffering prevails among the poor of the stricken towns. It is even difficult to get the dead buried, while, although physicians and nurses are arriving from other quarters, they are succumbing to the disease. Owing to the virulence of the epidemic political campaigning has been suspended in the south-west.

Italy.——The Italian Consul at Semjevo, Signor Perrod, has been assassinated on his way through the insurgent districts. Signor Perrod had been suddenly ordered back to Serajevo by his Government on account of the Austrian occupation, and intended to accompany the mails, but on finding them gone started with only one companion. The bodies of the Consul and his companion have since been found, but the murderers have not been discovered, as the crime was committed before the Austrians took possession of the district.—The fanatic Lazzaretti is now declared to have been at one time in league with the French and Italian Clericals, as he warmly supported the Papal cause, and in 1872 tried to get up a plot for the restoration of the temporal power. The Clericals gave Lazzaretti up when he remodelled his sect in the spring. The Pope has sent a delegate and the Pontifical Choir to attend the ceremony of consecrating the new church at Canoscio, near Perugia. This step is thought to be significant, as the Pontifical Choir has never before left Rome, and is regarded as likely to lead towards the ultimate abandonment of the Papal "imprisonment" theory.

India.——Sir Neville Chamberlain, the Special Envoy to Afghanistan, is still at Simla awaiting the Ameer's reply, and a native envoy has been sent on in advance. The Ameer is slightly recovering from the shock of his son's death, and has attended a public Durbar. Meanwhile, it is reported that Yakoob Khan has escaped from Cabul, and has fled to Ghazni, while he is further said to be half idiotic from long confinement and the severity of his father's treatment. As yet nothing has transpired officially respecting the terms to be offered the Ameer, but it is generally believed that the Ameer will be required to allow a permanent Resident at Cabul, and British agents in other parts of his territories, although it appears hardly likely that Shere Ali will give his consent unless the British demands are supported by the menace of an occupation of Afghanistan in case of refusal. A powerful military demonstration at the frontier is warmly advised.—A strong feeling against the maintenance of caste restrictions has set in throughout India, and at a recent meeting of the Bengal Social Science Association only one native speaker defended these old-rooted prejudices. Several high caste gentlemen spoke warmly of the ills occasioned by the caste system, and the subject is to be again discussed at another meeting.

Miscellaneous.——In Hungary a tremendous waterspout has burst over the town of Miskolcz, and has reduced a once thriving commercial centre to little better than a pile of bricks and mortar. "The shock was terrific," writes a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, "the houses reeled for a moment from their basements, and then came down with one tremendous crash." In an adjoining village huge masses of water were seen running down the hills like lava vomited by a volcano, while no fewer than three hundred soldiers and firemen lost their lives.—Spain is already discussing who is to be her new Queen, but a semi-official telegram contradicts all such rumours, and states that the King is still depressed with grief, and that his Cabinet would not insult him by raising such a question. Popular report however, declares that the most likely lady is the late Queen's elder sister.—In South Africa Parliament has been prorogued, and the 6th ult. was kept as a day of thanksgiving. In Natal matters are not wholly satisfactory, as Secocoeni is openly hostile. Other chiefs, however, have sent flags of truce to the British lines.

THE COURT

The Queen continues at Balmoral with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold. Her Majesty and the Princess were present last week at the Braemar Gathering at Old Mar Castle and remained during the greater part of the games, being saluted by a guard of honour composed of the respective clans both on their arrival and departure. Mr. Cross is staying at the Castle as Minister in attendance, and has dined with the Queen nearly every evening, while the Rev. A. Campbell joined the Royal party at dinner on Sunday. Prince Christian Victor, eldest son of Prince and Princess Christian, who is staying at Braemar, has also lunched with Her Majesty. The Queen and the Prince and Princess did not go to Crathie Church on Sunday, but Divine Service was performed at Balmoral by the Rev. A. Campbell.—The Court is now in mourning for the late Queen Christina of Spain. The mourning will be lightened on the 15th inst., and laid aside on the 22nd.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their children, with the King and Queen of Denmark, returned to town this week from the Isle of Wight. Last week the Prince paid a brief private visit to Lord Alington at Crichel, leaving again on Saturday evening for Southampton, whence he sailed in his yacht, the Hildegarde, to Cowes. Meanwhile the Princess, with the King and Queen of Denmark, Princess Thyra and Princes Waldemar and William went over to Ventnor, inspected the town, and drove through the village of Bonchurch to Shanklin Chine, and Sandown, returning to Cowes in the evening. On Wednesday the whole party came up to Marlborough House, whence the Danish Royal Family will return to Copenhagen. The Prince and Princess of Wales and their children go shortly to Abergeldie.

The Duchess of Edinburgh gave birth to a daughter on Sunday at Coburg. This is the Queen's 26th grandchild, and the Duke and Duchess's fourth child and third daughter. Both the Duchess and her baby are going on well.—The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne are staying with the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh at Coburg.—The Duke of Connaught is still at Potsdam, and will not be home for another fortnight.—Prince William of Germany, eldest son of the Prince and Princess, left Berlin on Tuesday night for Scotland, on a visit to the Queen.—The Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz is staying with her mother the Duchess of Cambridge at St. James's Palace.

The remains of the late Queen Christina of Spain have been placed in the Pantheon of the Escurial, the vault reserved for such Spanish Royal personages as have either reigned or have been the parents of reigning sovereigns. The late Queen left a fortune of 320,000*l.*, which will be divided amongst her family by her second husband, Queen Isabella and the Duchesse de Montpensier having already received their share.—Prince and Princess Henry of the Netherlands have entered the Hague in State amidst much enthusiasm and heavy rain, the orange colours of the Dutch Royal Family being displayed in all forms and shapes, and the favourite emblems being orange and white striped umbrellas. Prince Wilhelm of Prussia arrived in London on Wednesday.

CHURCH NEWS

The Day of Intercession for Missions.——The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have issued the following circular to the Bishops of their respective provinces:—"Dear Lord Bishop,—It is generally known that the Bishops from all parts assembled in conference at Lambeth agreed to recommend Tuesday before Ascension Day as on the whole the most suitable to be observed by all the branches of our Church as a Day of Intercession for Foreign Missions, after the present year. A desire has been expressed, in which we concur, that the present year should not be allowed to pass without a day of intercession; and we recommend that, for this year only, Saturday, 30th November, or any of the following seven days, be observed for that purpose. It will doubtless be remembered that the Church in Tinnevelly has already made the unprecedented accession of 20,000 souls to the Church a subject of public thanksgiving. Nor does this event stand alone as an indication that the hearts of the people of India are turning to God. We cannot but regard this as a special reason for our thanksgivings and prayers this year. We venture to hope that the clergy and laity in both Provinces, if invited by the Bishops of the dioceses, will join together in setting apart a portion of time for special prayer as recommended."

Various.——On Friday the Synod of the united dioceses of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin met in St. Canice's Cathedral, Kilkenny, for the purpose of electing a bishop in the room of the Right Rev. Dr. Gregg, who has been translated to the See of Cork. The Archbishop of Dublin presided, and there was a very large attendance of members. Four candidates were proposed: viz., Archdeacon Wynne, Dr. Robert Hannay, of Belfast, and Dean Pakenham Walsh, of Cashel, the last-named a gentleman of great learning and ability, and in high estimation, but whose Evangelical views were supposed to be an obstacle to his election. Four votes were taken before any candidate obtained the requisite majority of two-thirds of the lay and clerical votes, but ultimately the choice fell upon Dean Walsh, who was declared elected, subject of course to the confirmation of the Bench of Bishops.—The Rev. J. B. Heard, who for twenty-three years was in Holy Orders, but left the Church about three years ago to become a lecturer of the Liberation Society, has now rejoined the Established Church of England, and been licensed to the curacy of St. Andrew's, Westminster. He remained with the Society only a few months, and was subsequently pastor of a chapel at Stockwell, where the Rev. Dr. Thomas, Congregational minister, formerly preached.—The Rock says that Miss Cotton, only child and heiress of the Rev. Dr. Cotton, Provost of Worcester College, Oxford, and niece of Dr. Pusey, has just seceded to the Roman Catholic Church. Miss Cotton has for several years past been an advanced Ritualist, and a regular attendant at St. Barnabas Church, Oxford.—Lord Penzance and the complainants in the Mackonochie case have given notice of appeal, but the re-hearing of the case cannot take place until November.—The twenty-first anniversary of the Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom will be observed to-morrow (Sunday) at the Church of All Saints, Lambeth, and during the week. Special sermons will be preached to-morrow, at seven p.m., by the Rev. Dr. F. G. Lee, and on Tuesday, at eight p.m., by the Rev. T. W. Mossman, vicar of Torrington.—The Bishop of Meath, presiding last week at a meeting of the Meath Protestant Orphan Society, alluding to the recent Pan-Anglican Conference at Lambeth, said that some deluded people entertained the strange and ridiculous notion that because the Irish Church had thought it right to revise her canons and liturgy, therefore her Bishops would be coldly received, and that a vote of censure might even be passed upon the Irish Church. He was not at liberty to discuss all that took place at the meeting; but he was at liberty to state this, that they were received with the most cordial and hearty welcome, and that not one word was spoken during the whole time in the way of censure or disapproval of their conduct—in fact, they were received in a manner that caused even himself, who was somewhat sanguine and patriotic, a good deal of surprise. He would add one word more in connection with that conference, and it was that the remarks at it which elicited the greatest admiration, and the address which every one admitted to be the most able and brilliant, was that delivered by an Irish prelate—the Bishop of Killaloe.—On Saturday, the Earl of Haddington laid the first stone of a new borough school at Haddington, which is to be erected as a memorial to John Knox, who was born in that town. The Earl made a speech, in which he remarked on the fitness of such a memorial to John Knox, who so earnestly urged the necessity of "the virtuous education and godly upbringing of the youth of the realm"—words that ought to be borne in mind not merely by the admirers of the great Reformer, but also by his detractors.—The Church of England Temperance Society are getting up a memorial to Sir Garnet Wolseley, declaring that there is only too much reason to fear that unless stringent and timely measures of precaution are taken, the traffic in strong drink will be among the first to develop itself in the island of Cyprus, and in the extension of drinking habits among the people another grievous blot will be thrown upon the escutcheon of England; and praying him to adopt measures to prevent the increase of drinking-houses, if already existing, or the establishment of new ones under whatever name, and to encourage temperance both among natives and foreigners.—The Nonconformist, in a paragraph on pulpit plagiarism, says that recently a student, after delivering a trial discourse in a Scottish divinity hall, being charged by one of his fellow-students with plagiarism, coolly replied, "I wrote my sermon with inverted commas." "But how," exclaimed his fellow-student, "could your inverted commas be discovered by the Professor?" "Did you not observe," replied the unabashed thief, "that I turned up my tongue twice, in imitation of inverted commas, when I commenced my discourse, and turned down my tongue twice, at the other side of my mouth, when I had finished my sermon?"

THEATRES

THE new version of Uncle Tom's Cabin produced at the PRINCESS'S Theatre is more remarkable for its excessive length and for the elaborate character of its incidental embellishments than for ingenuity of construction or dramatic tact. Like his predecessors who have attempted the difficult task of producing something like a stage representation of Mrs. Stowe's popular story, Mr. Rowe has deemed it advisable to confine himself to a series of scenes which aim rather at striking the imagination and exciting the sympathy of the audience than at producing a consecutive story. This, however, is a characteristic common to most attempts to construct a drama on the foundation of a novel, and it may perhaps with justice be pleaded that few among those who will see this piece performed are likely to be unacquainted with the original work. The most prominent characteristic of the performance, and that which gives most pleasure to the audience, is the plantation songs, choruses, and dances and the instrumental performances of the coloured troupe. Whether these entertainments are really characteristic of the old slave life in the Southern States of America, as is popularly believed, or whether they belong merely to the category of conventional negro accomplishments, really matters very little. The effect of the festival melodies, choruses, songs, and hymns sung with accompaniments by the highly-trained and accomplished coloured performers whom the enterprise of Messrs. Jarrett and Palmer has brought over here, is at all events very pleasing, and it adds much to the picturesque effect and dramatic complexion, so to speak, of the play. It is to be observed that, although the performance is stated to be supported by "one hundred real freed slaves" and "a host of Jubilee Singers," the burden of the acting of the play falls chiefly upon the white members of the company. This is a matter of course in the case of the white characters, such as the ruffian Legree—represented with due force and energy by Mr. Rowe—and perhaps of those who, like the hero, George Harris, are supposed to have a moderate quantity of negro blood in their veins; but the fact that the high-minded and heroic Uncle Tom is represented by a white performer, with an artificially darkened skin, must be held to indicate a dearth of pure histrionic talent among the negro actors. Harris is personated at the Princess's by Mr. Warner with excellent feeling, and Uncle Tom with genuine power by Mr. C. H. Morton; Miss Bates's Topsy is a clever piece of acting, affording much cause for merriment to the audience; and altogether the representation is satisfactorily sustained.

The reopening of the GLOBE Theatre on Saturday evening, under the management of Mr. Alexander Henderson, was the occasion of the production of a drama, in two acts, written by Mr. Joseph Mackay, and bearing the title Mayfair and Rag-fair. Mr. Mackay's piece is a rather extravagant melodrama, dealing with the supposed proceedings of a Jew who, while making money by nefarious practices in Rag-fair, is endeavouring to attain an exalted position in society at the other end of the town. Mayfair and Rag-fair seems a little out of place at the Globe, where a lighter and brighter class of entertainment is expected. It is, however, supported by a clever piece of acting in Mr. Fernandez's impersonation of the Jew Gorm, and it serves its purpose of occupying the time until the curtain rises on the comic opera, Les Cloches de Corneville, which, with some improvements, has been transferred here from the FOLLY.

Mr. Wills's beautiful play, Olivia, will be performed at the COURT Theatre, this evening, for the last time this season. The theatre will reopen for a short series of performances on the 14th inst., under the management of Mr. W. H. Stephens, who will produce a new drama, entitled Memories.—The DUKE'S Theatre reopens this evening, under the management of Messrs. Holt and Wilmot, with a new dramatic version of M. Victor Hugo's Les Misérables, entitled The [illegible]. The OLYMPIC reopens on the 23rd inst. with a revival of The Two Orphans.—Miss Lydia Thompson and her company will reappear at the FOLLY Theatre on Saturday next, when a new comedy in three acts, adapted from the French of Meilhac and Halévy, and a new burlesque founded on L'[illegible], by Messrs. Farnie and Reece, will be performed for the first time.

THE EGYPTIAN HALL.—Mr. Maskelyne's new automaton musician "Labial" made his début on Monday last, and would doubtless have excited much more wonder than he did, were it not for the fact that its inventor by his previous productions has taught us not to marvel at anything, however extraordinary, which he may accomplish. Labial plays the euphonium accurately, and with much delicacy of expression, the distinguishing feature of the contrivance being the marvellous lip-action necessary to produce the notes from the instrument. The figure plays alone, and also in company with "Fanfare" and Mr. Maskelyne, and in order to avoid the suspicion of electricity being employed, the supply of air from the bellows is passed through a tube of glass instead of metal. It is understood that Mr. Maskelyne intends to make a complete automaton orchestra, of how many performers we know not, and it is even whispered that we may soon listen delightedly to the works of a mechanical musical composer. The entertainment still includes the puzzling and apparently undiscoverable anti-spiritualistic phenomena, and the performances of the now famous "Psycho" and "Zoe." The Hall itself has been tastefully re-decorated, and additional accommodation is provided in the shape of some handsome and commodious private boxes.

THE EIGHTH of a series of promenade concerts was held at the Marble Rink, Clapham Road, on Tuesday evening, before a large and appreciative audience. The programme was an attractive one, and included several old favourites, amongst which we may mention "The Village Blacksmith," capitally rendered by Signor Campobello, "The Bay of Biscay," equally well sung by Mr. C. Abercrombie, "Kathleen Mavourneen," given with much expression by Madame Sinico-Campobello, and "Cherry Ripe," charmingly sung by Miss E. Villiers. Several well-known selections were ably performed by the band.

THEATRICAL BENEFIT FOR THE HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN.—The proceeds of the first Gaiety matinée this season, on Saturday, Sept. 14, will be devoted to this excellent charity. All the company have kindly given their services. The programme will include the Dampier Children in Helen's Babies (first time in England), and all the Gaiety favourites in a farce, and Byron's burlesque, The Bohemian G'yurl.

SPORTING

THE TURF.—It is no exaggeration to say that the death of Mr. George Payne on Monday last has cast a gloom over the whole racing world. For well nigh half a century he has held a conspicuous position on the Turf, and, though he has speculated freely and lost heavily, he has passed through a very difficult ordeal with unsullied honour. He was one of the best "all-round" sportsmen of the day, and excelled in every pastime he took up, being acknowledged for years one of the most accomplished whist players in the kingdom. As Master of the Pytchley Hounds he more than justified the expectations formed of him. He was a most intimate friend of the late Earl of Glasgow and Admiral Rous, and in him the Turf has lost another of its Mentors. Few men had more friends or was more popular among all with whom he came in contact. He was in his seventy-fifth year. The funeral takes place at Kensal Green, on Friday, at noon, and will doubtless be attended by an assemblage of celebrities such as is not often seen in that well-known cemetery.—The event just alluded to had a marked effect on the Warwick Meeting, which from its proximity to the Leger always attracts a large company. Mr. Crawfurd naturally withdrew all his horses, and some other owners followed his example, while hundreds of familiar figures absented themselves from the Grand Stand. There was, however, some interesting racing enough and some good horses put in an appearance. Kineton's class enabled him to give weight to six others in the Leamington Handicap, and to win with not much trouble; Herald, who hardly misses a week without scoring a race, beat Lady Ronald and three others in the Kenilworth Plate; and the smart Sword Knot, by carrying the top weight and winning the Grendon Nursery, showed that her recent successes were by no means flukes, as some suggested. On the second day Major Stapylton, whose stable just now seems in excellent form, took the Warwick Welter Cup with Senator, and Mr. Gretton the Studley Nursery with Hermia.—Richmond had a fair meeting, but the animals engaged were mostly second-rate. Derby suffered from the same cause as Warwick, Mr. Savile, out of respect to the memory of his friend, withdrawing all his horses.—The chief interest in the Leger naturally continues to centre in Beauclerc. After three days' holiday from hard work the horse began to gallop again, and by this time is probably at Doncaster. It is evident that the ring does not dare to take any liberties with him, and since Monday the market price has gradually shortened from 10 to 7 to 1. Of course it is easy enough to say now that if Beauclerc had not been stopped in his work he would have won the Leger; but such a statement was quite justified, for as a two-year-old he was many pounds better than any of the Leger horses, and it was well known from a recent rough gallop that he had retained his form. The question now is whether he can afford to lose the three days' hard work so near the time for a race which may be said to be run at full speed from start to finish, and therefore requires a horse to be thoroughly prepared. At the time of writing Insulaire has assumed the lead in the quotations at 4 to 1, with Red Archer next in demand, and then Lord Falmouth's pair.

CRICKET.—The season is now drawing to a close as far as grand matches are concerned; but the last few days have been busy ones enough.—The visit of Kent to Nottingham brought forth no fruit, as thunderstorms and deluges of rain upset the calculations, and eventually caused the game to be drawn. However, as the figures stood it was long odds on Notts.—Gloucestershire seems rapidly going down hill, as on the Clifton College ground all the Graces and their band could only make 85 in the first innings against the 238 of Surrey, who were substantially the victors, though a draw took place.—[illegible] again at Scarborough, notwithstanding Mr. A. J. Webbe's contribution of a round 100, had to succumb to Yorkshire, the latter making the grand total of 350 in the first innings, and winning the match by 9 wickets.—The Australians played a capital match on Monday and Tuesday against a very fair Eleven of Players at the Oval, and beat them by 5 runs. Barratt performed the most unusual if not unprecedented feat, at least in a first-class match, of having the credit of all the 10 wickets in the first innings, and the ball he used is to be mounted in silver and presented to him.—Thomas Humphrey, the old Surrey cricketer, died on Tuesday last.

AQUATICS.—The third Thames International Regatta was brought off between Putney and Chiswick on Saturday and Monday last. As heretofore it was under the auspices of the London Steamboat Company, and was confined to professionals and [illegible], with a purse for police crews. Unfortunately, no entries from abroad gave it an international character, but the antagonism between Northern and Southern oarsmen imparted considerable interest into the proceedings. The results show that the Tyne men and their friends carried off the three chief prizes, Elliott of Pegswood beating Higgins (the champion) in the sculls, Lumsden and Boyd of Newcastle taking the pairs from Thomas and Higgins of London, and the Northern Four, Boyd, Lumsden, Nicholson, and Elliott, easily winning from the London men, Green, Messenger, Higgins, and Thomas.

SWIMMING.—The 500 yards Championship Race was contested on Tuesday evening at Wenlock Baths, City Road. This was the third year of the competition, W. Beckwith winning on the first occasion, and J. B. Johnson last year. The latter won again on Tuesday, and if he can repeat his success next year the Silver Challenge Cup will become his property.

FOOTBALL is making great progress in Australia. At Melbourne the Carlton and Waratah Clubs played the Great Intercolonial Match, consisting of two games, one under the Rugby and the other under the Victorian rules. The Carlton had the best of both games, in the latter of which one of the players had his thigh fractured.

LEGAL

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.—Sir E. Henderson's report for the year 1877, which has just been printed, is full of interesting and suggestive statistics. The re-organisation of the Detective department is referred to and described, and also the new scale of pay and system of promotion, which we mentioned last week. The strength of the force on Dec. 31st, 1877, was 10,446, including 25 superintendents, 279 inspectors, and 1,078 sergeants. Speaking generally, the conduct of the men appears to have been good, for though we find that 167 men were dismissed and 136 were called on to resign, there were 15 only who were charged before magistrates; whilst, on the other hand, ten men were commended for their zeal by Her Majesty's Judges, and 748 were rewarded by the Commissioner. The number of men reported for drunkenness decreased from 1,017 in 1876 to 937 in 1877. The growth of the metropolis during the year was above the average, for no fewer than 14,440 new houses, covering a length of more than thirty-nine miles, were erected and placed under police supervision. The number of arrests was 77,[illegible], and out of these there were 54,034 summary convictions, and 2,571 convictions after trial; while 163 accused persons were acquitted by juries, and 20,514 discharged by magistrates. Burglary and housebreaking increased so much that special arrangements were made to suppress it; 1,853 cases are recorded, 203 of which were in the Islington district. The highway robberies which occurred at Blackheath in September last are specially alluded to. Drunkenness did not increase during the year, a fact which Sir Edmund attributes to the depression in trade. The number of fatal street accidents, as compared with the previous year, decreased from 130 to 120; but the number of persons injured increased from 3,740 to 3,836. The greatest number of these accidents occurred in Holborn, Highgate, Islington, Stepney, and Camberwell. No fewer than 8,483 children and 3,216 adults were reported as lost or missing; of these 5,441 children and 799 adults were restored to their friends by the police, 3,017 children and 2,274 adults were found by friends or returned home, 2 children and 60 adults committed suicide, while 23 children and 63 adults have not yet been accounted for.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.—Horsemonger Lane Gaol, which has just been closed, under the Prisons Act recently passed, was built in 1798, and is famous as the place of confinement not only of criminals and debtors, but of political and literary offenders also. It was here that in 1803 Colonel Despard, with six of his companions, suffered death for conspiring to "overturn the Constitution and destroy King George III. and the rest of the Royal Family." Here, too, Leigh Hunt spent two years of his imprisonment for having described the Prince Regent as "an Adonis of forty," and the Rev. Mr. Taylor, otherwise called "the Devil's Chaplain," was incarcerated for two years for preaching [illegible]. More recently Colonel Valentine Baker and the Rev. Arthur [illegible] have been accommodated within its walls.—A [illegible] for keeping a betting house at [illegible] house has resulted in the [illegible] of a fine of [illegible].—The Brighton Town Council have had another rather [illegible] discussion respecting the alleged existence of gambling-houses in the town, and the [illegible] of the Watch Committee to interfere, and have [illegible] that nothing can be done unless more definite information is [illegible].—During the hearing of a charge [illegible] at the [illegible] Petty [illegible] on Monday, some curious revelations were made respecting the conduct of a certain "[illegible]" [illegible]. It was stated that the members paid 3d. per month, and were allowed to introduce a friend on payment of another penny. The club was open for [illegible] and dancing on Sundays and week-days alike, and intoxicating drinks could be obtained in any quantities, and at almost all hours, both by members and non-members, not only for [illegible] on the premises, but also to take home to [illegible].—The Mayoress of Liverpool, while staying at an hotel in Glasgow, has been robbed of her [illegible]. [illegible] depredations have been committed in Glasgow for some months past, but the police have as yet no clue to the thieves.—The other day Alderman [illegible] B. THE NEW DEEP-SEA HARBOUR AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER AS IT WILL BE—BIRD'S-EYE VIEW FROM THE EAST CLIFF three months' imprisonment, said that the system of dog-stealing was carried on to an enormous extent in London, and that he knew of a case in which a lady had her favourite dog repeatedly stolen, and she had paid between 80*l.* and 90*l.* on different occasions as rewards for its restoration.—A man who is "known to the police" is in custody for a singular fraud. Having by some means ascertained that a certain Mrs. Harvard had a brother who was in prison, he wrote to her and had several meetings with her, representing himself as chief warder of the prison in which her brother was confined, and offering to take anything to him which she could spare. The unsuspecting woman gave him nearly 10*l.* in money, beside 10*l.* worth of clothing.—The other day Mr. Villiers, of the Canterbury Hall, took his juvenile army to the Alexandra Palace to enact "The Siege of Plevna." After the performance the boys were invited to see the wild beasts, and, quickly piling their arms, they rushed off. There appears to have been some misunderstanding about the matter between Mr. Villiers and the proprietor of the menagerie, and when he heard Mr. Daniels telling the boys to "come on," he naturally got angry and gave him a push. A charge of assault was the result, and Mr. Villiers had to pay a fine of 10*s.*—A lady named Castine, who was housekeeper at the Junior United Service Club, has died from the effects of burns, which are supposed to have resulted from the accidental ignition of her clothing, she being in the habit of reading in bed. It is a singular feature of the case that, though she was so fearfully injured as to die within twenty-four hours after the accident, she would admit no one to her room to render assistance.—Much indignation has been excited in the neighbourhood of the Old Kent Road by the discovery, on the premises of an undertaker, of the bodies of seven infants which had been entrusted to him for interment. No legal proceedings have as yet been taken against him, but on Saturday the house was partly wrecked by a mob, who would have also lynched the proprietor if he had not judiciously kept out of the way.—On Friday last a double murder was committed at Northampton by a man belonging to the Northampton and Rutland Militia. He had been degraded from the rank of colour-sergeant for some military offence, and was under orders to leave his quarters. He got a rifle and shot two of his comrades in the same regiment, and also fired at a third man, who only escaped by happening to duck his head at the right moment. He has been handed over to the civil authorities, and will of course be tried for wilful murder, though it is stated that he was mad.

PATTERNS FREE. BLACK SILKS.

Manufactured by BONNET, of Lyons.

Messrs. JAY beg to inform their patrons and the Public generally that they are now selling these well known pure light dyed SILKS at a reduction from 33 to 40 per cent. off prices that were charged previous to the depression in the Lyons Silk Market.

"	5s. 9d.	"	8s. 3d.

As these low prices are not at all likely to continue, and as Silks wear much better when not used fresh from the loom, Messrs. JAY strongly recommend their Customers to take advantage of the occasion, to make purchases of that always fashionable and useful article, a good black Silk.

FROM THE PICTURE BY T. WALTER WILSON

THE ABERCARNE COLLIERY EXPLOSION.——In the history of the Great French Revolution the month of September is associated with frightful massacres. September, 1878, seems likely to be distinguished by an equally sinister reputation. Since the month began one horror has succeeded another. The alarm produced by the shocking railway accident at Sittingbourne was almost forgotten in the widespread excitement caused by the far more terrible disaster which befel the Princess Alice, and now, within eight days of that tragedy, nearly three hundred miners have lost their lives by a colliery explosion in South Wales. Lamentable as is this accident, it presents unfortunately, as far as is at present ascertained, no special features of novelty. It is the old, old story. The pit was supposed to be as safe as could be expected from the character of the coal obtained there, the machinery for winding, ventilating, and pumping, was of the most perfect kind, and the use of safety lamps was enforced among the workmen. We shall here only make a single observation. Would such accidents be less likely to happen if there were more shafts, and if so, would it not be better to pay a higher price for our coal, if the increased ventilation produced by additional shafts would secure for the coal-getters a greater immunity from accident? At Abercarne, although the workings extended over an area of three miles, there appear to have been only two outlets to the open air. What is needed is some safeguard, which, unlike Davy lamps, is not liable to be frustrated by individual carelessness. If Science pronounces that such safeguard is impossible of attainment, we must submit in patience to these periodical massacres.

THE SITUATION IN AFGHANISTAN.——Marked as is the ability of Sir Neville Chamberlain, he will need to have all his wits about him at Cabul. As the game stands at present, Shere Ali has all the best cards in his hand, and, what is worse, he knows it. On the one side there is General Abramoff threatening and cajoling by turns; on the other, there will shortly be the representative of England, also doing all in his power to secure the friendship of Afghanistan; between these two stands the Ameer, feeling himself a far more important personage than he had ever hoped to be in his wildest dreams. Shere Ali is little likely to sing "How happy could I be with either, Were t'other dear charmer away." On the contrary, he would much appreciate the presence of half-a-dozen other "dear charmers," and, no doubt, he is vastly delighted by the prospect of a Turkish Embassy to Cabul. For, when one has something to sell, the more bidders there are the better the chance of high prices. And the Ameer unquestionably has a valuable article in his keeping which both Russia and England would much like to purchase. Time was, and that not so very long ago, when the Indian Government could well afford to treat the friendship of Afghanistan as of no account at all. Even now, our former policy of "masterly inactivity" and rigid non-intervention would be the wisest and best, but for the terrible risk of a Russo-Afghan alliance. Had General Abramoff remained in Turkestan, Sir Neville Chamberlain certainly would not have been called upon to enter the frowning Khyber Pass. It was Russia, not England, that took the initiative of intrigue, but, this being once taken, there was nothing for it but either to follow suit, or to sit by with folded hands while Afghanistan gradually merged into vassalage to Russia. The two great rivals having thus played their first cards, it is not difficult to imagine the sense of satisfaction which the Ameer must feel on finding his society so eagerly courted and his friendship so immensely prized by two of the greatest Powers in the world. So agreeable must the situation be, that we fancy the Ameer will endeavour to prolong it by all possible means. It not only enhances his importance and increases his prestige, but brings to Cabul a copious supply of roubles and dollars—coins which the good people of that bustling city hold in high esteem. We shall not be surprised, therefore, if the negotiations are spun out, on one pretext or another, for some time; and it is quite possible that Shere Ali will not choose between his suitors until the assembling of a substantial force near the Indian frontier warns him to make up his mind. Under this gentle pressure, he will probably offer the right hand of disinterested friendship to England, in return for a handsome subsidy and other trifling compliments.

LESSONS OF THE THAMES COLLISION.——We are glad to observe that the Board of Trade, not usually, according to Mr. Plimsoll's experiences, a very lively department of the Government, have bestirred themselves to the extent of appointing a Committee for the better regulation of river traffic. Of course, in view of the enormous extension of the pleasure traffic on the Thames of recent years, this should have been done long since: better late, however, than never. Public authority is needed to contrive and enforce simple and intelligible rules of the road; to make the means of communication between captain and helmsman more trustworthy than it now is; and to prevent the dangerous overcrowding of boats which now occurs even when the official numbers are not exceeded. Again it is a question—and not an easy question to decide offhand—whether passenger traffic on the river ought to be restricted after dark. Darkness is a relative term, and the river is probably safer on a bright moonlight night than on a thick, murky day. And where is the line to be drawn? If Gravesend boats are not to be allowed on the river after dark, how about Margate, or Yarmouth, or Boulogne, or Edinburgh boats? Such matters, we suspect, had best be left, as now, for owners and passengers to settle as they please. Lastly, supposing, in spite of all precautions, that a collision occurs, and the passenger boat begins to sink, can any preparations be made beforehand to prevent such a wholesale slaughter as took place on Tuesday week? Small boats on board these crowded steamers are practically useless, and life-buoys, as usually carried, are not much better. The only really efficient remedy is to make the whole deck a vast raft, separable from the rest of the vessel as soon as she begins to sink. But this apparatus would need constant testing, or at the instant of emergency it will stick fast to the actual hull below, and will carry its confiding victims down with it. We doubt if the kind of people who go in excursion steamers will be easily induced to wear life-buoy dresses, as a "Flag Officer" very sensibly recommends, and we fear that, until swimming is made by Act of Parliament as compulsory as vaccination, only a minority of the public will learn to swim. Something, no doubt, may be done by the use of hats and umbrellas as improvised life-buoys, but it must be remembered that to do this effectually a certain presence of mind is needed, and such presence of mind is rarely found except in those who have the foresight and the fortitude to contemplate, even in the midst of a pleasure trip, the possibility of a terrible accident.

THE SICKLY SEASON AT CYPRUS.——Unless matters improve greatly under our administration Cyprus will not become such a popular station with English regiments as the never-to-be-sufficiently-regretted Ionian Islands. Special correspondents might possibly err in their estimates, but now we have an official report from the chief medical authority in the island, setting forth a state of affairs which considerably surpasses the worst that has been written. And the unpleasant thing is, that the sudden outburst of sickness has happened at the very beginning of the season which even the gay-hearted Cypriotes look forward to with dread. The climate of Cyprus may be divided under three heads. There is the rainy season, lasting from the end of October to the beginning of May, when the temperature is reasonably low, and life would be pleasant enough but for an excess of moisture. May is a charming month, neither too wet nor too hot, but it is swiftly followed by the fierce summer, consisting of June, July, and August. During these months the heat would be almost unendurable but for being tempered by cool breezes from the sea. It is not until the sickly season sets in at the beginning of September that the European discovers what a veritable Inferno Cyprus can become under favouring circumstances. The sea breeze dies away, and the pestilential vapours drawn out of the rich deep soil by the sun lie upon the island like a funeral pall. This, then, is the climate our troops will have to endure for another six weeks, and it is, indeed, a very bad sign that 25 per cent. of the whole force should be on the sick list at the end of only the first week. Of course every allowance ought to be made for the special exigencies of the present moment. No barracks, unwholesome drinking water, bad drainage, and trying work would, together, produce a good deal of unhealthiness even in a fairly salubrious country. It would be hasty, therefore, to condemn Cyprus as utterly unfit for the residence of Europeans, even if the troops suffer more severely than at present. For some years after our annexation of the Punjaub, Peshawur was frightfully unhealthy, so much so, indeed, that at one time the European soldiers used to be marched to hospital every morning before breakfast, for a dose of quinine all round. Now Peshawur is tolerably healthy, and so, perhaps, Cyprus may become in another year or two. In the mean time it will be wise to make our account with a good deal of sickness during September and October, while we patiently wait for that development of events which Lord Beaconsfield evidently expects will give something of a tangible value to England's latest acquisition. At the present moment it is not very easy to see what we gain by quartering our troops in a miasmatic island, where they could not well be of the least use to give practical effect to the Anglo-Turkish Convention.

GOLD.——The Californian and Australian discoveries, although they immensely increased the annual average gold-yield of the world, did not diminish the value of the precious metal nearly so much as competent judges expected. The rise of prices which has undoubtedly taken place during the last five-and-twenty years is probably in a great degree due to other causes. Food has become proportionately dearer than anything else, not only because there are more mouths to feed, but because the bulk of mankind expect more and better food than they used to get. It is just because the increased supply of gold has acted as such a stimulus to trade and production that its value has remained comparatively stationary. Far more gold than formerly has been required for coinage purposes, while its consumption for all kinds of manufacturing processes has vastly increased. The wear and tear of coins is comparatively slow, but much of the gold used in manufactures is used up at once and for ever. The result is that there is altogether for various reasons a greater demand for gold than at any former period. It is rather significant, just as ladies have taken to wear gilt waist-belts, gold ornaments in their hats, and even gold ornamented gloves, thus stimulating the demand for the precious metal, that the supplies have begun seriously to decline. Year after year Australia sends a diminishing quantity, and it is scarcely likely, after the diligent "prospecting" the country has undergone, that any new alluvial gold-fields of magnitude will be discovered. Most of the gold now produced is extracted from the quartz rock; there is plenty of this auriferous rock in existence, but much of it is too poor to pay for raising from great depths. The Ural Mountains still continue to send a steady supply, but their resources are apparently not great, and it is quite on the cards that before the end of the century gold may become a more precious metal than it has been for many years.

THE AUSTRIAN OCCUPATION OF BOSNIA.——It is impossible to help a certain sense of satisfaction on seeing the difficulties Austria has to surmount before Bosnia and the Herzegovina pass under her sway. The feeling may be rather inconsistent, perhaps, in presence of the fact that England herself has clutched Cyprus out of the disjecta membra of the Ottoman Empire. Nevertheless, there is ample evidence to prove that the news of Austria's recent reverses was by no means unpleasant to many Englishmen. It has become sufficiently plain that the Viennese Government had very little notion of the arduous work which would have to be accomplished before the two provinces were taken over. A grand military promenade accompanied by some desultory skirmishing seems to have been the worst that was expected, and the strength of the occupying army was fixed in proportion. An agreeable dream enough, but a very rough awakening came in the defeat of General Szapary by the insurgents, and this has now been followed by a disastrous repulse of the Austrians at Bihacs. The truth of the matter seems to be that the entire Mahomedan population has flown to arms, and in some instances, as at Bihacs, the Turkish regulars have thrown in their lot with their co-religionists. The authority of the Sultan is set at open defiance all over the country, and, for the time being, the people recognise no other rulers than those who will fight with them against the invader. So powerful and popular a Pasha as Mehemet Ali has just lost his life because he refused to join the insurgents, and this, too, although he was acting directly for the Sultan at the time. In the long run, the superior military resources of Austria are certain to secure the victory, but if the patriots—the insurgents are that, whatever we may think of their wisdom—adopt guerilla tactics, their final subjection will not be accomplished without costing Austria a very heavy price in treasure and life. It is said, indeed, that Novi Bazar is to be left for another campaign, as the insurrection has assumed such magnitude as to necessitate the employment of scientific warfare. This may seem somewhat curious to those who think that an army of 200,000 disciplined soldiers ought to at once overrun a territory chiefly defended by hastily raised levies of untrained peasants. But the difficult nature of the country is immensely in favour of the defence, while the insurgents also have the advantage of carrying on their operations among a very friendly population. One fact stands out clearly from this deplorable slaughter. Even had England joined Russia in forcing objectionable terms on the Porte, it seems almost certain that the Sultan would have been compelled to refuse obedience, for fear of the resentment of his subjects.

IDENTIFICATION.——It is strange that so many of the persons drowned by the sinking of the Princess Alice should remain unidentified. As, in such cases, decomposition sets in with unusual rapidity, the authorities have been compelled to issue orders for the burial of most of the unclaimed bodies, and, therefore, if any identification is made hereafter, it must be by the clothes and trinkets which have been preserved, or by the photographs which have been taken since death. In some instances, recognition has already been made by this means. It is easy to understand the non-identification of poor forlorn desperate creatures who commit suicide, or of destitute, homeless outcasts who are found dead of cold and want by the wayside, but here the circumstances are altogether different. The passengers by the Princess Alice were holiday excursionists, for the most part prosperous, well-to-do tradespeople and artisans with their wives and children, just the sort of people who have an abundance of relatives, friends, and acquaintances. It is possible that in some cases the would-be identifiers have been misled by the colour of clothing having been changed by submersion in water charged with chemical impurities; but this can after all only have happened in a few instances. Moreover the strangeness of the matter is enhanced by the enormous publicity which has been given to the disaster. By this time there can scarcely be a person in England who has not heard of this frightful calamity. This remark applies still more forcibly to London, to which place the bulk of the excursionists belonged. Yet we are confronted with the puzzle that the friends of a large number of respectable people who left their homes in the morning and met with a violent death by the evening are either unable or unwilling to identify their remains. Of course, if it should prove that the bulk of those unidentified are provincials, the difficulty would in some measure be accounted for, as their friends might not know, and now will never know, what were their intended plans of amusement on any particular day during their stay in London.

The German Parliament.——The Imperial speech at the opening of the German Parliament shows that Prince Bismarck is determined either to crush Socialism, or to be crushed himself in the attempt. There is something in the tone of the speech which irresistibly reminds one of an elephant set to work at picking up pins, or a Nasmyth's steam hammer employed in cracking walnuts. After all, German Socialism has not made such very gigantic strides of late as to require the desperate remedies proposed by the Chancellor. True, there have been a couple of vile attempts to assassinate the Emperor, but so long as we have monarchs in the world, there will always be a certain number of frenzied fools to seek distinction by experiments in regicide. Even happy and placid England can produce these miscreants on occasion, and we fear that, while human nature remains what it is, emperors and kings must make up their minds to suffer the same treatment as Irish landlords. The serious question is, whether such severely repressive measures as those indicated in the Imperial speech will have the effect of extirpating this wretched breed of political murderers. We have not found it so in this country, nor does there seem much likelihood of the experiment succeeding any better in Germany. If Prince Bismarck would look beneath the surface with impartial eyes, he might possibly get a glimpse into the origin of that popular discontent which is beginning to show itself among the German people in crude imaginings of a Socialistic Utopia. The broad lines of demarcation between classes, the monopoly of power by the few, the wide-reaching privileges of the aristocracy, and the terrible pressure of the military system on the working-classes, are quite sufficient reasons for dangerous dissatisfaction. Unfortunately the great Chancellor loves these very things, and, although he occasionally poses as a Liberal, he is little likely to lead an attack on established and cherished institutions. But, foreseeing the probability of a democratic upheaval at no late date, he is bent on strengthening the position of the Crown while yet there is time. With this end in view, he makes use of the recent attempts to assassinate a most popular Sovereign to obtain from the Parliament powers which could hereafter be employed to repress the rising Liberalism of Germany. We doubt whether he will succeed in this new effort any better than on former occasions, but even if again defeated, he will be certain to stick to his pet scheme as tenaciously as ever, and the odds are that he will win in the long run should his life be spared.

London Fogs.——This is not such an unseasonable subject as it may appear at first sight, for fogs have begun very early this autumn. On Thursday week we had a yellow fog which lasted till midday, and on Wednesday last, between nine and ten, travellers from the suburbs suddenly exchanged brilliant sunshine for a black fog worthy of Christmas. The September sun, however, was too potent for the enemy, and presently dispersed him. We are inclined to think, judging from a somewhat lengthened experience, that the London fogs begin earlier and last later than they used to. This is not to be wondered at when we remember that the centre of London is far further from the green fields than it was (say) forty years ago, and that every additional chimney is a provocative of yellow fog. Some little time ago, Mr. Gladstone, who takes note of everything, observed that the part of London in which he lived was less smoky than it used to be, and he gave as an instance of this that fewer "blacks" came in at the windows. We believe that Mr. Gladstone was right in saying this, but his observation does not really clash with our own. The diminution of "blacks" is no doubt due to the stricter enforcement of the Smoke Prevention Act, so that there are no longer, especially at the West End, bakers' and other manufacturing chimneys vomiting dense clouds of smoke; but at the same time it is probable that the general atmosphere of London is more thoroughly smoke-impregnated than it was in 1838, because there have since that date been built thousands of domestic chimneys whose smoking privileges are unrestrained by law. Good, however, may come out of evil. It is said that it is only since we took to making the air of England generally so dirty with coal smoke that we became such a "tubbing" and soap-using nation.

Bow Street Police Court.——It is a pity that our great London landlords, who owe their wealth far less to their own merits than to the industry and enterprise of others, should so often figure in the character of obstructives to public improvements. The Duke of Buccleuch delayed the progress of the Thames Embankment; the Marquis of Salisbury has hitherto successfully delayed the making of the much-needed thoroughfare from Charing Cross to Oxford Street; and now we note that the magistrates and the public will be compelled to use the small and inconvenient old Police Court in Bow Street for many months longer, because the Duke of Bedford, the adjoining ground landlord, has obtained an injunction against the authorities on account of the boundaries encroaching on his land. Of course, a Duke is as much entitled to his legal rights as a cottager; at the same time a man may be within his legal rights, and yet show a grasping, litigious disposition, and we cannot help thinking that if these exalted personages took more of their business into their own hands, and trusted less implicitly to subordinate agents, whose zeal is apt to outrun their discretion, there would be less of the obstructiveness of which we complain. Personally, the Duke of Bedford is spoken of as a good and popular landlord; and he would do well to avoid these petty disputes which tend to the public inconvenience, especially with such a field of enterprise open to him as the improvement of Covent Garden Market.

"WIDOWED AND FATHERLESS"

Most of our readers on seeing this picture will feel a thrill of sympathy, remembering how many households in this vast city of ours have been rendered desolate by the disaster of last week. There has not, we think, occurred within living memory an accident which has spread such a universal gloom over London, for the victims were so numerous, that nearly every one had some knowledge, more or less intimate, of some of those who perished on that fatal Tuesday evening. Turning to our picture, we have the representation of an incident equally pathetic, though on a far smaller scale, and of a more familiar type. But the agony of the fisherman's widow bereaved of her husband is equally great, whether he alone was drowned, or whether the sea claimed other victims also. And her grief is intensified by the ignorant happiness of her children. The baby is placid, his elder sister romps with the dog. The picture, as we said above, represents a familiar type of bereavement by sudden death. As Kingsley says, "Men must work and women must weep," and here it is the husband who perishes, and the wife and children who remain. Contrariwise, in the case of the Princess Alice, the unprecedented number of women and children who were lost as compared with men intensifies the pitifulness of that sad tragedy. Mr. Wilson's picture was exhibited last season at the Gallery of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

THE DISASTER ON THE THAMES

During the whole week the daily papers have been full of the most harrowing details of the terrible catastrophe which happened on the river on the 3rd inst. The sad story may be briefly told. About eight o'clock in the evening, [illegible] as daylight was fading away, the Princess Alice, a [illegible] steamer licensed to carry 936 persons, was returning to London with a freight, the exact number of which has [illegible] ascertained, but which is supposed to have [illegible] persons, when the Bywell Castle, a large screw collier, bore down upon her, and her iron prow striking on the [illegible] the little platform in front of the [illegible] forced its way through the [illegible] vessel, and literally cut her in half. The Princess [illegible] sank almost instantly, plunging so violently that those on deck were thrown into the water, as a witness graphically reports, "like coals down a screen." It is impossible to describe the terror and confusion of the ensuing few moments, but it is some consolation to know that there is no truth in the statement that the Bywell Castle went on her way without rendering assistance

She stood by, and did all that it was possible by lowering boats and throwing ropes to save life, as, indeed, did all who were near enough to the spot to be of any service. Boats put out from either shore to pick up the drowning, and many instances of heroic self-sacrifice on the part of those on board are recorded, but in spite of every effort only about 150 persons were saved. Since then the depressing labour of searching for the dead has gone on continually day by day, and even yet is not completed. As the bodies were recovered they were taken ashore, most of them to the Dockyard at Woolwich, and laid out for identification, although in the majority of cases recognition was only possible by the clothing and trinkets found upon them, the faces of the dead being blackened by suffocation, and fearfully distorted by the action of the water. Up to Wednesday last the number of bodies recovered was 623, of which no fewer than 114 have been placed in nameless graves, and although their clothes have been preserved and carefully marked with numbers corresponding to the graves, the probability is that most of them will remain for ever unknown. The calamity has spread a gloom of mourning over the whole of London, there being scarcely any district of the metropolis which has not contributed its quota of victims. In some streets in the South and East of London whole families have disappeared, and almost every person one meets has a tale of woe to relate concerning a relative, friend, or acquaintance. The work of recovering the dead was commenced by policemen and soldiers, but on Monday the latter were for some reason withdrawn, and some dockyard labourers were engaged, who however struck soon after they began, demanding a supply of beer. This led to a renewed application to the military authorities at Woolwich, and soldiers were again employed. An inquest has been opened at Woolwich, and continued from day to day, the bereaved relatives appearing one after another to give formal evidence of the identity of the bodies which had been recognised. On Tuesday a young man while on the way to Woolwich on board a steamer, to identify the body of a relative, fell into the engine room of the boat, and was crushed to death by the machinery. Shocking as are all these circumstances, it is still more grievous to reflect upon the condition of those who have been so suddenly bereaved. Some there are whose intellects have given way under the dreadful shock, and all must suffer most acutely. It is not surprising that the sympathy of the whole nation has been awakened, and offers of assistance are flowing in from all sides. Her Majesty the Queen has sent a characteristic message of sympathy and a handsome donation to the Relief Fund which has been started at the Mansion House, and the like has been done by the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal Family. Other munificent contributions have been sent from various sources, and on Wednesday the Fund amounted to no less than 8,500*l.* Many of the children who have lost their parents will be at once admitted into various Orphanages, and several benevolent persons have offered to adopt individual orphans. The two portions of the wreck have been raised by means similar to those first adopted in the case of the Eurydice; and the engines, which were entirely knocked out of the hull, have also been recovered. The position of the levers show that the engineer was in the act of reversing when the vessel was struck, one of them being already shifted, and the other at "go-ahead." Contrary to all expectation, very few bodies were found in the vessel itself. The wreck now lies upon the beach on the southern bank of the river in such a shattered condition that she is fit for nothing but breaking up. In addition to the inquests at Woolwich, Poplar, and other places, there is to be a Board of Trade inquiry into the circumstances attending the accident, pending which it would ill become us to offer any remarks as to the probable cause of the disaster. The captain of the Princess Alice is amongst those who lost their lives, but the first officer, Mr. Long, says that the Bywell Castle was seen when 150 yards away, and that loud shouts were raised, and the steam whistle sounded, to warn her off. On the other hand, the captain of the collier attributes the whole blame to the Princess Alice starboarding her helm when she ought to have continued on the port helm. The navigation of the river appears to have been for some years conducted upon a kind of happy-go-lucky system, each pilot doing what seemed right in his own eyes, and accommodating the movements of his vessel to the exigencies of the tide, and the circumstances of the moment. It is now thought that some reform should be instituted, and Lord Sandon proposes to appoint a Committee consisting of one member from the Thames Conservancy Board, one from the Trinity House, one from the Admiralty, one from the Steamship Owners' Association of London, and three from the Board of Trade, to consider the whole subject of the rule of the road, lights, signals, speed, number of passengers carried, appliances for saving life, and the hours during which passengers should be carried by river steamers. It is said that the London Steamboat Company have laid a claim in the Admiralty Court against the owners of the Bywell Castle for 20,000*l.* as compensation for the loss of the Princess Alice.

On Sunday many thousand persons visited the scene of the disaster, and carried away small pieces of the wreck as mementoes. We are ashamed to add that some of them, altogether unimpressed by the sadness and solemnity of the event, behaved in such a disorderly way as to necessitate the interference of the police. We sincerely hope that the report that jewellery and other valuables were stolen from some of the dead bodies, will turn out to be unfounded. It is quite possible that the missing articles may have been lost in the river, or that some mistake may have been made as to the registration dockets attached to them.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE IN GERMANY

THERE has been great rejoicing in Holland over the marriage of Prince Henry of the Netherlands, the King's brother, as, since the death of the Queen, there has been no Royal lady leader of society, neither of the King's sons being married, and Prince Henry being a widower, his first wife, the daughter of the late Duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, having died in 1872. Prince Henry is now in his fifty-ninth year, and is reported to be one of the richest princes in Europe. He holds various commands in the Dutch service, being a Lieutenant Admiral of the Fleet and a Royal Lieutenant in the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg. He is exceedingly popular in all classes of Dutch society, and a most enthusiastic welcome was accorded to the newly married pair on their arrival at the Hague from Germany. His bride, the Princess Marie of Prussia, is the eldest daughter of Prince Frederick Charles, and is the sister of the Princess Louise Margaret, the future wife of the Duke of Connaught. She is only in her twenty-third year, and is said to possess intellectual faculties of no mean order, being well versed in scientific subjects, and exceedingly fond of music and painting. The marriage was celebrated on Saturday, the 24th ult., at Potsdam, the civil service taking place in the afternoon, and the religious ceremony in the evening, the King of Holland and various other Royal guests being present, including the Duke of Connaught. The public entry into the Hague took place on the 31st ult., great enthusiasm being displayed by the inhabitants.

TOWING THE "EURYDICE" INTO PORTSMOUTH

AFTER much labour and many discouraging failures the efforts to recover the wreck of the Eurydice have been at last crowned with success, and the dilapidated hulk now lies safely in Portsmouth Harbour, awaiting the decision of the authorities as to whether she is to be renovated or broken up. The final attempt to lift the wreck was made on Sunday, the 1st inst., under the personal superintendence of Rear-Admiral Foley, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Froyne. Pumping was commenced at nine A.M., and by ten o'clock the Eurydice was afloat, drawing only two feet more water than her proper draught. She was then taken in tow by the Grinder tug, and hauled out of the hole in which she lay; the tugs Sampson, Manly, and Malta were brought alongside, and their pumps going the whole time, in order to keep under the water in the Eurydice, the whole flotilla was towed towards Portsmouth, which was reached about one o'clock, her unexpected arrival being witnessed by numerous spectators, the crowds of promenaders being supplemented by the congregations from the various churches and chapels. As the Eurydice passed into the harbour, the ensign, which went down with her when she foundered, floated from a temporary colour staff on her bridge, the decks of the various vessels by which she passed were lined with officers and men eager to catch a glimpse of her. Amongst the spectators on board the flagship Duke of Wellington were Cuddleford and Fletcher, the sole survivors of the unfortunate crew. The Eurydice was safely berthed alongside the Laurel hulk in that part of the harbour known as Porchester Lake, and was left there with a pumping engine on board a tug alongside in order to keep her afloat. The hulk, which is completely bare of paint, and scratched and splintered in all directions, is further disfigured by numerous planks roughly nailed to the sides to stop the leakage. The Queen has sent a special message to Admiral Fanshawe, Rear-Admiral Foley, and the officers and men under their command, expressing Her Majesty's satisfaction at the successful termination of their exertions.

"AMONGST ALIENS"

SOME MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND

THE history of the Royal Agricultural Society of England is one of a distinguished character. It may be said its history is the history of agricultural improvement on the south side of the Tweed. The Society cannot boast of a long pedigree. In comparison with the Bath and West of England Society, and the Highland and Agricultural of Scotland, the R.A.S.E. is only as yet in its pupilage. But in its forty years of labour no agriculturist can honestly deny that it has done work better than the other two have accomplished, considering the fair amount of cash in store to the Bath and West of England's credit, and the unconscionably large sum the Highland and Agricultural Society has in its coffers. The Royal Agricultural Society of England has been what we may personify "as a man of war from its youth up" a Goliath in a peaceful field a warrior against weeds and prejudices; a champion, like David, against all customs and practices in the cultivation of the soil that checked the way of Nature, and a kind assistant to that Mother who is so fruitful when she is kindly treated, who, tickled with a hoe, laughs into harvest.

There is no need here to enter minutely into the history of the English Society. Its Councils have been presided over by the best and most discerning men of the last half century,—men who had the interests of agriculture thoroughly at heart—recognising well that agriculture after all is "the stepping-stone to higher things" in the prosperity of this country. There was not one among all the many who have been the chief directors of affairs, with the sanction of the Council, of course, who took more interest in the Society's well-being and its practical working for the good of tenants, than the late Prince Consort. He not only was excellent in precept but good in practice; and many of the fine-bred pigs that we see at breeding and fat stock shows, date their quality and their symmetry from the sires and dams of those Prince Albert selected with almost Darwinian care. The Queen, after her loved husband's death, kept up an interest in stock, and instilled, no doubt, a like admiration into the mind of the Prince of Wales, who was President of the Society before he went to India, and will again be Chief, with the approbation of all breeders, at the Show in London next year. The Queen and Prince of Wales are always exhibitors at the principal exhibitions, and put up with their luck—not always good, with a little more complacency than those of "commoner sort," when they are vanquished.

Among the other Presidents whose names are worthy of special mention, are Mr. Pusey, whose writings and speeches did much to stir life in "the valley of dry bones," as it may be called in his time, of agricultural somnolency; of Mr. Holland, who was the founder of the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester, one of the best institutions of its kind, indeed the only one in Great Britain; Earl Spencer, the Duke of Richmond, Earl Cathcart, Lord Vernon, and others.

The R.A.S.E. started with an excellent programme, which may be briefly summarised thus:—that it desired to prove by practical experience all information in books useful to the cultivator of the soil, and offered to recoup any occupier of the land, who having been requested by the Society to undertake an experiment, suffered pecuniary loss thereby. Then it purposed what may be considered one of the best features in the original schedule "to encourage men of science in their attention to the improvements of agricultural implements, the construction of farm buildings and cottages, the application of chemistry to the general purposes of agriculture, the destruction of insects injurious to vegetable life, and the eradication of weeds." The Society also resolved to promote the discovery of new varieties of grain and of useful vegetables, to obtain the best information about forests, plantations, and fences, and by liberal prizes to encourage at shows careful and skilful management of stock. The labourers were not neglected; prizes were offered to them to induce them to improve the management of their cottages and gardens.

The Society may be congratulated on well having carried out its programme. Trifling complaints may be made now and again by individuals who have considered themselves, without just cause, at times not very well treated, but, taking it all in all, the Society has done admirably good work, and was never better managed than it is now under the present Secretary, for in the hands of a secretary lies the making or marring of any institution.

"Speak well of the dead." Lift your hat reverently, and allow him to pass first. He was entitled to the precedence when he was alive. THOMAS CHRISTOPHER BOOTH, who was one the best known agriculturists of the day, the most eminent horn breeder of his time, has gone to his everlasting r his faithful presentment was engraved for The Graphic. reference to him we cannot do better than quote from the Agricultural Gazette of Monday:—

"'On Saturday last, the 7th inst., at Warlaby, near Northallerton, Mr. Thomas C. Booth, aged forty-five years.' Such is the abrupt announcement which reaches us just as we are about to go to press. It will be received with great sorrow, and with an astonishment amounting to a shock. A stronger, healthier man than Mr. Booth appeared to be one scarcely could imagine. Cut off in the very prime of life, and in the midst of a thousand useful activities, his death will produce a wider impression of personal loss, and excite a deeper feeling of sorrow and even of compassion than that of almost any other noteworthy agriculturist whom we could name. His career, a great personal success had been fruitful of widespread benefit. All over the world the fruits of his enterprise, intelligence, and skill have been experienced by agriculturists. In Ireland especially the Warlaby influence has long been beneficially felt. In Mr. Booth's hands the traditional reputation of the family and the herd had grown and culminated, and his sudden death is an agricultural calamity."

COLONEL KINGSCOTE, who was President of the Royal Society last year, is also, like the late Mr. Booth, a breeder of great celebrity in the shorthorn world. His shorthorns are of the most fashionable character, and he has realised as much as 2,000 guineas for one. Colonel Kingscote, long before he was appointed President, was an active Member of Council of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, and a willing worker on local Farmer's Clubs in Gloucestershire. Colonel Kingscote was aide-de-camp to the late Lord Raglan in the Crimea; he acted as Groom-in-Waiting to the Queen from 1859 to 1866, was appointed extra equerry to the Prince of Wales in 1863, and still holds the charge of His Royal Highness's stable. He is an excellent landlord and much liked by the tenantry in Gloucestershire among whom he resides.

Under no Secretary has the Royal Agricultural Society of England flourished more than under the direction of Mr. H. M. JENKINS, F.G.S. Besides being Secretary, Mr. Jenkins is also editor of The Journal of the Society, which has derived new life from his presence at the head. The last number just issued is proof of his care and skill in the selection of writers and subjects to write upon. His own contributions to the Journal, especially upon farming abroad, have been widely read and greatly admired in all parts of the country for the last ten years. Mr. Jenkins discharges the onerous duties of his office to the satisfaction of all members of the Society.

MR. JACOB WILSON is one of the most active workers for the promotion of agriculture at this day. He was bred to the profession, and he has ever had a wonderful love for it. In forwarding the ends of farmers and implement manufacturers he is never daunted by difficulties. Nothing apparently can overtask his labour at shows, of which now, since the resignation of Mr. Brandreth Gibbs, he is the most prominent member of the Council in the arrangements of the show field. Mr. Wilson had a thoroughly good agricultural education, practically on his father's farm, and scientifically at the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester. He was among the first to invest in reaping machines in his county; and from his farm at Woodhorn, near Morpeth, the little stone was thrown that broadened the enlightening circles in corn-cutting, north and south. Mr. Wilson gained the Highland and Agricultural Society's prize for the best essay on reaping machines. He was purchaser of the second pair of ten-horse power engines, manufactured by Messrs. Fowler and Co., of Leeds, and Judge of Steam Cultivation at the Royal Worcester. Mr. Wilson at this show won the first prize in the Aged Class of Shorthorns for his Duke of Tyne, which was sold into Scotland to produce animals of rare quality that got prize stock at many shows. An agricultural contemporary, speaking of him recently, said he has taken "a leading and laborious part in the protest lodged, which, through the Society, was urged upon the Government against the importation of live stock. To him and his friend Mr. T. C. Booth (now, alas! no more), more, perhaps, than to any other members of the Society, it is due that the case of the English farmer and the English meat consumer has been so fully represented in Parliament."

MR. WILLIAM WELLS, Holmewood, Peterborough, Northamptonshire, was Vice-President when the Royal Show was held at Leeds in 1861, one of the most successful ever held in the history of the Society, and ever since has manifested great interest in its affairs. Mr. Wells is Chairman of the Chemical Committee.

MR. W. FRANKISH, Limber Magna, Ulceby, Lincolnshire, has long taken an active interest in the affairs of the Society, and was elected Member of Council in 1875.

MR. JOSEPH SHUTTLEWORTH, Hartsholme Hall, Lincolnshire, was elected to the Council in 1856. A member of the great agricultural implement making firm of Clayton and Shuttleworth, he has done much in the Council meetings to promote agricultural improvements in all its departments—educational, practical, profitable.

MR. G. H. SANDAY, Wensley House, Bedale, Yorkshire, was appointed to the Council in 1874, since which time he has been very earnest in his endeavours to promote the prosperity of the Society. He belongs to a family whose sheep have been remarkably successful in many show-yards. He frequently acts as a judge.

MR. C. RANDELL, Chadbury, Evesham, Worcestershire, was elected to the Council in 1861, and is great in monetary matters, and active in all affairs of the Society. He is now Chairman of the Committee on Finance.

MR. WHITEHEAD, Barming House, Maidstone, was elected to the Council in 1870. He is chairman of the Botanical Department—a post he is well fitted to fill.

MR. RICHARD STRATTON, The Duffryn, Newport, Monmouthshire, has been a member of the Council since 1875. He is well known as a famous shorthorn breeder and prize-taker.

Lieutenant-Colonel PICTON TURBERVILL, Ewenny Priory, Bridgend, South Wales, was elected Member of Council in 1874. He was an active steward of live stock at Bristol, and takes great interest in the Society's affairs generally.

THOMAS DYKE, Long Ashton Lodge, Clifton, has taken so much interest in agricultural machinery that he was appointed to act as one of the Stewards of Field Implements at the joint meeting of the Bath and West of England Society at Oxford.

THE FÊTES AT BOULOGNE

BOULOGNE has been holding high festival this week in honour of the laying of the first stone of her new deep sea harbour by MM. Freycinet and Léon Say, the Ministers of Public Works and Finance. The town was gaily decorated on Sunday, the first day of the fêtes, and the morning was ushered in by the ringing of the Beffroi bells, and the arrival of large numbers of excursionists from London, Paris, and numerous provincial towns. The streets were gay with flags, flowers, and lanterns, and triumphal arches were erected in various parts of the town, one of the most characteristic of them being in front of the Hotel Christol. This arch, which is represented in one of our illustrations (No. 3), was emblematic of the fishing trade of Boulogne, the side arches being formed of herring casks and draped with fishing nets and tackle. On one side of the top were the words "Patrie," "Soyez les Bienvenus," "Honneur," and on the other "Paix," "Hommages aux Ministres." Music formed a great feature in the day's programme, which indeed began with the arrival of bands from the neighbouring towns who had promised their assistance, and one of our sketches depicts the visitors drinking the Wine of Honour before the Hotel de Ville, while throughout the day there were continual concerts on the Place Godefroi de Bouillon, in the Tintelleries Gardens, and the Établissement des Bains. There was also a regatta on the River Liane, a fête champêtre, a ball, and a display of fireworks. On Monday, however, the serious work began with the arrival of MM. Léon Say and Freycinet, and at two o'clock the ceremony of laying the foundation of a new harbour was performed by M. Freycinet, amid a crowd of spectators, amongst whom were various provincial Mayors, several Belgian burgomasters, Alderman Staples, who represented the Lord Mayor, and Sir Edward Watkin, the Chairman of the South-Eastern Railway. A trip was then taken round the sea-space intended to be enclosed as a harbour, and which had been marked out with vessels and buoys, and in the evening there was a grand banquet at the Casino, which was presided over by M. Huguet, the Mayor of Boulogne, who, while proposing the healths of MM. Say and Freycinet, took the opportunity of thanking the English visitors for attending the fêtes, and declared that "the great works at Boulogne and Calais will continue to be bonds of union between the two great nations." M. Freycinet replied in an appropriate speech, and ended with proposing the health of Marshal MacMahon and Queen Victoria; and M. Léon Say followed, dealing with the subject from a financial point of view, stating that France would only devote to these works the sum which has been expended for the past twenty years with the same object, and concluding with drinking the health of the English Visitors, with which he coupled the name of Alderman Staples, who returned thanks in a few courteous words. In addition to the banquet, there were other festivities in the town, in which both English and French residents enthusiastically participated.

TROOPS FROM KING WILLIAMSTOWN ON THEIR WAY TO NATAL

"As the troops have been withdrawn from the Transkei district, they have returned to King Williamstown, and in view of the state of affairs in Natal it has been thought advisable to send the 2nd Battalion 24th Regiment, viâ East London, on there. The battalion (minus three companies which started on the 23rd), therefore on the 25th marched from Haynes' Mill four miles to King Williamstown, arriving at the railway station at about twelve, where they had a rest, and fatigue parties loaded up the baggage. The men all looked hardy and well, fit for work, a very necessary condition, too, where the climate is so extreme. My sketch is taken of them as they came through the barracks; on the right is a Caffre woman enjoying the band, and a soldier brushing her with a horse fly whisk."

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Mr. Gladstone, in declining with great regret an invitation to attend a dinner of the Liberal party in Newcastle-under-Lyme, congratulates the Liberals of that borough on their recent victory, the value of which he considers is enhanced "both by the time and the manner." He adds that "all the circumstances tend to show what public benefit may arise from allowing the mass of the party to be heard, and in this way strongly to recommend that representative organisation which the Tories and the weak-hearted Liberals are now endeavouring to cry down, availing themselves of the unhappy operations of a local rule at Bradford, which forms (as far as I know) no portion of the general plan."—Colonel Stanley was the chief speaker at the Sheffield Cutlers' Feast last week, but there was nothing very novel in his address. He denied that the Government had any sympathy with Turkish atrocities, congratulated the country on the efficiency of the army and navy, and in answer to Mr. Gladstone's recent statement that the Government had inserted a vainglorious clause in the Queen's Speech as to help from the colonies, said that when the condition of foreign affairs was gloomy, offers of assistance flowed in by hundreds from almost all our leading dependencies. Mr. Roebuck also spoke, declaring that England had ever been his guide, his chart, and his compass, and that he had bowed his neck to no yoke but that of duty.—Mr. Plimsoll has announced his intention of resigning his seat. His reasons are that he thinks that his special Parliamentary work has been completed, and that he would like to travel. His constituents, however, do not want to part with him, and have prevailed on him to reconsider his intention. Speaking at Derby the other day, he condemned the action of the Government as likely to lead us into a war from which no benefit to anyone could accrue. The Treaty of Berlin he regards as a temporary and unsatisfactory solution of the Eastern Question, and he believes that Cyprus was only acquired because our Plenipotentiaries were ashamed to come home empty-handed. It had already served its purpose, and the Ministry would now be glad to be rid of it. At another meeting he said that very portentous claims had been put forward in the name of the prerogative of the Crown, which every true man was bound to resist so far as his power went.—Lord Hartington made a speech at an agricultural dinner in Radnorshire last week, but avoided all reference to general politics, declaring that he could not emulate the heroic exertions of Mr. Cross, Col. Stanley, and other members of the Government, in so soon commencing the political campaign.—Mr. Gladstone, in reply to a long letter from the editor of London, says that he has already gone beyond what his position justified in indicating an alternative policy on the Eastern Question, and even at the present juncture there are propositions which he could urge, but he cannot tell whether they would form an alternative policy, as he has no means of learning what the Government are doing from hour to hour.—In a letter to another correspondent the ex-Premier, referring to Mr. Hanbury's recent speech at Longton, says:—"I have no right to require of Mr. Hanbury that he should only say of my writings what I think to be rational."—Mr. Grant Duff, M.P., speaking to his constituents at Peterhead last week, condemned the foreign policy of the Government, and said that if recent follies were not to end in disaster, if the six millions that had been, or were in process of being fooled away, were not to grow into sixty times six millions, they must ere long have a steady, cool-headed Government.—The Liberal candidate for the vacancy at Truro is Mr. E. Bridges-Williams, who formerly represented the borough. In his address he declares that his political opinions are unchanged, but that he is not prepared to condemn the whole foreign policy of the Government, although he looks with great apprehension and alarm at the continued increase in the national expenditure. Col. Tremayne is to be the Conservative candidate.—Mr. Bright has dealt a heavy blow at Sir Wilfrid Lawson's pet project, the Permissive Bill. Writing to a correspondent at York, he says, "It is not a good Bill, and men anxious for something to be done are forced to vote against it, while almost all who vote for it condemn it in private conversation. It blocks the way, and the most eager foes of the drink curse, by their pertinacity in supporting a bad Bill, are thus a great difficulty in the way of any considerable and effective remedy being applied."

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Some account of the loss of the Princess Alice, and of the subsequent events at the scene of the disaster, will be found in "Our Illustrations" columns. We know not if there be any truth in the theory that such accidents partake of an epidemic character, or whether the fact is to be accounted for by the closer attention which is naturally paid to events having any similarity to a great catastrophe whilst the event is fresh in the public mind; but an unusual number of marine accidents have certainly been reported during the last few days. First in order of date we have the excursion steamer Prince Leopold breaking her rudder-chains off the Isle of Wight, and having to land her passengers and lie by on the rocks until the tide rose and floated her off. This happened on Wednesday, last week, and next day, the screw-steamer Demerara was completely wrecked on the Isle of Man. On Saturday, the Ariel, a Woolwich steamboat, collided with a barge, and was so badly damaged that she could not make the return journey. There was naturally great excitement on board, and six men jumped from the steamer into the barge, two of them sustaining severe injuries in consequence. Since then two other collisions, in each of which a steamer and a barge were concerned, have occurred almost on the precise spot where the Princess Alice foundered. Happily, in none of these instances was there any loss of life.—Two very serious railway accidents, one of them fatal, happened in Ireland on Sunday night. On the Dublin and Bray line a mineral train came into collision with one loaded with ballast, several of the trucks were smashed, and the driver, stoker, and guard were "severely shaken." On the Cork and Macroom Railway a passenger train, while going at full speed left the rails, and toppled over. Four persons were killed, and thirty others severely injured.—As a climax to this series of calamities comes the news of a colliery explosion, which is said to be the worst which has ever happened in South Wales. It occurred on Wednesday in the Abercarne Old Pit, and out of 370 men who were at work below only 82 escaped or were rescued. All hope of any remaining alive in the workings was precluded by the outbreak of fire almost immediately after the explosion.—The Leeds and Wetherby branch of the Great Eastern railway was on Monday blocked by a landslip near Thorne station, four or five thousand tons of earth having been precipitated into the cutting, just after a passenger train had gone by. The line is buried for a distance of nearly forty yards, and it is thought that it cannot be cleared in less than a week.—Major A. Ford, R.A., one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Explosives, has just issued his report on the accident near Holywell in April last, when one man was killed, and eleven others injured by the fumes of gun-cotton exploded by them in constructing a railway tunnel. He says that although it is quite true that there is little or no smoke from the explosion of gun-cotton, an invisible noxious gas, carbonic oxide, is evolved therefrom; and as this gas does not extinguish a light, as carbonic acid does, it would very probably not be perceived in time to prevent the fatal results which it produces. He adds that the Patent Safety Gun Cotton Company appear to him to have exposed themselves to severe censure, and to have incurred grave moral, if not legal, responsibility by issuing a pamphlet containing an incorrect and misleading statement as to the effects of the fumes.—The Falkland memorial, on Wash Common, the scene of the first battle of Newbury, was unveiled on Monday by Lord Carnarvon, in the presence of a large gathering. There was a procession of Freemasons and members of Benefit Societies, the Corporation, the Yeomanry, Rifle Volunteers, and school children. After the unveiling of the statue, Lord Carnarvon spoke on the subject of Lord Falkland's patriotism and exemplary personal character, and he made another speech on the same topic at the luncheon which followed the ceremony.—Last Saturday being Hospital Saturday for the Metropolis, about 250 collectors took up positions at various points in the streets and in the parks. The collections amounted to over 1,000*l.*—Cleopatra's Needle was to be placed on its pedestal on Thursday afternoon, without any special ceremony.—An expert swimmer of Bath has just lost his life by a most foolish wager, to leap from a bridge about forty feet high into the river Avon. He was noted for his recklessness in jumping into the river at flood times. He was the worse for liquor when he essayed the feat, and went into the water very awkwardly. The blow was such that he was unable to swim, and was drowned in the presence of several persons.—The poll of ratepayers at Manchester on the subject of the proposed Thirlmere Water Supply has resulted in 43,362 votes in favour of the scheme against 3,530.

VESUVIUS is threatening a fresh eruption. The lava is in full activity, filling up the crater opened in 1872, and, according to reports from the Observatory, will speedily break forth in the direction of that building.

The west ice has never before approached so near the Greenland coast nor been seen in such quantities, while Melville Bay is so closed that no vessel can pass through, and the Dundee whale fishery promises to be a complete failure, not a single fish having been caught up to July 18. Owing to this expected failure oil has risen [illegible] a ton [illegible]

THE "ALERT" is to be absent five years on her surveying expedition in the South Pacific under Sir George Nares. She is to study the neighbourhood of the Friendly, Society, [illegible], and other island groups, to survey the new channel opened up through the Straits of Magellan, and to particularly examine the channel from New Zealand to Cape Town used by vessels on the homeward voyage, marking the various rocks, shoals, reefs, and islets on special sheets.

LONDON MORTALITY still further decreased last week, and 1,200 deaths were registered against 1,305 during the previous seven days, being a decline of 105, and 160 below the average. There were 54 deaths from whooping cough (a decline of 5, but exceeding the average by 18), [illegible] from scarlet fever, 10 from diphtheria (a decline of 2), 124 from diarrhœa (a decline of 30, being 55 below the average), 4 from small pox, a decrease of 6, and a lower number registered during any week since August, 1876. There were 2,410 births registered against 2,424 during the previous week, exceeding the average by [illegible]. The mean temperature was 61·2 deg., or 2·3 deg. above the average. The duration of registered sunshine was 31·2 hours, the sun being 93·1 hours above the horizon.

GOLD MINING IN CALIFORNIA is fast eating the agricultural interests of the State. The hydraulic method of extracting the gold forces a quantity of barren sand down the chief streams, which chokes up the river beds, diverts the currents, and is spread by the freshets over the alluvial valleys in such deep layers as to destroy tillage and cover the fruitful land with barrenness. The Sacramento River is being transformed into a mere ditch, according to the local journals, while the landowners on Bear River, a tributary of the Sacramento, have formed a Protective Society to prosecute mining companies for damages. Bear River in 1857 was a clear stream; since then the bed has risen ten to fourteen feet, causing the river to overflow and form a new channel, and the water is too muddy to use even for irrigation.

LONDON HAS NOT IMPROVED OF LATE YEARS, according to the impressions of an Italian Radical Deputy, Signor Petruccelli della Gattina, reported in the Daily News. The sober Britons have adopted a miserable French ideal, Parisian frivolity has overpowered the former English characteristics. Food, cookery, wine, dress, entertainments, houses, furniture, all are bad imitations of Gallic models, and even the good old Tory who got drunk in orthodox fashion has vanished with the disappearance of port in favour of light wines. The fare of the time of King Alfred, which would try the digestion of the Woolwich Infant, the historic leg of mutton, are replaced by hybrid French compounds. The one thing in which we do not imitate the French, by the way, the Sunday, meets equally with the Italian critic's disapprobation, and he draws an elaborate and uninspiring picture of the British Sabbath, declaring that the Church sterilises the nation, and that the Lord's Day is a day of paralysis and vice for a population of four millions.

BRITISH CHURCH SERVICES IN PARIS.——The Prince of Wales has subscribed one hundred guineas to the fund for rebuilding the Marbœuf Chapel in Paris. From 1815 to 1824 the only Church of England Services in Paris were held in the ball-room of the British Embassy. In that year the Rev. Lewis Way, still remembered as an affectionate pastor and eloquent preacher, built at his own expense a small but beautiful chapel in the Rue [illegible], attaching it to the Hôtel Marbœuf. The larger chapel, erected in 1844, in the Avenue Marbœuf, by Albert Way, Esq., only son of the Rev. Lewis Way, has become dilapidated, and must soon be pulled down. Hence the effort now being made to rebuild it in a more creditable style and in a better position. On account of its present surroundings (so different from those of thirty years ago) it is facetiously called "the Church of England in the Mews." The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London are most desirous to see it replaced by a suitable edifice. Messrs. Coutts and Co., 59, Strand, receive subscriptions.

MONT BLANC was ascended without guides last week by two Englishmen, such an attempt having been made only three times before—by three brothers, named Young, one of whom was killed, by two Irish tourists, and by a solitary Englishman. Messrs. Cawood and Colgrove ascended from Chamonix [illegible], leaving the Grands Mulets at 2.30 a.m., climbed by lantern-light along the Bosse du Dromadaire, amidst a [illegible] and [illegible] the snow [illegible] their ankles, reaching the summit at 9.30 a.m., when they had a splendid view and found the climate very genial. On their descent the travellers found the track to be far more dangerous and [illegible] than it had seemed in the early morning, but they regained the Grands Mulets at 5.30 p.m., and were back at Chamonix three hours later. They had never before been on Mont Blanc, but had ascended the Matterhorn without guide as well as the Jungfrau. Another Alpine [illegible], engaged on a less dangerous errand, has not [illegible] so fortunate. A gentleman named Ackermann, who was [illegible] Mount Pilatus, has broken his neck by falling from the [illegible] the lower of the two peaks at the summit of Pilatus.

CHAPTER XXI.

SIGNOR SANDRO was saved from taking much trouble about the search after Don Vittorio. Accident—the chance meeting in a café of Tivoli with the very fattore who had been robbed by the brigands—brought to his knowledge that Don Vittorio was staying at Olevano with a roystering party of young men; amongst them two with whom my master had some acquaintance. These were a Belgian of noble family, and a Sicilian of no family at all. Signor Sandro's account of them was not favourable. He described the Sicilian as being a clever, unprincipled, dissolute young man. "Although," said my master, regretfully, "the rascal has a fine sense of colour, and has done some clever genre pictures after the fashion of Fortuny and the Spaniards."

"And is the Belgian an artist, too?" I asked, whereupon Signor Sandro first drew down his bushy eyebrows and peered at me from beneath them, and then raised them and opened his eyes with a wide stare, as he answered, "An artist! I believe his noble family allow him five thousand francs a month; and he paints pictures."

Which oracular response was all he deigned to make on the subject.

He wrote, however, immediately to the Princess, informing her where her son was. And he told me that he had advised her to let him alone to work off his mood of sullen defiance without interference. "He is in devilish bad company truly," said Signor Sandro. "Drinking and gambling and evil speaking will be their chief occupations. But I believe there's no species of wickedness in which Don Vittorio Corleoni couldn't give finishing lessons; so anyway he'll be no worse than before."

Rutherford afterwards said to me privately that perhaps Don Vittorio had plunged into a week of debauchery by way of exorcising any uncomfortable thoughts of the drowned girl which might be haunting him. For my own part I did not believe that Don Vittorio was haunted by compunctious visitings. I had a profound conviction of his cold and cruel selfishness. Sometimes I felt as if I myself were wicked for realising his wickedness so vividly. Altogether the subject was one which made me shudder; and as I could serve no good end by dwelling on it, I put it out of my thoughts as much as possible. Neither Mr. Rutherford nor I had told Signor Sandro of the dreadful scene on the Passeggiata di Ripetta. It remained a secret between Rutherford and myself:—at least so far as our own immediate little circle was concerned.

I had an unspeakable sense of comfort and sustainment in the Englishman's counsel and sympathy at this time. And the trust with which I relied on his good feeling and good sense increased with every hour of our acquaintance. Now I had never in my life before felt it otherwise than irksome to be brought into confidential relations with persons whom I did not love. Intimacy and familiarity without affection I was constitutionally averse from. And yet the daily intimate and familiar intercourse with Rutherford was very pleasant to me. "Decidedly," said I to myself, "I must love him; for unless I did, I should detest the sight of him!"

No doubt this was a singular way for a young woman to reason about her first love. But I state the case as it was. I had been too much occupied with other things since I entered my teens to have gained the kind of experience in affairs of the heart which some girls appear to acquire instinctively; just as they know what sort of bonnet is the fashion at any given time, without any ostensible teaching on the subject! And then, to be sure, the unexpectedness of Mr. Rutherford's wooing had allowed me no opportunity of gradually developing a tender sentiment. There had been no series of shy hopes and fluttering doubts, to move my fancy and attract my interest. I was asked suddenly one day to love a man whom I had never thought of in the light of a possible lover. And that, I presume, is a rare case. Few women are wholly taken by surprise in these matters.

On the evening before our excursion Lucy and I were in the sitting-room. It was nearly seven o'clock, and at that hour Signor Sandro and Mr. Rutherford were coming to drink tea with us, and make the final arrangements for our start in the morning. I was putting a few flowers—the untended product of our tangled garden, but sweet and fresh—into the brown earthenware pitcher for the adornment of the tea-table, when Lucy suddenly said, "Do you know what became of the water-colour sketch you made of Mr. Rutherford's basket of wild flowers?"

"By the bye—no!"

"I do."

"Have you got it?"

"No. Some one carried off with my leave. Some one who thought that bit of your handiwork a precious treasure."

"Dear me! I wish more folks would think my handiwork a precious treasure! Hitherto public appreciation of it has not risen beyond thirty pounds for a good-sized canvas."

I laughed as I said it, but I was conscious of looking sad and foolish.

"Oh he is such a good fellow, Catherine! And so fond of you! I really believe he loves and admires you as much as even I think you ought to be loved and admired. He confessed as much to me. But I had found it out long ago."

"Really?"

"Really."

"And suppose I say I don't know what it is you are talking about?" murmured I, bending over the flowers in the brown pitcher.

"I can't suppose that, because you couldn't say a falsehood. Ah yes, I found out that Mr. Rutherford was over head and ears in love with you, Catherine, long before he confided in me. And I was in hopes—I thought—I had made up my mind that he would tell you so that day when you two went to the ravine together. And he lost the chance after all. How stupid of him! I declare that—— Why Catherine,—turn your face round this way! No, a little more. Let me have a good look at you. He has told you! And what did you say? Oh, Catty dear, you said you would have him, didn't you?"

"No. I——said neither 'Yes' nor 'No.' I—he promised to wait a week for my answer."

"But why didn't you say 'Yes' at once and make him sure and happy?"

"Lucy, Lucy, how could I? It was so sudden, so unexpected."

"Unexpected? Why, Catty, what on earth did you think the man was dangling about in Tivoli for all this time?" asked Lucy innocently.

There was no answering this question; so I had to be silent, and to feel my cheeks growing redder and redder.

"And besides, don't be angry,—but I'm sure you're a wee bit in love with Reuben Rutherford yourself."

"Am I, do you think?" said I. And I said it so earnestly that Lucy burst out laughing.

"Are you? Don't you know you are, Catty?"

"No, that's just it. And I want to be sure, because the truth—the very utmost truth—is due to him."

Lucy laughed again, but there were some tears on her eyelashes, which she wiped away smilingly. "Well, look here, Catherine,—goodness, how wonderful it seems for me to be giving you advice!—but just ask yourself this question. Suppose any other man you ever knew had told you that he loved you, and wished to make you his wife, how would you endure to be daily and hourly in that man's company,—living in the greatest intimacy, and seeing his love for you shown at every moment in some way or other, and the more plainly because not spoken in words? How would you,—proud, shy, you—like that, Catty? If you don't know, I do, that the poor man would be frozen alive. But you haven't shown any disposition to freeze Mr. Rutherford, Catty."

This consideration was so completely in harmony with the thoughts which had passed through my own mind on the subject that I could not help smiling. But I merely answered that we had best not say more about the matter for the present, be-wait, and let the hours bring silent counsel, as it is their beneficent wont to do, if we will but possess our souls in patience. Lucy first made a little pouting grimace at this, and then kissed me, and said, "Well, only this one word, Catty. I know John would be pleased. He's just the sort of man after John's heart." John was our brother.

Then our guests came in, and we had tea, and were very cheerful, talking about to-morrow's excursion. This was to be the order of it: We were to start at four o'clock in the morning in a carriage, and drive to a place called San Polo de' Cavalieri. There we were to mount ponies and ride to the summit of Mount Gennaro, and down to Licenza, at which latter place the carriage was to meet us again, and after having visited the site of Horace's Sabine farm, close at hand, we were to drive back to Tivoli, and be at home before sunset. At first it had been intended that Lucy should leave the carriage at San Polo and ride up the mountain with us, but on inquiry as to time and distance we found that this would be too fatiguing for her; and it was settled that she and Monica should remain with the carriage, drive leisurely to Licenza, where Lucy could rest in the house of Monica's aunt, and Signor Sandro, Rutherford, and I were to rejoin her there, and get some refreshment after our scramble on foot and on horseback. We were sitting quietly in the twilight, Signor Sandro smoking, Lucy and Rutherford chatting in low tones about his Cumberland home, and the rugged, picturesque, Border country, and I, sometimes striking a stray chord on the mandolin as a kind of accompaniment to a lazy sort of reverie I had fallen into,—through which, however, I was conscious of all that my sister and Rutherford were saying,—when, after one peremptory tap, the door was opened, and there stood Monica, her pale face glimmering white and ghostly out of her black locks in the waning light.

"I have to speak with you," said she abruptly in her coarse voice.

"To me, Monica? Well, come in, and make your salutation properly. You must not forget your manners, you know."

I never allowed my young savage to take her own wild way unchecked. And I had acquired such influence over her that she seldom rebelled against the curb. Now, apparently from the force of habit, she dropped a rough curtsey, and muttered "buona sera." But immediately afterwards she repeated vehemently, "I have to speak with you." Then, as I beckoned her to advance, she said, "No; to you, only to you,—not the others."

"What, may not even I hear, Monica?" asked Lucy, smiling. "I think that's unkind."

"No, no; not you," exclaimed the girl, suddenly shrinking away from Lucy's outstretched hand. "I want the Sora Caterina."

Something in Monica's face and voice moved me to comply with her request. I went downstairs with her to the studio, and there the first words she uttered made me rejoice that I had done as she wished.

"You told me not to mention the accursed one's name before her," said she, pointing upward to the ceiling to indicate Lucy, who had remained in the sitting-room above.

"Do you mean the Corleone? No, no. You have done well to remember my injunction. What has happened?"

"La Rosina——?"

"Yes; the handsome girl that that demon stole away from my brother. But she was a fool. I would have stuck a knife into his black heart first, even if I had gone down under the water the next minute."

"Hush, hush, Monica. You must not talk so wildly."

"Ay, you and the Signorina Lucia say that it's wicked to take vengeance. But don't the saints take vengeance if you offend 'em? Yes, that do they,—and for such little things. Why a young woman I knew down in the Maremma only just said to her sister, who wanted to be a nun of Santa Chiara, that it was sheer laziness, and that praying all the year came easier than spinning in the winter and reaping in the summer,—and what did Santa Chiara do? Only ten days afterwards the young woman's baby fell sick, and nobody could tell what was the matter with it, and it pined and pined, and wasted and wasted, till it was as light to lift as a blessed palm-branch of last year,—and then it died. And that was Santa Chiara's vengeance! Padre Bossi said so. Ay, the saints are quick enough to take vengeance for themselves. And if they won't take it for us, we must do our own work."

The girl's face was livid, and contorted with fury, and her eyes were red and swollen. She had been crying. But Monica's tears—I had once or twice seen her weep—did not fall like a soft dew, but rather like a scalding rain. I tried to calm her excitement, and to raise in her dark mind some images of tender sorrow in connection with the unfortunate young woman whom she called La Rosina. Presently Monica took hold of my hand and kissed it in a quick, passionate way. "Yes," she said, "you've been good to me, and you're sorry for La Rosina. That's why I wanted to tell you about her. Because, then, if you should hear, if anything happens, you will understand why."

"What do you mean, Monica? What is likely to happen?"

"Who knows?" she answered gloomily. Then, after a second's silence, shaking her head and shoulders as a dog shakes off water, she exclaimed, "Basta! Chi muore giace, e chi vive si dà pace. Who dies, lies still, and who lives, takes comfort. Signorina, you won't tell the others? You won't say anything to them?" And on receiving my assurance to that effect, she seemed to cast off her volcanic mood of fire and darkness, and to give herself to buoyant anticipations of to-morrow's excursion with the unreflecting mobility of a baby.

"Monica," said I, struck by a sudden thought, just as I was about to leave the studio, "where is your brother?"

"'Sh, 'sh!" she exclaimed, with her finger on her lips, and her eyes glancing suspiciously in all directions. "Don't speak of him. He's gone. Gone far enough away—gone back to the Abruzzi."

"Was he here—in Tivoli, or close to it—last Thursday?"

"No, no; not he! He was far enough away, I tell you. Beyond those big mountains," she answered instantly, looking straight at me with her great flashing eyes.

"Are you speaking the truth, Monica?"

"May the blessed Madonna strike me with palsy if——"

"That will do, Monica. I have told you that I don't allow those imprecations in my presence."

I was by no means persuaded that she was not lying, but I knew by experience that to press her further at that time would but have brought forth a string of oaths and protestations, whose vehemence would probably be in an inverse ratio to their veracity.

CHAPTER XXII.

MISTY darkness brooded over the scene when we left Tivoli next morning. A few stars still twinkled in a blue-black sky, and the air was cold and damp. As we jingled along the solitary road, some huge fragments of Roman aqueduct glimmered through the gloom. Then the grey tint of the crumbling rocks began to distinguish itself from the darker shadow of the shrubs which straggled over them. The infinite, chill sadness of the coming dawn spread slowly over the drowsy world, and struck us mortals silent, as the new unknown day crept nearer bearing hidden destinies.

When we reached San Polo—a miserable village on a lower spur of the Sabine range—it was still murky, and the place was muffled in a mountain mist. Whilst the carriage horses were resting, and the saddle ponies were being got ready, we entered, by our driver's advice, a sort of tavern, where he told us we could get some hot coffee. The cavernous room we stumbled into across a miry lane reminded me of a mouse-hole in a massive wall; for it was pierced, as it were, in the basement story of a half-ruinous mediæval tower and castle. There were rude wooden benches and tables here and there, nearly all of which were crowded with young men, smoking, lounging, talking, and drinking. One or two miserable oil lamps faintly illumined the various groups, and at the farther end of the stone-flagged room, a glowing mass of wood embers on an open hearth cast a red glare upon a little space, and made the neighbouring darkness darker. The young men were conscripts;—so the landlord told us, who brought some hot coffee (very weak but mysteriously black), upon a brass tray. They were on their way down to Rome to be passed through the military machine which grinds peasants into soldiers. Very good raw material they seemed to me for the purpose; strong, deep-chested, with white teeth gleaming in vivid contrast with their bronzed skins, and dark, bright eyes, and an air of melancholy patience like the patience of an ox; but with suggestions of a smouldering fire beneath it, which the ox has not. And in all their gestures and attitudes one quality was conspicuous—grace; a masculine unconscious grace which had something of the grandeur of primeval Nature in it. The material accessories of the scene were of far more squalid coarseness than any with which Teniers has surrounded his boozing boors; the figures which peopled it were, compared with those same boors, Hyperion to a satyr. Signor Sandro and I feasted our painters' eyes upon them. Lucy sat wrapped in her shawl, a little shrinking from observation, and stretching out her feet towards the glow of the hearth. Rutherford had gone out to see to the saddling of our ponies, and I thought Monica had accompanied him; but suddenly I caught sight of her head bent down in earnest conversation with a man who was muffled in one of the huge cloaks called pastrani, which enveloped him from head to foot. The collar of it was drawn up above his ears, and he wore a peaked hat with a broad, overshadowing brim, so that he was effectually shielded from recognition by prying eyes, if he wished to avoid such; and it struck me that he did wish it. But this impression was derived from a fleeting glimpse—almost momentary; for no sooner had I ascertained that the person with whom he was talking was Monica, than the latter rose and elbowed her way towards me through the throng of men with her usual nonchalance, and the man shrank back and seemed to melt into the shadow. I did not see him again. In answer to my question Monica said carelessly that the man seeing foreigners was curious to know who we were, and what brought us thither. "And," said she, with a look of the quick cunning which sometimes flashed across and vulgarised her statuesque face, "I took care to tell him that you were all artists. Artists are always poor, you know, and nobody wants to rob them. I don't believe there's any danger up in these hills even if you were as rich as the Pope. But who knows? There's no harm in being on the safe side."

We were very glad to exchange the freshness of the morning air, even though it was sharp and keen, for the close, tobacco-laden atmosphere of the tavern; and when we went outside we found that the dawn was brightening the mountain tops, and the driving mist was silvered. All was in readiness, thanks chiefly to Rutherford's energy, but now an unexpected delay took place, occasioned by Monica's positive refusal to accompany Lucy to Licenza in the carriage, and expressed determination to remain with me. She could, or would, give no reason for this, except that she wanted to go up the mountain with the Signorina Caterina. In vain we pointed out to her that Lucy could not go to Licenza alone, that her (Monica's) aunt would be expecting her, that if she were obstinate, the excursion must be given up and the day wasted. She made no answer to half the arguments, scoldings, and coaxings, that were addressed to her; and to the other half she merely replied with downcast eyes and subdued voice, "Oh, I want to go up the mountain with the Signorina Caterina."

We looked at each other blankly. I was unspeakably provoked; but I felt myself to be powerless. For, even if I had succeeded by sheer force of will in making her get into the carriage, there was every probability that she would leave it, and come after us before it had journeyed many yards on its way to Licenza. And besides I did not like the idea of leaving Lucy alone with her in her present intractable mood. All at once Signor Sandro settled the difficulty. He would, he said, go down to Licenza in the carriage with Lucy, and Monica might ride the pony provided for him. He had been to the top of the Mons Lucretilis in old times, and could well give up seeing it again; especially as he foresaw the affair would be fatiguing, and better adapted for strong young folks than rheumatic old ones. In this way, too, both Lucy and I would have a masculine escort, and he would be able to see that Lucy was properly taken care of, and had a good rest at Licenza, and some refreshment out of an ample hamper which Rutherford had provided, and which was now safely stowed on the box of the carriage. "In short," said Signor Sandro, summing up, "this arrangement will suit everybody—except, perhaps, Rodolfo," he added, in a low voice. "But it wouldn't do to send him to Licenza alone with Lucia."

"It's exactly the story of the man who had to cross the ferry with the fox and the goose!" exclaimed Lucy, laughing. And then with a grave face, but a playful gleam of the eye, she told Rutherford that she hoped he would endure the bore of Catherine's company with polite patience; and that Monica would be the discreetest of chaperones, possessing the rare and precious quality in that character of not understanding a word he said! Then I was helped into my saddle, and Monica into hers, Rutherford mounted his pony, the guide flourished his stick, and we set off to climb the heights which rise behind San Polo; whilst Lucy and my master, having with much waving of hands witnessed our start, were driven away by another road towards the valley.

Our way led at first along a rugged track—it could not be called a road—where there were the marks of wheels deeply cut into the soil. Then these disappeared. The track dwindled to a footpath which meandered across wild, waste land, and over pastures on the shoulder of some swelling hills, and past rare patches of maize, or millet, or oats, and through a jagged gully which was in the autumn and winter the bed of a raging torrent. Now it was dry and bleached beneath the sun which shone bright and strong above our heads. Its rocky sides were fringed with bush and briar which were putting forth delicate green leaflets in the early Southern spring. From the steep, slippery gully, over whose loose rolling stones our horse's hoofs stumbled and toiled with difficulty, we emerged on to a wide space of green turf. In winter this was a treacherous bog; in summer a pasture for many scores of grazing beasts. Now it was bright with vivid verdure, and enamelled with countless delicate lilac cups of the spring crocus. Our guide followed the only firm track across the quaking turf. He led Monica's pony by the bridle, I came next—my sagacious little beast following step by step in the hoofmarks of his predecessor—and Rutherford brought up the rear. In this order we crossed the bog, and climbed again on the further side of it. Our way grew so steep and so slippery that the ponies could not keep their footing on the short dry herbage. We dismounted, therefore, and made the last portion of the ascent to the summit of Monte Gennaro on foot. Arrived there, the guide and Monica threw themselves down to rest, whilst Rutherford and I stood gazing at the wonderful scene before us.

In one sense the view was a disappointment, for the whole of the lower landscape was shrouded in a billowy sea of mist, on which we looked down from the purer air of the mountain. But the grand rolling waves of this cloud-ocean, the effects of sunlight gilding the grey, the looming shapes of Monticelli and Sant' Angelo rising like volcanic islands, castle-crowned above this hazy sea—made up a sublime spectacle. Gradually the mist shifted here and there, and through great rents in it we caught glimpses of shadowy depths of landscape far below. All around us reigned a serene stillness. Save ourselves and our steeds, the only living thing to be seen was one circling hawk, poised on dark, motionless wings in the intense clear blue above a barren peak. And far away the song of a soaring unseen lark pierced the quivering air like a sunbeam."

"Come," said Rutherford, at length, rousing our guide from his repose on the thyme-scented herbage, "we must proceed. There is a long road between us and Licenza yet, I take it."

Truly there was, the guide admitted. And he seemed to think there was no time to lose if we would meet our friends down there at the appointed hour; although, characteristically, he had made no voluntary effort to push on, nor to break from the allurement of dolce far niente. We remounted, and turned our ponies' heads to the descent. We were to go down on the opposite side of the mountain to that which we had climbed. Our way now became bolder, more distinctly mountainous, and picturesque. We followed the course of a rapid stream, which had fretted a deep channel for itself through the rocks. Our path lay along the verge of the ravine high above the level of the water, which foamed and murmured mysteriously in the dark depths below. On the other side of the ravine rose hoary, barren peaks, some sober grey, some amber-tinted in the sunlight—and once we descried a tiny walled town perched on an aerial summit. It was the strangest, wildest, loveliest, forlornest looking place! And then to think of it in winter, when the winds must rage round it like a pack of hungry wolves, and the keen-toothed frost is splitting the very stones on which it stands! On our right hand the great hills somewhat receded, and left a space of high pasture lands between themselves and the edge of the precipice; and then again pressed forward, narrowing the path and bounding it with lofty, frowning walls.

At length we came to a picturesque spot of several acres in extent, nearly level, and covered with fine spring grass. Under a group of ash trees a clear fountain bubbled into an ancient stone basin, and, trickling over the edge, moistened a bank of lush wild flowers with its silver rills. On one side this sort of prairie was bounded by the ravine and the river; on the other by a group of rocks which rose sheer up from it, and on the summit of which grew a solitary fir tree. Beside the fir tree stood a figure, showing a clear dark outline against the sky. It was a man draped in the ample folds of a pastrano, such as the herdsmen of the Campagna wear, but as he stood, he leaned not on the long spear-like staff which those men use in guiding their wild herds of horses and cattle, but on a rifle.

"What an admirable figure for this landscape," I exclaimed, when I caught sight of him. "He is exactly what was wanted to make the picture complete!"

"Charming, from the purely picturesque point of view," muttered Rutherford. "But I should like to know——" He stopped, and on looking round at him I found that his eyes were fixed on the man's form with a mistrustful and suspicious look. The object of this look had not as yet perceived us, it appeared. He was standing motionless, like a sentry, and his head was turned down the valley in the direction towards which we were going, and the sound of our horse's hoofs was muffled by the spongy turf, so that neither his eyes nor his ears had warning of our approach. Rutherford rode up beside me, and made me halt with his hand on my bridle. "What do you suppose your picturesque friend can be doing all alone in this wilderness with a gun in his hand?" said he, in a low voice.

"Oh, he is in charge of some horses or cattle, no doubt. And as to his gun, it is very common for the butteri to go about armed, especially in the wilder parts of the country."

I had not felt the smallest fear on first seeing the man, and even now it appeared to me highly probable that he was merely a herdsman, as I had said. Nevertheless Rutherford's evident uneasiness infected me somewhat, and I remembered all at once Signor Sandro's stories of the brigands, and the wild-looking peasant who had accosted me in the ravine, and the mysterious individual I had seen that morning talking with Monica in the tavern at San Polo. Whilst we still halted hesitating, the guide and Monica had proceeded on their way, and were already some distance ahead of us, indeed they had arrived nearly immediately beneath the rock on which the solitary figure stood. All at once Monica set up a bawling, tuneless song with a long-drawn wail for its burthen, such as you may hear the Roman peasants singing any summer evening when the sun has gone down, and they rest from labour. At the first sound of it the man turned his head and shouldered his gun, and we, from the distance at which we stood, could see two other figures start up in a half-crouching attitude from among the bushes beside him, but they were probably invisible to those standing immediately beneath the rock. Our two companions stopped, and the guide—a rough, unkempt, uncivilised specimen of the mountain peasant lad—shouted up some question to the man on the rock. I could hear the sound of his voice, but not the words. The man replied to him, pointing with his outstretched arm down the valley, and in this action his cloak fell back, and I could distinctly see the glitter of weapons in his belt. Then the guide turned and beckoned to us vehemently, shouting and calling to us at the same time to come on. "You see it is all right," said I, "that boy was not certain of his way—I have been thinking so for the last mile or two—and has merely been asking for directions. My picturesque friend, as you call him, is a harmless herdsman."

"H'm! So much the better. At all events he does not appear inclined to molest us."

We switched our horses and trotted briskly on to rejoin the others. "Don't you know your way, that you stop and ask for directions," said Rutherford sternly to our guide; "and what do you think we are to pay you for if you don't know it?" The lad stared glumly, and shook his head. Rutherford's foreign accent furnished him with a sufficient pretext for appearing not to understand him; perhaps he really did not understand. We were now very near the group of ash-trees beneath which the fountain was trickling clearly, and the boy suggested that we should let our horses drink from the stone trough; but to my surprise Monica resolutely opposed this—urging us to proceed,—to hasten onward,—to get down to Licenza without more delay. Rutherford, too, seemed anxious to go on, and, indeed, he said frankly that he should feel more comfortable when we had got fairly away from the herdsman and his companions. So we proceeded down the gorge at as smart a pace as the steepness and crumbling, stony nature of the path permitted. As we rode away I looked upward and backward at the figure on the rock. He took off his broad-brimmed hat with a gesture full of wild grace, and waved it once in salutation. As he did so I recognised him. He was the same man who had restored my sketch to me that day in the ravine. Then he replaced his hat on his head, and, having pointed first at Monica and then at me, pressed his hand to his heart, and so remained until I lost sight of him. Rutherford, who rode immediately behind me, observed this pantomime with amazement. "Your 'harmless herdsman,' who is armed like Fra Diavolo, and has as cut-throat an air as one would wish to see, appears to be struck with you, Catherine," said he. "Perhaps we may thank your beaux yeux that he and his comrades, who keep so modestly in the background, didn't shoot and rob us, and fling our bodies down into the ravine there. Nothing would have been easier. He has chosen a most commanding position for the purpose."

To my mind, it was clear that the man was Monica's brother. A hundred circumstances flashed upon my memory to confirm it. And thus it might well be that, not to my beaux yeux, but to some sentiment of gratitude towards me, we owed our immunity from robbery, if not from worse. But I kept Monica's secret, as I had promised to do, and we reached Licenza without further adventure.

There we found Lucy and Signor Sandro installed in the house of Monica's aunt—a poor, bare, stone dwelling, standing, not within the queer little walled town of Licenza, but near to the banks of the river, which here sprawled and spread its clear waters into various wide and shallow channels. There was a little orchard behind the house, all pink with almond blossom, and in the orchard food was set out on a rough deal table. We did ample justice to the meal, and were very merry and cheerful. The day had been lovely, and Lucy was enchanted with the picturesqueness of the scenery she had driven through. Monica's aunt—a weather-beaten, toil-worn peasant woman, mother of many sturdy brats, who rolled about us on the grass, and stared at us with great dark eyes like young calves—waited on us, and was kind and friendly, albeit in somewhat uncouth fashion.

"You did not happen to fall in with a party of three or four young men, who must have been going up towards Monte Gennaro about the same time as you were coming down?" asked Signor Sandro. "They were rather a boisterous crowd—artists, the people here said. I did not see them; but the good woman of the house told me that they had been drinking and kicking up a great row in the little wine-shop yonder. They set off to walk up the mountain, meaning to reverse your tour and go down to San Polo." We replied that we had seen no such persons. "Ah, they were afoot," said my master, "and probably took some short cuts." "I wish I had seen them," said Rutherford; "I should have advised them not to go on unless they were well armed, or had absolutely empty pockets, which might do as well." Nothing more was said on the subject at that time, for now Monica took up her tambourine, and a young man and woman of the place advanced to dance the saltarello for our amusement. There was no other music than the rhythmic tap, tap of the tambourine, and the shaking clash of the loose metal plates on it, with an occasional booming thrum like the sound of a huge drowsy bee. Gradually, as the dancers warmed to their work, the pace became quicker, their gestures wilder and more animated, and at length Monica started up from the ground where she had been squatting with Oriental nonchalance, and, rushing to the table, seized a flask and drank from its narrow mouth a long, deep draught of wine. "Morte ai traditori!" she screamed, and flung the empty flask over her head like a mad Bacchante. Then she began a dance the like of which I had never seen, nor ever shall see again. "Possessed with a devil," were the words which came into my mind as I looked at her. She leaped, she turned, she threw her lithe body back till it bent like a reed; she beat her feet with a wild, quick, pulsing movement on the ground. Suddenly she would sink on her knee, and crouch lower and lower at each thud of the tambourine, until her head nearly touched the ground; and then again she would spring up like a leaping flame, and whiz round and round with dizzy rapidity. It was an extraordinary and thoroughly savage spectacle. But it held us all in a kind of breathless fascination; until at length, with the same darting suddenness with which she had begun, she gave one great wild leap and yell, and dropped, throwing herself prone on the grass, face downward, and remained motionless.

"Dio buono!" exclaimed Signor Sandro enthusiastically, "if you could but have sketched her as she danced! But you might as well try to sketch a flash of lightning."

The sun was declining when we got into the carriage to drive home. Before we reached Tivoli the stars came out, and the violet-tinted sky stretched solemnly above us. Every bush and wild flower was fragrant beneath the evening dew, and numberless nightingales sent out their exquisite throbbing music from each wayside copse as the flowers sent out their perfume.

"In a sweet spring evening like this," said Lucy, raising her innocent face to look upward, "I always feel a sense of such infinite compassion surrounding us. I don't know why, and I cannot well express what I mean; but all this peaceful beauty and sweetness seems to me like the pitiful voice of One who consoles; One not ignorant of sorrow, nor indifferent to it; but who holds a secret of comfort which we, too, shall know some day."

CONCLUSION

Within four-and-twenty hours all the countryside was ringing with a dreadful crime which had been committed among the Sabine Hills, at the foot of Monte Gennaro. Two men, footsore, exhausted with fatigue and terror, and one of them slightly wounded, crawled into San Polo, and gave information that they had been attacked by brigands in the mountain, that one of their companions had been shot dead and his body flung down a precipice into a mountain stream, and that they two had escaped as by a miracle. A thousand rumours were flying about, and it was some time before the full truth was known. But the rarity of the crime in those parts, its daring character, and, above all, the name and rank of the victim, excited the intensest interest in the case, and made it the chief topic of public talk for many weeks. The murdered man was the only son,—the heir—the hope—of one of the oldest and most illustrious families of the Roman aristocracy. He was the most accomplished, most handsome, most chivalric of noble young cavaliers; a brilliant figure in elegant saloons, beloved in the privacy of the domestic circle, a firm friend, a generous master, a dutiful son, an affectionate brother, and—alas!—a devoted lover, who left an amiable girl who adored him to mourn the untimely loss of her promised husband. Above all, he was a staunch and truly pious son of Holy Church, and his cruel fate was understood to have plunged an additional dagger into the afflicted heart of the venerable Pontiff.

Thus—and much more—the Clerical journals of the day. Thus—or little less—the other newspapers. And the man whose epitaph they thus wrote was Vittorio Maria Giuseppe de' Principi Bastiani-Corleoni.

Only by slow degrees and in a hesitating way did it begin to be generally remarked that there were sundry strange and unexplained circumstances connected with the murder which gave rise to some curious conjectures.

Don Vittorio had not been robbed. A valuable gold watch and other trinkets were found on his body, whereas his two companions—a Belgian and Sicilian artist—had been rifled of every valuable about them and of all their money. Clearly the assassination of Don Vittorio must have been due to some other motive than those which ordinarily actuate brigands; and by which these very brigands appeared to have been actuated in the case of their two other victims. Then it was whispered about that the two artists had delivered up Corleoni as a scapegoat;—had bought their own lives by refraining from resistance, although by so refraining they destroyed the last chance of Corleoni's escape. For the three gentlemen were all armed, and, although fallen upon by surprise, might have made a fight for it; but that the chief of the brigands shouted to them loudly that there was but one life he wanted—Vittorio Corleoni's—and that he meant to have. As to the other two, they were free to go at the price of their purses. These horrible innuendos crept out after a quarrel between the Belgian and the Sicilian. Each hinted that the selfish cowardice of the other had caused young Corleoni to lose his life. The truth was never fully known; but the world looked askance at those two men, and before long they vanished from Rome, and new tides of strangers from the east and the west and the north and the south have long ago swept over and obliterated the traces of them from the memories of all the inhabitants of Rome, save one or two.

The brigands got clear off for that time. They were supposed to have fled into the Neapolitan territory, where they continued their depredations with ever-increasing audacity. But only three weeks ago I read in an Italian newspaper a stirring account of an encounter with brigands near Salerno, and of the death of the celebrated chief, Pasqualuccio, who was shot dead in a hand-to-hand skirmish with the King's troops.

Monica I never saw again after that fateful evening. In the first shock and horror of the news, the chief and absorbing anxiety of all of us—Rutherford, my good old master, and myself—was to prevent its being communicated to Lucy. Had it been told her abruptly I think it might have killed her. But we succeeded in keeping it from her for more than two years. She knew the tragic story at last in its main points, but neither I nor Reuben ever told her of the suicide of the lost girl whose fate was so horribly avenged. She asked me several times, during the first days after our excursion, if I had news of Monica, if Monica were not going to sit to me any more, why she did not come to see us. And at first I could but say the truth, that I knew nothing of her. But I learned after a while that she had disappeared from Tivoli, no one knew whither. She was probably fearful of being examined by the officers of justice, who were making inquiries and researches in all directions. Signor Sandro, who had a most widespread and heterogeneous acquaintance, heard by chance that she was married to a peasant of the Abruzzi, and had emigrated to South America with a shipful of other sons and daughters of the soil from Genoa. And this statement was singularly confirmed. My brother John, on his return to Europe for a holiday in the following year, brought me a little coral amulet such as is commonly worn in Naples, and which he said was given to him by a poor Italian emigrant woman who was dying of fever at Rio Janeiro, and to whom he had had the opportunity of being kind. One day she heard his name by chance, and suddenly raising herself on her miserable pallet, asked him if he had not a sister called Caterina. On his replying that he had, and asking what she possibly could know about his sister, she merely shook her head feebly, and giving the amulet into his hand, bade him carry that to the Signorina Caterina, and ask her to get some priest to say a mass for her soul.

Our rough-hewn ends were shaped far otherwise for us than we had intended or expected. This often comes over me with a sense of awe and wonder when I remember the girlish plans for the future which my sweet Lucy and I used to make. Sweet, pure, child-like little Lucy! I have lost her. She faded away as the pearly hues of daylight fade in the west, serene and lovely to the last. And it is my profoundest comfort to know that the last twelve months of her life were full of a happy peace that truly passeth understanding. She fully embraced the Roman faith; and her beautiful nature assimilated to itself all that is touching, lofty, and poetic in that religion, whilst its dross had no power to soil the white wings of her soul. She never showed the slightest wish to enter a convent, but lived in the world in loving sympathy with all her fellow-creatures. I sometimes feared, with many bitter pangs, that the disappointment and sorrow of her innocent love-story had undermined her health, and that but for that she might have been spared. But a wise and gentle old physician who knew and loved her—all who knew her loved her!—assured me that the seeds of consumption were in her from her birth, inherited from her dead mother. Not long before she left us, she was sitting alone with me one evening in the twilight—alone but for one other tiny creature in my arms—and as she leaned her cheek against my shoulder, and played softly with a little waxen hand upon my knee, she said, "Isn't it strange to look back upon, Catty dear? You remember how you used to talk about your being the maiden aunt, and spoiling my children some of these days. And now you see, it is I who must do the spoiling, for you and my dear good second brother are a great deal too sensible to do it for yourselves. And the poor baron would be a great deal too sensible, too, if it were not for foolish Aunt Lucy."

For I am the mother of two little sons, and Reuben Rutherford is my dear husband.

Life in the Canadian backwoods is painted in very dusky hues by "Letters from an Emigrant Lady" (Bentley), and the unlucky authoress seems to have had more than an ordinary share of those trials and disappointments which too often accompany emigration. Penury, discomfort of every kind, ill-health, loneliness, and a host of other ills overpowered the "Emigrant Lady," who from her own account was totally unfit to encounter hardships, and the narrative furnishes forcible evidence of the folly of those who setting out with little money in hand, and the expectations of none awaiting them, yet believe that the New World will afford the fortune which the Old Country has failed to provide. The letters are most unaffected in tone, and give some sad glimpses of the struggles and the daily existence of Muskoka settlers. Emigration also, though of a different type, and with a happier result, is the theme of "Uppingham-by-Sea," by "J. H. S." (Macmillan), which records the success of a notable experiment tried some two years since, when a whole school driven out by fever from their original premises were transplanted, masters, scholars, and all, to a Welsh fishing village. Schoolboys under such novel conditions might surely have afforded opportunities for some amusing descriptions, but "J. H. S." has hardly done justice to his subject. Fewer Latin quotations and more local colouring would have made an acceptable volume.

It requires a very nice pen to write an autobiography, much tact and discrimination to avoid egotism and to distinguish between details of interest to a small circle and to the outside world, yet the author of the rambling collection of commonplace anecdotes and bad verses styled "Wilhelm's Wanderings" (Remington) altogether lacks these desirable qualities. He passed through many well-known scenes and met many well-known personages, but his adventures are not worth recording, and the slipshod English and the avalanche of foreign terms, frequently wrongly spelt, and "Goethe" which disfigure his pages will soon weary the reader.

Normandy is, indeed, an oft-described district, but Mrs. Charles [illegible] contrives to impart considerable freshness to a well-worn subject in "A Summer in Normandy" (Routledge). Although actually intended for children, this chatty volume discourses so brightly of summer days in the tumble-down country house, the characteristic Norman town close by, the queer people and the pleasant excursions around, that it will find no little favour with older readers, and will set children longing to tread in the footsteps of the little hero and heroine.

In these days of wars and rumours of wars it is certainly not amiss to look up the records of British valour in bygone years. "Brave Men in Action," by S. J. Mackenna (Sampson Low), therefore brings forward a plentiful array of gallant deeds on sea and land, relating not so much the history of any particular battle or expedition as some special feat of courage shown by one individual. Here are episodes from all times and all lands in which British forces have been engaged, related in a strain of high enthusiasm and not over-burdened with naval and military technicalities. The brave actions of the last half of this century are rather slightly treated, as the only incidents noticed are two in the Chinese and Maori campaigns.

"Brownie," by C. W. Bardsley (Marcus Ward), another of the "Bluebell Series," is an agreeably told tale of country life, well suited to girlish perusal, and with a sufficiently exciting end to gratify sensation lovers. Most of the characters are of a very familiar type, but there is a healthy tone running throughout, and it is only to be regretted that the charming Brownie should be so maligned by the artist. From the same publisher comes Part V. of "Our Native Land," which has been illustrating the English and Scotch Lakes, and now extols the [illegible] beauties of the Emerald Isle. Three fairly executed water-colour sketches of Lough Leane, Ross Castle, and the Tore Waterfall are accompanied by some entertaining letterpress by Mr. S. C. Hall, which we remember to have met before in Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Companion to Killarney." Scenes of a wilder character are depicted in "Sketches of African Scenery from Zanzibar to the Victoria Nyanza" (Church Missionary Society), a series of chromolithographs of African life and scenery from drawings by the late Mr. O'Neill, of the Victoria Nyanza Mission, from whose journal the text is also mainly condensed. These "sketches" illustrate the journey of the first missionaries of this Mission, a journey which ended in the death of several of the missionaries. Turning further west the lime juice manufacture in the Antilles is briefly described in "The Island of Montserrat" (Hudson Smith), wherein the letterpress is better than the illustrations, which are wonderfully gorgeous, and represent the natives with bright blue hands and [illegible].

Considering the antiquity of the game of tennis, it is strange the "game of kings" has had no history of any importance until now. "The Annals of Tennis," by Julian Marshall (the Field), however, can well fill the vacancy, and from its ample description of the game and its laws, its carefully arranged historical details, and its quaint illustrations, may be heartily praised as a clever and exhaustive treatise. Although much of the volume can only be enjoyed by a thorough tennis player, the historical portion will be attractive even to those ignorant of the game, for Mr. Marshall has such a hearty love for his theme, and writes so pleasantly and easily, as to rouse effectually his readers' interest. He gives many curious extracts from ancient manuscripts, while the eccentric cuts, innocent of perspective and most rules of drawing, are by no means the least amusing part of the volume.

A Greek proverb bids us "eat cress to learn more wit," and although water cresses are not so largely used in England as across the Channel, they are sufficiently appreciated by Londoners to render the suggestion of Mr. Shirley Hibberd in "The Culture of the Water Cress" (W. H. Allen) very acceptable. Watercresses need neither skill, expenditure, nor a large garden; and if Mr. Hibberd's plans and practical instructions be carefully followed, they can be grown at home with little trouble and less cost. Mr. Hibberd first publicly mooted his scheme to the Horticultural Society last [illegible], and the interest shown induced him to prepare the present sketch, wherein he gives a gossipy history of the watercress and useful information. Those who prefer ornament to use, and are planning for the spring, will find "The Bulb Garden," by S. Wood (Crosby Lockwood), an excellent manual alike for the amateur and the professional grower. Minute and accurate directions are given for preparing the soil, for planting, rearing, and propagating all kinds of bulbous plants, from the humble crocus to the stately arum, and the volume is embellished by some tasteful illustrations. For general information on floral matters, Mr. Glenny's "Gardening for the Million" (Houlston) has been revised and enlarged, and would be a capital gift for amateur gardeners of the humbler classes.

II.

In "A Political Epilogue," the paper with which the current number of the Fortnightly Review opens, Mr. John Morley brings forward one consideration undoubtedly of considerable importance. It is that, whatever there may be to be said in favour of an "Imperial" policy, Parliamentary Government is essentially an unfit form of machinery for carrying it out. "An ambitious, restless, and complicated foreign policy must inevitably," he says, "abound in emergencies, and a policy of emergencies is incompatible with a Government of public deliberation." And "If Parliamentary methods, their publicity, their freedom, their tendency to lag and be very slow, are all hostile to a kind of policy that implies despatch, privacy, and the ready energy of personal resolution, so, too, is the power of wavering and unstable constituencies as the ultimate arbiter of the action of a Government fatally incompatible with the new system of intervention and empire." It is, no doubt, true that we have yet to learn whether a democracy—and England is now virtually a democracy—can be led to carry out an active and consistent course of foreign policy, and the effort to accomplish the experiment successfully must task the best energies of English statesmanship; but we should be sorry to despair of the result beforehand.—In "Dreams and Realities" Mr. Leslie Stephen indulges in an outburst of what has been not inaptly styled "militant agnosticism." He seems full of a sort of angry contempt for Canon Farrar and the gentlemen who have been criticising his sermons, and inquiring into the conditions of existence in a future life in the Contemporary Review. "What can any human being outside a pulpit," he asks, "say upon such a subject which does not amount to a confession of ignorance, coupled, it may be, with more or less suggestion of shadowy hopes and fears." Belief in a future life, it is the drift of Mr. Leslie Stephen's paper to urge, belongs to the sphere of dreams and poetic illusions, and it is precisely because the popular belief in Hell has had this dream-like character that it has had a less noxious influence than might have been anticipated on the hearts and consciences of those who have held it. No doubt it would be the idlest folly for Mr. Stephen, with his opinions, to speculate as to the possible conditions of existence in a future life; but we do not think he is justified in controversial fairness, or perhaps, even in courtesy, in implying, as he seems to do, that Canon Farrar and his critics are of the same mind as himself if they had the courage to speak out.—From Dr. Maudsley we have an interesting paper on "Hallucinations of the Senses," especially on those hallucinations of the senses of sight and hearing which may affect persons free from mental disorder, and which, the writer thinks, may furnish the explanation of the firm belief in ghosts and apparitions which has prevailed among all nations and in all times—an hypothesis which seems at least highly plausible.—Professor Knight discusses the doctrines of the pre-existence of the soul and metempsychosis—in which he seems more than half inclined to believe; and in the way of criticism we have a review of Mrs. Gaskell's novels, by Mr. W. Minto, and an estimate of a little-known American writer of fiction, Brockden Brown, by Mr. G. Barnett Smith.

The Contemporary Review must be styled in the main dull, though there is some liveliness in the coup de grace administered to Mr. Froude, with which Mr. Freeman closes his examination of that gentleman's "Life and Times of Thomas Becket." "Mr. Froude," says his outspoken critic, "stands alone as the one writer of any importance of whose writings one can say that on them any process of correction would be thrown away. What we meet with in him as an historian is not mere mistaken inference, or mere mistakes in detail, however gross the carelessness or ignorance which they might imply. It is the substitution, through page after page, of one narrative for another—the substitution of a story which bears no likeness to the original story, except that the same actors appear in both." —In "The Life of Jesus and Modern Criticism," Professor Bernhard Weiss calls upon those who reject supernatural views of the life and work of Christ to explain how such views, if groundless, found their way into the Gospels especially as modern critics have been compelled to fix for these Gospels an earlier date than Strauss assigned them. Professor Weiss argues ably and forcibly, though we cannot help thinking his reasoning less conclusive than it appears to himself. The point in dispute, however, is far too grave and wide-reaching to be entered upon here.—Professor Monier Williams's paper on the "Progress of Indian Religious Thought," and Mr. R. A. Proctor's on "The Sun's Corona and His Spots," are both eminently learned in their several ways, but perhaps hardly address the general reader; whilst Mr. Robert Buchanan's poem, "Julia Cytherea," strikes us as a failure.

Blackwood this month abounds in political articles for which we do not care, but in "The Idea of Home," another instalment of the series on "French Home Life," we have an interesting and suggestive paper on which we should like to comment at some length, did our space admit of such indulgence. The English idea of home, says the writer, is that of a fortress to be defended against all comers; the German, a woman's labouring place; but the French, "a common ground of union, where all the members of a family, and each of their friends, find a seat awaiting them." She considers that the "idiosyncracies of the French home—of the true typical French home, that is—are, taken as a whole, the most admirable in Europe," but is constrained to own that the type has one prominent defect —the want of calm. This alone, we should say, would be fatal to its excellence in the eyes of the multitude of Englishmen who, explicitly or implicitly, hold, with Parson Helstone in "Shirley," that "men go abroad for conversation and amusement and come home to read and reflect."—We have also some more of Mr. Theodore Martin's admirable translations from Heine; and, under the title of "A Fetish City," a curious account—which rather taxes the reader's credulity, and which it is difficult to suppose was intended to be taken altogether seriously—of a ruined Greek city, said to have been discovered in the Transvaal.

In the Cornhill we have an inquiry into the "Age of the Sun and Earth," which, from internal evidence, would seem to come from Mr. R. A. Proctor, who is becoming as prolific in the matter of scientific essays, as Mrs. Oliphant or Miss Braddon in three-volumed novels. The paper on "Child's Play" is very good. The writer holds that "sensation does not count for so much in our first years as afterwards;" meaning that sensations derived from without are then vaguer, less acute, and less attended to. He—or, perhaps, rather, she—dwells much on the large part the element of "make believe" plays in all games that really have attraction for children. The average child, it is said, "passes three-fourths of his time in a dream, and the rest in open self-deception."—Professor Colvin's essay on the legends connected with the Centaurs is also of interest.

The conclusion of Mr. Hamilton Lang's paper on Cyprus is the cheval de bataille in Macmillan. Mr. Lang's remarks on the climate and healthiness of Cyprus will be read with special interest just now. He denies that the island, judged by a reasonable standard, can be pronounced unhealthy. It is inhabited "by a perfectly healthy and robust native population, free from all serious sickness, and living to a hale old age." He himself "lived in Larnaca, and went about the island winter and summer during nine years, and never enjoyed better health anywhere."—Mr. Edmund Gurney's article "Schumann on Music and Musicians," is very well worth reading. Mr. Gurney seems to us much more at his best and happiest as a musical critic than when contending in the philosophical field against Mr. Mallock.

Good Words is stronger than usual. In the second of his papers on "Erasmus and Sir Thomas More," Principal Tulloch, brief as his space is, succeeds in setting before his readers very clearly some of the leading opinions and literary characteristics of those two great lights of the "New Learning."—Principal Shairp's essay on "The Early Poetry of Scotland" is instructive and readable; and much praise is due to Major W. F. Butler's graphic description of the scenery of the Yosemite Valley, which is set off by an excellent illustration.

The Atlantic Monthly contains a poem by Whittier, whose verses, we believe, somehow continue to be little known in this country, and a paper on "American Finances from 1789 to 1835," which gives some curious information concerning the history of the beginnings of the United States' public debt.—Mr. T. S. Perry's article on some recently published French novels may also be mentioned as containing some good criticisms.

Of the University Magazine it is sufficient to say that we have an attempt—not very successful, to our thinking—to reply to Mr. Matthew Arnold's plea on behalf of a Roman Catholic University for Ireland; a continuation of Mr. W. H. Harrison's "Notes and Reminiscences;" and a brief paper, which may interest some readers, on "The Orbit of the Irregular."

CHAPTER V.—FINE ARTS.

Ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ πέλαγος τετραμμένος τοῦ καλοῦ.

WE are to devote the day to Fine Arts and to Lilly—Sir Peter Lely, as Charlie calls her; for she is such an artist, you know.

She does figures and faces, but trees are her forte. Poor darling! She is a martyr to her art here. The moment she takes out her sketch-book a policeman pounces on her as if she were a German spy.

Before we saw a single modern picture we were to "hang our garlands" (she is so romantic, you know) "on the altars of the Old Masters."

So we went to the Louvre.

Then Lilly's eyes were rivetted on the figure of a lady artist, with hair cut short like Rosa Bonheur, and a singularly dégagé dress.

She was the centre of a crowd of tourists marshalled by a guide. They leant their chins on her shoulders and jostled her elbows, and perhaps they rubbed their waistcoats against her brushes.

She was copying Vandyck's Charles I. They thought they had a perfect right to mob him.

"Oh that I were like her!" said Lilly. "Oh, that I could sit here all day long, and day after day, copying some stupendous gem!"

"I would sooner follow you to your grave, my dear," said papa.

"Never, Lilly," said I; "never could you bring yourself to cut off your plait."

She affirmed deliberately that she could.

We could say we had seen the Old Masters. It was time to go to the Exposition.

We went there on the back of a Hirondelle Parisienne (penny steamboat).

They might be CASTOR AND POLLUX.
And the two at the other end might be POLLUX AND CASTOR.

So like they are, no mortal
Could one from other know.

But the guide-book says they are "a Greek, a Roman, a Gaul, and an Arab, each checking a spirited horse."

When these worthies were fresh made—

White as snow their armour was,
Their steeds were white as snow.

But time had discoloured them with smoke and matter out of place, and, when we passed the bridge, tiny mortals had placed ladders against the spirited horses, and were scouring them and their masters.

The Duke of Wellington so admired these statues that he saved the bridge when the Prussians wanted to blow it up in 1814.

When we got to the German Fine Art Gallery papa said he didn't care to see any pictures but the English; he couldn't understand any others.

"As if," said Lilly, "each picture of every country did not tell its own tale, and the language of Art were not a universal one."

We scampered through the schools of Europe till we came to the British section. Then we sank panting on a couch.

A lady's bonnet jogged mine, as she tossed her head and said, "Il y a d'ouvrage qui est bien fait, mais ce n'est pas excellent."

On my word, I believe that most of the old women of Paris went to see our pictures, predetermined to think thus.

There was Fildes' "Homeless and Houseless."

The Frenchwomen were going past it, saying, "Oh, la la, la la; oh, lul li, lul li; oh, m'sieur, m'sieur; oh, madame, madame!"

There was Herkomer's "Last Muster."

French invalides were leaning on their sticks and crutches before it, their faces lit up with a fellow feeling wondrous kind, and curiosity to discover some old friend from the Crimea, or some older foe from Waterloo. There was——

"Why, hang it!" said papa, "I have seen all these before. Why didn't you tell me? Here, let's go to see the Dutch wax-work."

Tears came into Lilly's eyes when she heard this.

"Nothing," she sighed, "will make papa æsthetic. Never shall I instil into him the love of the Beautiful."

"My Beautiful," said mamma, "he loves you."

But he had his way; and we found that the mass of the people were of his way of thinking, for a great and excited crowd were squeezing past the dummies dressed in "Costumes Populaires du Pays-Bas."

So, I suppose in England, for every one person who goes to a private gallery for the sake of the pictures (l'Art pour l'Art), fifty go to Madame Tussaud's.

It was Nemesis that made Lilly take out her book to sketch the faces of the unæsthetic crowd.

"Non."

"Alors!" said he, posing tragically, and pointing with fell finger to the sketch; "déchirez devant moi cette feuille là."

And so before all the people, who thought her a criminal detected in the act, Lilly had to tear up the leaf she had filled with a jumble of faces.

Charlie waited till the Jack-in-office had turned away, then picked up the pieces.

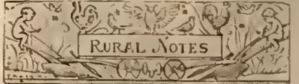
New Novels

"HOMO SUM," by Georg Ebers, author of "Uarda," &c., from the German, by Clara Bell (2 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.).—Though hardly any one but a learned archæologist such as the author could well have written this story, its interest, unlike that of "Uarda," is not in the main archæological, but purely human. Its scene is Mount Sinai, whose caves formed the abode of early Christian anchorites, not yet organised into any sort of regular monastic communities, and the oasis of Pharan which lies at its foot; and the period is the thirtieth year of the fourth century of our era. The outline of the situation which, we may say, forms the backbone of the tale is a narrative which Professor Ebers says he found in a monkish chronicle, telling how "an anchorite, falsely accused instead of another, takes his punishment of expulsion on himself without exculpating himself, and his innocence becomes known only through the confession of the real culprit." This narrative Professor Ebers has idealised and developed into a story of much force and interest, giving room for, at any rate, one fine and subtle study of character. The hero, Paulus, an anchorite of high saintly repute, to screen the youth, Hermas, whom he loves as a son, and who, he believes, has given good ground for the jealous anger of the Roman centurion, Phœbicius, declares that the monk's sheepskin, which the infuriated husband has found in his wife's apartments, is his; receives the blows he showers upon him without resistance; and submits to the sentence of expulsion from the Christian community pronounced against him by the Bishop Agapitus, without a word of self-defence. And then, after he has comforted himself by thinking that he is conformed somewhat more closely to the image of the Lord whom he serves, in that he has, though innocent, borne suffering and shame in the stead of another, he is cast down to the depths by a fierce outburst of the old Adam within him, which renders him, as far at least as thought and desire go, a prey to the beauty of the very Gaulish lady, Sirona, with whom he believes—quite wrongly, in fact—that Hermas has sinned. It is in the portrait of this Christian Paulus, in whom from time to time we see breaking out flashes of his old self, the heathen Menander, foremost in his day among the lawless viveurs of Alexandria, that the interest of the book lies, and, as we said, it is a portrait drawn with very great power; though there seem touches in it here and there, as there are still more in those of the subordinate characters, of a sentimentality quite modern—we were going to say, quite German—in character, and therefore quite out of keeping with the age delineated. We have not space to say more concerning the book, easy as it would be to dwell on many other points of excellence in it which seem to call for notice. But it is before all things else a picture of the struggles and sufferings of a soul—a soul which we feel is heroic in its way, though that way be not ours,—and it is as such that it possesses the highest claim to the reader's attention and regard.

"Cruel London," by Joseph Hatton (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—Mr. Hatton seems to us to show more and more the tendencies of that school of novelists—tendencies which we see, perhaps, manifested most conspicuously in Mr. Farjeon—to whom the example of Dickens has proved mischievous and misleading. Endeavouring to tread in the footsteps of the great genius he copies—for great genius Dickens certainly was, in spite of blemishes which a colder criticism is now recognising—Mr. Hatton is continually foundering on the rocks of overdone "geniality" and sensationalism. A certain coarseness and tawdriness more or less mar all his tales, and none of them more than this. "Cruel London" is clumsily constructed, with a view chiefly, it is clear, to startling "effects;" whilst the scene is overcrowded with characters, the bulk of whom seem rogues or villains of one kind or another—swindling "promoters" or hangers-on of public companies; bourgeois profligates, whose brutal vice is free from the faintest veneer of grace or polish; unprincipled adventurers of both sexes; quack doctors, et hoc genus omne. Foremost among the few honest men of the piece are the two friends, who discover, and so become proprietors of, a large gold region in the Sacramento country, and are thereby rendered, each of them, "rich as the richest of the Rothschilds." One of these, a man far gone in consumption, lavishes his vast wealth in buying up an army of spies and detectives, public and private, to hunt down every person, great or small, at whose hands his lady-love has suffered a wrong; in particular availing himself of the services of an obscure French doctor, who has made toxicology his special study, to poison the principal among these offenders, Tom Sleaford, the man who has betrayed and abandoned her, after a fashion so cold-blooded and horrible, that the reader's sympathy is almost roused for the wretched Tom, unredeemed cad and blackguard as he is. In fact, Mr. Hatton is evidently on an altogether wrong tack in this not over-pleasant tale, and fancies that he cannot fail to arouse and interest if he only lays on his colours thick and strong enough. There is no need to criticise details in such a work; but one point, unimportant as it is, we cannot pass over. We should have thought it impossible for any novelist, male or female, to represent the race for the Derby as run on a Tuesday.

"A Fallen Angel" (3 vols.: Tinsley).—The subject of this story may, of course, be guessed from the title, and we need hardly say that we hold the choice of such a subject a mistake. It is but fair, however, to add that the author has treated an objectionable theme in a manner as little open to objection morally as possible. But the truth is that the tale is too weak to be very dangerously wicked. The almost inconceivable folly displayed by the heroine in the earlier chapters hinders us from feeling much sympathy with her in her subsequent sorrows; but, again, it is but fair to say that in the end she is made to exhibit some dignity and force of character, and the closing scene, at any rate, is far more effective than could have been anticipated.

"The Gregors: a Cornish Story," by Jane Spettigue (Samuel Tinsley).—This is a tale of Cornwall in the old days when smuggling was one of the established industries of the county, when the calm of rural life was periodically disturbed by formidable riots or risings on the part of the miners, or "tinmen," as they were called, and when sheep-stealing was an offence punishable with death, which last-mentioned state of things gives rise to what is perhaps the most effective episode in the book. The story is told with considerable force and spirit, and its rough and homely dramatis personæ are decidedly life-like figures. Altogether it is a very creditable performance.



RURAL NOTES

THE HARVEST.——The past week has been one of the best that we have had for the ingathering of the grain. The fields, except in the far North, have been nearly cleared, and the undergrowth of clover and young grasses upon the stubbles is more luxuriant than we have seen them for many years. The cattle upon the purely pastoral districts seem to be thriving particularly well, and so also the sheep, noticeably in the radius of twenty miles of Lancaster, where the Royal Manchester and Liverpool and North Lancashire held their Show. It is quite evident, however, that the wheat will not be of such good quality, neither will it thresh out so well as many expected it would do, and barley will not possess that fine plumpness and colour that brewers appreciate. Turnips and mangolds will prove a fair crop, both being growthy and healthy. Potatoes lifted well in the early fields, and those still to be dug are looking well, and the tubers mostly free from disease in the North. Some blackened stalks are noticeable here and there in the Midland counties.

SELF-BINDING REAPERS.——Perhaps there was no greater misfortune that could have happened to these novel machines for cutting and binding grain than the trial accorded to them at the Royal Manchester Exhibition. The oats, on the cutting and binding of which they were to stand or fall, were of such a thin, short, weakly, and tangled character, that the manufacturers might well have hesitated to compete at all. The oats were bad enough in all conscience, but the multiplicity of weeds among them made the operation most unsatisfactory, and ruts, six inches deep, over which the reapers had to go, must have woefully tried the patience of the driver. The field also was covered with stones the size of one's head. None of the three machines—Wood's, M'Cormick's, or Osborne's—did good work in the binding, Wood's cut the cleanest, and M'Cormick's made the best sheaf, where all were bad, straggling, and the butt-ends mixed indiscriminately with the ears. But even in a good field of cereals we should fancy that there is some uniformity required to make a perfect self-binder, and even when it is made it may well be doubted whether they can be profitably used at the time when the corn is damp with dew. Heating and expensive overturning, deterioration generally, are likely to follow. The judges apparently did not regard them with much approbation, but in the way of encouragement gave Mr. W. A. Wood and Mr. M'Cormick each a silver medal.

MISCELLANEOUS.——There have been some good sales of shorthorns in the course of the fortnight, several of the animals going far into the hundreds, but none reached the thousand of guineas obtained last year.—The Board of Trade Returns just issued tell us that the cattle from abroad in the course of the month of August were 7,000 more than in the corresponding month of 1877, and the supplies in the eight months of the present year 133,432 to contrast with 95,925 in the past year. Still the prices per head of oxen were higher by 1*l.* 1*s.* up to the end of August, 22*l.* 8*s.* as against 21*l.* 7*s.* The total cost of foreign meat for the first two-thirds of the year was 12,725,639*l.*

SPORT AND TRAVEL IN PATAGONIA

PERHAPS less has been written about Patagonia than about any other unfrequented region, and, indeed, considering its uniform barrenness and inhospitable climate, it is not surprising that so few travellers have hitherto been tempted to explore it. What is known of it, although interesting from a geologist's point of view, is not of a nature to induce Europeans to settle there, and it is possible that for many centuries to come Patagonia will remain what it is at present: an uninhabited, desolate waste, where, by reason of the sterility of the soil and the scarcity of water during the greater part of the year, even the rudest attempt at agriculture must inevitably fail. Patagonia comprehends two regions, the mountain region and the plains. The former extends along the shores of the Pacific and the western portion of the Straits of Magellan, the latter occupies the eastern part of the country from 40° south latitude to the Straits. The plains rise one above the other, from east to west, like terraces, attaining an elevation at about a hundred miles from the shore of nearly a thousand feet. They are traversed by deep ravines or "cañons," in which the grass grows more abundantly, and where fresh water is frequently found. On the plains there is no vegetation, save a few straggling Berberis bushes, and here and there an isolated tuft of coarse grass.

The sketches accompanying this notice are from the portfolio of a recent traveller in Patagonia, Mr. Beerbohm, a narrative of whose experiences and adventures in that country is shortly to be published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus. No. 1 represents the camp of a tribe of Tehuelche Indians, the famous "giants" of Magellan and Byron. They have degenerated considerably in physique since the days of those navigators, however, for among a tribe of two or three hundred but very few can now be found whose height is over five feet ten inches or six feet (No. 7). On the average they are by no means an ill-favoured people; some among the women are quite handsome, and they have nearly all a good-humoured expression on their faces, which is very engaging, and makes up for any deficiency of feature. Their cheek-bones are prominent, the forehead low, the mouth large and full-lipped. Their hair, which is long and coarse, is kept from falling over their faces by a fillet. Their colour is a yellowish brown apparently, though it would be hard to pronounce with certainty on that subject, as their ablutions are neither frequent nor thorough. Their chief subsistence is the flesh of mares, ostriches, and guanacos. With the skins of the latter animal (No. 6), they make their tents, and their only garment, a long mantle gathered loosely round their bodies, and hanging from the shoulders to the ankles. They hunt the ostriches and guanacos with dogs of a mongrel greyhound species, and when at close quarters use the "bolas" (No. 2) with great effect and unerring certainty of aim. This implement consists of three stones covered with leather, and joined to a common centre by leather thongs. When the hunter is sufficiently near to the object of the chase, he swings the "bolas" two or three times round his head, and, the necessary momentum having been acquired, flings them with firm hand at the retreating quarry. Wherever they alight they become entangled and effectually "hobble" the guanaco or ostrich, who is thus rendered helpless, and is soon reached and despatched by the dogs or the hunter. The Tehuelches are by nature exceedingly intelligent and good-natured people, and invariably kind and hospitable towards strangers. Their numbers are unfortunately being rapidly reduced by internal feuds, and by their immoderate passion for "fire-water," which they obtain from traders from the colony of Sandy Point, in exchange for furs and ostrich feathers.

Nos. 3, 4, 5 are incidents of the journey during which these sketches were taken. No. 3 is descriptive of an unpleasant surprise which greeted the travellers on awakening one morning. The previous day had been unusually mild, and they had been indulging in the hope that spring had at last set in for good. During the night, however, there was a heavy snowfall, and they woke up to find the whole landscape whitened over. Everything, including their bedding, &c., was covered with a layer of snow six inches thick, and winter had evidently taken a fresh lease. No. 4, an attempt to swim over the river Gallegos, which on the melting of the snow in the Cordilleras became a broad and rapid torrent, and barred the onward progress of the travellers for more than thirty days. No. 5. The travellers have just arrived after a long day's ride, and having selected a bush suitable for camping under for the night, preparations for supper are hastily being made. One man is setting a side of guanaco to roast, and another is busy cutting certain tit-bits from a fine ostrich which had kindly presented itself to be caught just as the larder was getting low. This operation is being watched with eager interest by the dogs, who will doubtless receive their full share of the spoils. After supper and a pipe, each one looks out for his furs, and, rolling himself up in them, lays his head on his saddle, and, in spite of the cold wind and the hard ground, sleeps soundly till daybreak.

HIRING FAIRS

OF all the bad legacies left of a half-barbarous agricultural age, there are none so bad—not even the miserable hovels for rural labourers which morally still disfigure the landscape, albeit picturesque under the painter's pencil—as hiring markets, which are now in full swing over a large portion of the United Kingdom. It is pity, but 'tis true, that when a custom has become traditionary, it is one of the most difficult things in the world to get it abolished. No matter how much it may be opposed to social—and even in some cases individual—interests, people cling to it as tenaciously as if it were the essence of truth in principle, and of perfection in practice. The people of an old country like Great Britain are ever timid of change, and rash innovation in any matter is to be deplored; but at the same time there is much danger in absolutely standing still.

> Progress is Nature's universal law:
> Stagnation is a universal curse.

What we are too slow to recognise, especially those belonging to the agricultural interest, is that—

> And God fulfils Himself in many ways

We cannot or will not see that a custom admirably adapted to the condition of the people during the early period of our history is not only wholly unsuitable in a later era, but actually pernicious to the well-being of society. The hiring fair is the offspring of a primitive age; it has long ago served its purpose, and its influence now is decidedly a corrupting one, and the sooner it is done away with the better.

In England hiring markets, we know, originated in 1352. I cannot find out at what early period in the agricultural history of Scotland feeing fairs or trysts became permanent institutions. In the reign of Edward III. that human rinderpest, the Black Death, had slaughtered hundreds of thousands of our people. It was particularly severe upon those engaged in agricultural pursuits. A thinly-populated country as England then was could not sustain such loss of the sinews and strength of the community, without feeling it very heavily. The basis of society had been undermined by the plague, and the superstructure was threatening to tumble in consequence. The labour market had been well nigh emptied by that stern employer Death, whose bidding no one can resist; and those who escaped the plague naturally sought to obtain higher wages for their services. Such demands were too much for the then employers of labour, who regarded the labourers as indispensable machines merely, in no way entitled to take advantage of the commodities—bone and muscle—which they had to offer. They at once appealed to the King against the knaves, and he, nothing loth, sent "to the Rev. Father William, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of All England, greeting," informing him that, "Because a great portion of the people, especially workmen and servants, late died of the pestilence, many, seeing the necessity of masters and great scarcity of servants, will not serve unless they may receive excessive wages, and some rather willing to beg in idleness than by labour to get their living; we, considering the grievous incommodities which, of the lack especially of ploughmen and such labourers, may hereafter come, have, upon deliberation and treaty with the prelates and nobles and learned men assisting us of their mutual counsel, ordained certain statutes relating to labourers, providing, among other things, that "every person, able in body, under the age of sixty years, not having to live on, being required, shall be bound to serve him that doth require him, or else be committed to the jail until he find surety to serve." These statutes having failed in their object, more compulsory ones were enacted in the following year; the reason for them then being stated in the preamble:—"Forasmuch as it is given the King to understand in this present Parliament, by petition of the Commonalty that the said servants have no regard to the ordinance (that of 1349) but to their ease and singular covetise, do withdraw themselves to serve great men and others unless they have livery and wages to the double and treble of that they were wont to take, to the great damage of the great men, and the impoverishing of the commonalty, therefore,' &c. Among the et cetera of 1350 was one enacting that all ploughmen and agricultural labourers should be hired, not by the day, but for the full period of one year, "or other usual terms," and that such labourers "do openly carry in their hands to market towns their instruments of labour, and be there hired in a public place, and not privately.

To carry the instruments of labour themselves was no easy matter, and the difficulty being recognised by the authorities, it was permitted servants to wear emblems of their particular branch of employment in their hats, a practice which is continued in some parts of England to the present day. Then the horseman brought a piece of whipcord, the shepherd a bunch of wool, the cattleman a few hairs [illegible] the cow's tail, and so on. It is not at all improbable that the [illegible] which have now degenerated into apparently [illegible] matters of mere taste and fancy, were at first employed to set forth the occupation of the wearer.

In their origin these fairs were grossly unjust to servants and a vile outrage upon common laws, yet they undoubtedly proved of advantage afterwards in bringing masters and servants together from different parts of the country. Indeed, it is difficult to see what other means of communication could have been devised when the people were so few and so widely scattered. Still the tyrannical way in which the labourers were at first forced into the market made it little better than a slave-mart, to which the hiring market of the present day bears a striking resemblance in all but one essential particular, that the labourers have the right of selling themselves.

The writer has been present at many of these hiring fairs and markets in many parts of England and Scotland, and on all occasions has felt ashamed that such institutions could exist in an enlightened country like ours. A description of one may serve, all the general features being the same in England and Scotland. First, then, we have a large collection of [illegible] or "[illegible] stands," as they call them in Scotland, of itinerant caravans with wild beasts, play actors, equestrians, conjurors, photographic studios, stuffed horses of tremendous proportions, giants of marvellous size, and dwarfs of almost invisible dimensions. Then there are thieves, swindlers, and vagabonds from all the neighbouring large towns, with those who are confirmed vagrants, enticing the rustics to pick the pea from under the thimble, prick the loop in the garter, play at pitch and toss and nine-pins, and to ornament their gaudy waistcoats with "real gold watch-chains at the low price of old brass." These are the educational surroundings of the hiring market. Those who come to be hired or hire, men and women, stand out upon the street, as a rule, the females on one side, the men on the other, and the masters push out and in among them, inspecting their physical points much as they would do those of an ox or a sheep, for it is the bodily parts of the servants that alone can be recognised in the hiring market. There is neither time nor inclination on the part of most masters to inquire into the element of character. In the case of women more especially the fair seems a peculiarly demoralising institution. It is eminently calculated to destroy all sense of propriety and modesty on the part of young girls, and when these barriers to virtue are broken through, the worst degradation follows almost as a matter of course. At the fairs in Scotland particularly, women are engaged not by persons of their own sex, but by the opposite, who peer curiously into their faces, not always without a leer, and make remarks and jests which, to put them in as euphuistic a way as possible, are neither so refined nor so chaste as they might be. And the young women very soon learn to reply in the same strain; indeed, if they desire to make a good bargain so far as wages are concerned, they must do so, for those who can best return in kind the "chaff" generally receive the most money. Amid the noise of trumpets and gongs, the screeching of ballad singers, the jabber of caravan men, and the shouts of the gamblers is transacted the business which makes a man whom you never saw except at the fair, and about whose character you have no accurate information, the custodian of your horses or cattle for six months, and which brings a woman, of whom you know equally little that is trustworthy, into your house to mix with your family for a like period of time. In some places in Scotland old custom sanctioneth on hiring days the opening of unlicensed houses for the sale of pies and porter, and gives permission for dancing. From the excitement of the drink and the dancing what else could be predicted but the fighting which afterwards disgraces the streets, and the debauchery which swells the percentage of illegitimacy in the Registrar-General's returns? Within late years registry offices have done much to lessen the evils of the fairs by drafting away a portion of those who would otherwise have participated in them, but there still remains much to be done. The great drawback is [illegible] the servants themselves, who look upon these fairs as a privileged holiday, and imagine that the farmers seek their abolition merely that they may deprive them of their cherished holidays. Could they be disabused of this idea by farmers voluntarily conceding them a day or two in the year, perhaps their prejudice in favour of fairs would vanish, and these hotbeds of drunkenness and immorality be shortly improved off the face of the earth.

WEYMOUTH BAY

A summer day in Weymouth Bay,
  A sea that ripples lazily,
And prattles like a child at play
  Two voices talking merrily.

A sunny sky, while you and I
  Went paddling onward leisurely,
Like water lilies floating by.
  (That's quite a pretty simile!)

Who could delight to bark and bite,
  Or let their angry passions rise,
When earth and sky are both so bright,
  And brighter yet the summer [illegible].

With sails of snow went to and fro
  Like restless souls that seek [illegible]
The little [illegible]
  Old Ocean sang a song [illegible]

  To think that earth [illegible]
A little joke [illegible]
  Perhaps a little [illegible]

No lovers, no [illegible]
  Two happy souls [illegible]
We chat of [illegible] and [illegible],
  And tell the latest scraps of news.

Oh sweet and few, [illegible]
  The merry days of peace and [illegible]
Oh ancient fate [illegible]

A sunny day in Weymouth Bay,
And Jack [illegible] countries far away,

FOREIGN

THE CRISIS IN THE EAST.——The difficulties of carrying out the Treaty of Berlin do not seem to be diminishing, and another week has passed without any cessation of the Bosnian insurrection, notwithstanding all the skill and energy of the Austrian commanders, who now possess a formidable force of 200,000 men, and who have received large supplies of war material and ammunition. There has been brisk fighting on the Bosna, in north-eastern Bosnia, where General Szapary seem to be somewhat more successful, but in the north-west General Zach has received a severe check in attempting to take Bihacs, a fortified town of some importance, and once the reigning capital of Croatia. At first General Zach appeared to be succeeding, but on Monday he was driven back on Zavalje, with heavy loss. Farther south, however, the Austrians are doing somewhat better, and General Sametz has taken Kljuc, while Trebinje has now been peaceably occupied, thanks to the conduct of the Turkish garrison, who compelled the insurgents to leave the town, and then handed over the citadel to the Austrians. In western Bosnia also the Austrians have occupied Priedor, and the disarmament of Novi and the surrounding districts has been accomplished without resistance. At Svornik, a strongly fortified position, however, the insurgents number 5,000, between Bjelina and Graçanica they are reported to amount to 23,000 men, with forty guns, while what makes the matter all the more serious is that the insurgents are not merely untrained peasants, but in many cases are tried and disciplined soldiers, fighting under experienced commanders. Thus, while there is little doubt that General Philippovitch will eventually succeed in subduing the insurrection, it will cost him much time and valuable blood before he can announce to his Government and the world at large that the pacification of the provinces is an accomplished fact.

Bosnia and the Herzegovina, however, are not the only Turkish provinces which object to foreign occupation, and there is considerable agitation in Albania, a portion of which is to be annexed to Montenegro. Mehemet Ali Pasha, who had been despatched to the affected districts by the Porte with a view to pacifying the malcontents, has been assassinated at Jakova. On his arrival there he found the town in a state of anarchy, and he was violently upbraided by the inhabitants for having come to hand over the land to the enemy. A mob attacked his house, fired it with petroleum, and then ruthlessly murdered the unfortunate general. Mehemet Ali Pasha's loss will be severely felt by the Porte, as, although by birth a foreigner, he had throughout his life identified himself with the interests of his adopted country, to which during the recent war he had rendered most important services, while his conduct as a member of the Berlin Congress won the approbation even of Prince Bismarck, who, although from social reasons declining to receive him, did not hesitate to express his admiration of his talents. In addition to Albania, which promises to give the Porte considerable trouble, the Rhodope insurrection continues; but there is one satisfactory item of intelligence, namely, that Batoum has been finally surrendered to the Russians, who have occupied the town without the slightest opposition on the part of the Lazis, who, however, have mainly emigrated to Trebizond, where great distress is said to prevail. The evacuation of Erzeroum by the Russians is now speedily expected.

To turn to Constantinople and its diplomatists, the Austro-Hungarian Convention is yet unsigned, the chief bone of contention being a claim on the part of the Sultan that the Austrian and Turkish flags should be hoisted jointly over the Bosnian fortresses—a claim at first admitted and then repudiated by Count Andrassy. The Greek demands are also the subject of much discussion, the French ambassador has been strongly urging Safvet Pasha to carry out the "recommendations" of the Berlin Congress, while the Greek Government have despatched a Note to the Powers soliciting their mediation. In fact, great pressure is being put on the Porte to hasten its fulfilment of the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin, and the German Government has sent a despatch to the various signatory Powers, calling upon them to take a common step with the view of bringing the Porte to execute the Treaty without any further delay. This has been agreed to by France, Russia, and Austria, but England and Italy have not as yet answered.

In the mean time the Russians continue to evacuate the positions round Constantinople, and General Todleben is shortly expected to move his quarters to Adrianople. It is believed, however, that the evacuation cannot be completed before a fortnight more at least.—In CYPRUS a large number of the troops are still suffering from malarious fever, the 71st Regiment in Dali Valley have had a sudden increase of the malady, as also the 101st Regiment at Larnaca. Twenty-five per cent. of the Engineers are also on the sick list. Thirteen deaths have occurred since the landing. Sir Garnet Wolseley is making a tour round the island in H.M.S. Raleigh.

FRANCE.——A Conservative Committee of Senators and Deputies, with a view to securing joint action amongst the various shades of anti-Republican parties during the forthcoming senatorial elections, has at length been formed, and has issued a circular soliciting "co-operation and subscriptions" in order to maintain a Conservative majority in the Senate which will enable that body "to fulfil the part assigned it by the Constitution." It is too early yet to judge fairly of the prospects of the Committee, but as recent events have shown, and none more so than the enthusiasm displayed at the service in commemoration of M. Thiers' death, even the most timid provincials are beginning to cease feeling apprehension of the Republican form of Government, so that the task of the Committee is likely to be a difficult one, all the more so when the disjointed and heterogeneous nature of of the various parties forming the "Conservative" majority is taken into consideration. There is little further political news, and the chief topic of the week has been the inauguration of the Boulogne deep-sea harbour works (described in a special article in another column), and the Ministerial speeches thereat. The great question of how the necessary funds are to be raised for such stupendous public works as M. Freycinet proposes have excited considerable speculation and some apprehension, M. Léon Say's explanation that the money is to be furnished from the savings of the people not wholly meeting with approval. There is such a thing as overloading the willing horse, and of late years France has added so enormously to her National Debt as to render any further increase on a large scale a somewhat hazardous step. From Boulogne the two Ministers proceeded to Calais and inspected the site of the harbour extension improvements there, and then went on a similar mission to Dunkirk, which is the third northern port to be extended and improved.

In Paris the Radicals have been furious at the prohibition by the Government of a proposed International Working Men's Socialist Congress, and of the arrest of several of the delegates and members who had disregarded the Ministerial prohibition, and had attempted to hold a meeting in a private house. The members had relied upon a law which does not permit the police to violate a man's house during the night; but, nevertheless, the police made a descent upon the meeting, arrested six persons, and moreover paid a domiciliary visit to another of the members, and carried him off to prison. M. Louis Blanc and his Radical colleagues have written to the Ministers of the Interior and of Justice, protesting against the action of the police as illegal; but their advocacy will find but little sympathy, as the object of the meeting has been openly stated to have been the reconstruction of the well-known "Internationale," the revolutionary society which caused so much alarm during the Empire, and which was formally suppressed in France by a decree of the Assembly in 1872. M. Marcère, however, does not confine his attention to the Socialist peril, as he has also suppressed the Bonapartist almanac L'Aigle, a step which many people think imprudent and unnecessary. Another prolific topic of discussion has been the disgusting scenes attending the execution of the young men Barré and Lebiez, who murdered a milkwoman for the sake of her money. A most ribald and unruly crowd assembled to witness the horrible scene, and the most highly-coloured accounts of the whole proceedings and of the prisoners' last moments have been published at length in many of the journals. The scandal caused by the whole affair will probably lead to the abolition—as in England and Germany—of public executions; and M. Dufaure is already studying the subject with a view to reform. To turn to more pleasant subjects, the Exhibition continues to prosper, and the International Horse Show has been a very fair success, the Grand Duke Nicholas of Russia carrying off a first prize for his thoroughbred Arab charger Rustchuk. The défilé d'honneur of the prize winners took place on Sunday before the Marshal and the Russian Grand Dukes. Out of the 250 prizes 34 have fallen to English animals—a much larger proportion than that awarded to any other foreign nation, while many of the so-called foreign animals were of English blood. The distribution of the Exhibition prizes will take place on Oct. 21st, to which date the ceremony has been postponed in order to permit of the attendance of the Prince of Wales, who, in a letter to M. Berger, adds that the Princess may perhaps accompany him. Great fêtes will be given by the Marshal at Versailles on the occasion, which is to be made an improved second edition of the national festivities of last year. The Marshal also intends to hold a second grand review on the 15th inst.—There is little theatrical gossip beyond a three-act political comedy Le Mari d'Ida, by MM. Delacour and Mancel, at the Vaudeville, exceedingly successful, and a promised visit to England of the Comédie Française, of which the talented company have subscribed 50*l.* towards the Princess Alice Relief Fund.

GERMANY.——Dr. Nobiling, the would-be assassin of the Emperor, and who has long been lying in a precarious state owing to the wounds he had inflicted on himself on his attempt to commit suicide, died on Thursday. The immediate cause of death was paralysis of the lungs. The Emperor is going on exceedingly well, and will very possibly be present at the autumn manœuvres.

The German Parliament was opened on Monday afternoon, the chief portion of the speech relating to the attempt on the Emperor's life, and to the rejection of the Anti-Socialist Bill by the late Parliament. The speech then enlarges upon the dangers of Socialism, and the necessity for extraordinary measures for its prevention and "gradual extinction." The means to be chosen, however, "should preserve the liberty of the citizens of the State in general, and only prevent the abuse of them, by which the pernicious Socialist agitation threatens the foundations of the State and of all culture." In conclusion, a confident hope is expressed that the Deputies will not refuse to "grant the means of giving the peaceful development of the Empire the same security against attacks from within as it already enjoys from without, in order that, when the extinction of the pernicious movement has been checked among the masses, those who have been led astray may be brought back into the right path." The first sitting of the House was subsequently held, when Herr Bonin, the senior deputy, made a speech on the providential escape of the Emperor, and called for a "Hoch" in his honour, an appeal which was responded to with enthusiasm.

ITALY is still agitated with regard to the Treaty of Berlin and the Austrian occupation of Bosnia, although the Italia Irredenta party have greatly cooled down their diatribes. Still the general uneasiness is manifested by the numerous rumours and counter-rumours which are being daily published, while the close attention the Government and the King are paying to military affairs is pointed to as a not insignificant fact.

The disciples of Lazarretti are expecting his resurrection, as groups of them are constantly scattered about the cemetery of Santa Fiora, near Grosseto, expecting to see the prophet rise from his grave.—There is considerable excitement respecting the escape from a prison-van of three noted brigand chiefs—it is thought through the agency of the ever-present Mafia.

INDIA.——The reply of the Ameer of Afghanistan to the British request that Sir Neville Chamberlain's mission might be received at Cabul, is still awaited with great anxiety, and a telegram to The Times says that the fact is universally recognised that the present is one of the most critical epochs in the history of British India. There is a very strong feeling that Russian influence must be watched at all hazards, and the Times of India, in a leading article, remarks that it is to be hoped that Sir Neville Chamberlain will be armed with sufficient power to restore the prestige we have lost at Cabul. "If he merely goes into Afghanistan to exchange civil compliments, and to come back rebuffed, we shall be plunged before we know where we are into a new Afghan campaign. For it is clear that, with the Ameer's leave or without it, we cannot allow Russian outposts to be established upon our very frontier. As Lord Salisbury has said, 'British interests in Afghanistan exceed Russian interests.'" The demands to be made from the Ameer by the British envoy are exceedingly onerous. The several points upon which it will be necessary to lay the greatest stress will be permission to establish agents at Balkh, Herat, and other frontier towns, an understanding by the Ameer not to enter into any diplomatic relations with any other Power without the consent of the Indian Government, unrestricted access for the British Mission to Cabul when deemed necessary, and finally the dismissal of the Russian Mission, and the exclusion of Russian agents in future. Should the Ameer prove hopelessly estranged and hostile, immediate steps will be taken to neutralise the effects of that hostility.

UNITED STATES.——The yellow fever epidemic continues to increase and to spread, and up to the 6th inst. the official returns showed that there had been in New Orleans alone 4,609 cases and 1,395 deaths since the outbreak, while on Monday the deaths amounted to eighty-seven. At Memphis, however, they numbered 115 on Tuesday, and the number of sick in that town exceeds 3,000. Numerous physicians have fallen victims, 800 out of 1,000 nurses are ill, and the utmost distress is prevalent. All business is entirely stopped, and 90,000 people are without employment, and in a destitute condition. It is proposed to organise a national relief system to anticipate the famine, which it is believed will certainly follow the fever. The Governor of Ohio has proclaimed a day of prayer to avert the pestilence from that State.

THE COURT

THE Queen has been visiting the different places of interest round Balmoral. Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice have been to Loch Callater, and have driven round the Lion's Face, while on Saturday they went to Craig Daighu, on which a cairn has been erected to commemorate the recent purchase by the Queen of the Ballochbine Forest. On the same day Prince Leopold drove to the Linn of Dee, and in the evening Mr. Cross and the Rev. Donald M'Leod dined with Her Majesty. Next morning Divine Service was performed at Balmoral before the Queen, the Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, the Rev. Dr. Donald M'Leod officiating, and in the evening Dr. M'Leod and Mr. Cross again joined the Royal party at dinner.—On Tuesday the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne arrived at the Castle.—The Queen has sent 105*l.* to the Relief Fund for the sufferings by the Princess Alice collision.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have again left town, their guests, the Danish Royal Family, having started for the Continent. Before quitting London the Prince and Princess with their two boys, the King and Queen of Denmark, and the Princess Thyra went the round of the theatres, visiting the Princess's, the Haymarket, and the Promenade Concerts. On Monday the Prince of Wales left Marlborough House to stay with Mr. C. Sykes at Brantingham Thorpe, near Hull, for the Doncaster Races, and was present on the course during each of the four days' sport, leaving on Friday night for Scotland. The Princess with her three daughters accompanied the King and Queen of Denmark and Princess Thyra, who started on Monday night, crossed the Channel to Calais on their way to Brussels, where they spent part of Tuesday with the King and Queen of the Belgians, and visited the Exhibition of Fine Arts. The Royal party slept at Cologne, and went on next evening viâ Frankfort to Rumpenheim. The Princess of Wales and her little girls return home about Saturday next, and will join the Prince of Wales at Abergeldie for a month's stay. The Prince goes to Paris for the distribution of Exhibition prizes on October 21st, and will probably be accompanied by the Princess.—The Prince and Princess have promised to open the new buildings of the Hunstanton Convalescent Home, erected as a thank offering for the Prince of Wales' recovery.—The Prince and Princess have sent fifty guineas to the Princess Alice Relief Fund.—Princes Albert-Victor and George have gone back to their studies on board the Britannia at Dartmouth.

The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne returned to London from Germany on Saturday, and immediately on their arrival visited the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duchesses of Cambridge and Mecklenburg-Strelitz. On Monday night they started for Balmoral to stay with the Queen. The day of their departure for Canada has not yet been settled.—The Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse with their children have gone back to Germany. They travelled by Gravesend and Antwerp in the Victoria and Albert, and stayed a short time at Brussels.—The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold have been elected honorary members of the Grand Lodge of Scotland.—Prince William of Germany has gone to Scotland.—The Duke and Duchess of Teck are at Rumpenheim.

The parents of the Empress of Austria, Duke and Duchess Max of Bavaria, kept their golden wedding at Tegernsee on Monday, the Empress Elizabeth and four others of their eight children being with them. The Duke and Duchess are 70 years of age.

CHURCH NEWS

THE LOSS OF THE "PRINCESS ALICE."——At many churches in the metropolis, and at some places in the country, special reference was on Sunday last made to the dreadful collision which took place on the Thames on the previous Tuesday. In several instances thanksgiving was offered for safe deliverance, and in some, the prayers of the congregations were requested for the repose of the souls of the departed. The Rector of Woolwich, the Hon. and Rev. A. Anson, who had been engaged actively in the work at the scene of the catastrophe, preached from the text "In the midst of life we are in death." He said that without inquiring into the spiritual condition of the departed they would commit their bodies to the earth in the charitable spirit of the Church, which believed all things and hoped all things without presuming to judge of what man could not know. His concluding words were, "Let all inhabitants uncover their heads as the funerals pass through our streets, put up the shutters, hang out the signals of mourning and of woe, honour those scarred discoloured remains. Who knows how many of them were the caskets of souls that have already swept through the gates washed in the Blood of the Lamb? Who knows how many of them were of the blood royal of heaven?" At the Metropolitan Tabernacle, a special sermon was preached by Mr. Spurgeon from the 16th verse of the 18th Psalm. He remarked that five of the members of his Church had lost their lives, and that there was scarcely one of the brethren who had not lost some friend or intimate acquaintance. He did not believe that such calamities were sent as judgments, but they were permitted and controlled by an overruling Providence, and in much that seemed evil to man the hand of God might be traced. He did not understand or attempt to justify the ways of God, but he believed that they were all for the best. Neither would it be so great a gain to the men of God always to have their lives spared. They had to die some day, and they might as well die one day as another. There was very small choice, and probably a great deal less choice than some of them imagined.

VARIOUS.——On Monday the Bishop of Chester presided at a diocesan conference of the clergy and laity, held at Liverpool to give an opportunity to the American and Colonial Bishops of the Anglican communion who have been attending the Pan-Anglican Synod at Lambeth to afford some information to English Churchmen on the missionary work abroad. The chairman delivered an address, reviewing the progress of missionary work from the formation of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in 1701.—The Bishop of Bangor, in his seventh Triennial Charge delivered at Llangefni church on Tuesday, said that greater attention ought to be paid to the religious teaching of the young to counteract the secular education given in Board schools, to the preparation of candidates for Confirmation, and to the maintenance of a closer spiritual communication and intercourse between the pastor and the adult members of his flock.—The Sunday School Union, the Church of England Sunday School Institute, the Ragged School Union, and the Wesleyan Sunday School Union have unanimously resolved to appoint Sunday and Monday, Oct. 20 and 21, as days for special and universal prayer on behalf of Sunday Schools throughout the world.—The Rev. Brooke Lambert has resigned the vicarage of Tamworth. Though the value of the living is very small (only 135*l.*) the position is important; the population being about 8,000, and the parish church—a very fine one—having accommodation for more than 1,300 worshippers. In an address to his parishioners, Mr. Lambert explains that family circumstances have involved a lessening of his income, and increased responsibility; and, after having reviewed his position and prospects in the Church, he contemplates for the present resigning active work as a clergyman, and devoting himself to such occupations as are consistent with his view of the profession, whilst they will not tie him to an unremunerative occupation, at a time when calls are likely to be made on him which he cannot otherwise satisfy.

THE ROYAL ALBERT ORPHAN ASYLUM, Collingwood Court, near Bagshot, Surrey, now containing 200 destitute children, makes a special appeal to clear off a debt of 3,000*l.* due for the maintenance of the inmates. The Institution was established in 1864 to give orphans a plain useful education, girls being trained as servants and boys being brought up to various trades, and since the commencement 600 poor families have been relieved. The Asylum is established on the non-canvassing system so as to receive the most deserving cases of such children as are too respectable to associate with the classes generally found in Refuges, and yet cannot get into Orphan Asylums, where canvassing is a special feature. Contributions to be sent to the Treasurer, S. Hoare, Esq.; W. Morley, Esq., Chairman; or to the Secretary, W. Worrell, at 18, Newgate Street, E.C.

THE TRADES UNIONS' CONGRESS.——Nearly 150 delegates attended the eleventh annual congress of trades unions, which was opened at Bristol on Monday under the presidency of Mr. A. W. Bayley, of Liverpool, against whom two delegates protested on the ground that he had issued an address containing remarks detrimental to trades-unionism. After some discussion, however, it was agreed that "internal dissensions" should not be debated in public, and Mr. Bayley proceeded to deliver his address, in the course of which he said that he had every hope that trades unions would prove as useful in the future as they had been in the past. During the past year they had sustained defeats, but had not been demoralised, and though the employers had now a strong federation, the workmen would extend their lines, and soon have a stronger one. The Report referred at length to all the measures bearing upon the labour question which were introduced into Parliament last Session, expressing pleasure that the Employers' Liability for Injury Bill had made so much progress in public esteem and confidence, and believing that great advantages would result from the operation of the new Factory Act. The Committee attributed the universal depression of trade to reckless speculation and the Eastern Question, but hoped for a revival of trade next spring. Alluding to the triumph of the employers in Manchester and London, the Committee urged unionists to place their societies on the soundest foundations; and with regard to the Lancashire riots, it was urged no member of the union had participated in them, and that the leading unionists did all in their power to preserve order. In the evening a public meeting was held to protest against the foreign sugar bounty system. On Tuesday a Mr. Kelly, of Bristol, attempted to address the congress on behalf of the unskilled labourers, but was ruled out of order, as his credentials as a delegate had not been examined. The principal business of the day was the discussion and adoption of the Parliamentary Committee's report. Mr. Macdonald, M.P., spoke in defence of the Compensation for Injuries Bill, and also condemned the isolated action of the railway servants in trying for a Bill of their own. On Wednesday Mr. John Morley read an address on "Over-Production," which was ordered to be printed for circulation, the author receiving a vote of thanks. In the evening the delegates were entertained at dinner by the Bristol Trade Council.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——There is no denying the fact that the Doncaster Meeting has been a little but flat; the fields have ruled meagre, notwithstanding the abnormally wet summer has kept more horses on their legs than is usually the case, and the general racing afforded but little genuine excitement. The weather, however, was delightful, as indeed it usually is during the first fortnight or so of September, and so after all those who "assisted" in the sport on the famous Town Moor had little to complain of. The Doncaster week is certainly one of the most enjoyable of the whole turf season; and on the present occasion what was lacking in racing was atoned for in a great measure by an unusual gathering of Turf notabilities and of county families, and by the presence of the Prince of Wales, who was a guest of Mr. Christopher Sykes, M.P., of Brantinghamthorpe. The opening day was specially uninteresting from a racing point of view, the walk over by Ecossais for the Fitzwilliam Stakes being a bad augury, as were also the Filly Stakes and the Doncaster Plate which followed it, each producing only two runners. The Great Yorkshire Handicap, which each year seems to show increasing signs of weakness, could only muster eight to the post, and of these Rylstone and Jagellon were, perhaps, rightly enough elected favourites, though the recent performances of Flotsam were somewhat unaccountably overlooked. However, Lord Zetland's horse won easily enough, and a good "Yorkshire roar" greeted the success of the popular Aske spots. Cleopatra, who seems to have been running about four days a week for some time past, and scoring not a few victories, was a little less fancied than Unicorn in the Match, but she beat him without much exertion. The Champagne Stakes, like the Great Yorkshire Handicap, is but a shadow of its former self among two-year-old contests, and before long it is probable that it will cease to indicate likely winners of any great future events. Five was a wretched field to show for it; but the winner, Lord Falmouth's Charibert, is a nice colt, and likely to do good service for the Heath House stable. Count Lagrange's unfortunate Rayon d'Or had to put up with second place. There was some improvement in the sport of Wednesday, independently of the St. Leger contest. Lord Hartington's smart filly Witchery, whose form at the Epsom Spring Meeting backers seemed to have forgotten, took the Bradgate Park Stakes, the favourite and unhappily-named Dresden China finishing third. Old and evergreen Ecossais beat eight others in a common canter for the Rufford Abbey Stakes, carrying the steadying weight of 9st. 10lbs., Chevron "the fractious" running second. After this the St. Leger came on for decision. The speculation on this race for some weeks past has been very fluctuating, Beauclerc, Insulaire, Jannette, and Childeric in turn holding the position of first favourite. The mishap of the first-named, however caused his deposition, and it was hope against hope to expect that he would be sufficiently prepared to show in his best colours at Doncaster. There were fifteen starters, one more than last year, and Jannette at 5 to 2 maintained the position she had held in the market for some days. Insulaire was next in demand, and after him Childeric; Red Archer, Beauclerc, Clocher, and Master Kildare standing next at 12 to 1. Potentate and Boniface made the greater part of the running to the Rifle Butts, where they retired, and then Childeric and Master Kildare became prominent, with Jannette lying in a good position behind them. Immediately, however, Archer called on the filly the race was over, as she came in an easy winner by four lengths, Childeric being second, and Master Kildare third. Thus Lord Falmouth has to be credited with the unprecedented good fortune of having the two first horses in the Leger for two years in succession. Last year his colt Silvio was first and the filly Lady Golightly second, but on this occasion the filly was victorious, making the sixth Oaks winner who has taken the Doncaster prize in the last twelve years, thus again illustrating the old saying that September is the "mare's month." The victory of Lord Falmouth was most popular, as he is indeed one of the pillars of the Turf, breeding most of his horses, and racing for the pure love of sport.

CRICKET.——The magnificent weather of late seems to have given new hope to the game.—The Australians are finishing up their visit with most brilliant play. They have beaten Gloucestershire at Clifton with ten wickets to spare, and got much the best of a crack Eleven of Gentlemen at Scarborough. At the time of writing they are playing a very strong team of professionals at Prince's, with every prospect of again showing their superiority.—Yorkshire has beaten I Zingari at Scarborough by nine wickets, and drawn the match with the M.C.C. when they had four wickets standing to get 25 runs to win.

AQUATICS.——The Sportsman's Challenge Cup will be contested on the Thames on Monday and Tuesday next, for which Higgins, notwithstanding his recent defeat, is favourite.

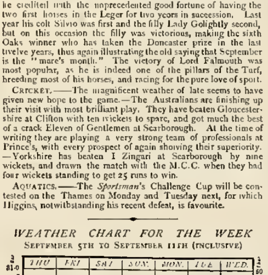
SEPTEMBER 5TH TO SEPTEMBER 11TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather of this week has presented a marked contrast to that experienced in August, the days having been (with the exception of Thursday, the 5th instant, and Sunday, the 8th instant) fine and dry. Friday (6th), Saturday (7th) and Monday (9th) were cloudy, but Tuesday (10th) and Wednesday (11th) were exceedingly fine, with a great range of temperature and south-westerly breezes. The barometer was highest (30.27 inches) on Wednesday, 11th instant; lowest (30.00 inches) on Thursday, 5th instant; range, 0·27 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (75°) on Saturday and Wednesday, 7th and 11th; lowest (47°) on Wednesday morning, 11th instant. Range 28°. Rainfall: Only 0·06 inches, on two days. Thursday morning, 12th instant, opened fine and bright; but the barometer had a tendency to fall somewhat.

THEATRES

A NEW drama, entitled The Barricade, produced at the DUKE'S Theatre (late the Holborn) on Saturday last, is a dramatic version of M. Victor Hugo's famous romance, "Les Misérables," which has been performed with success in provincial theatres. As a literary work The Barricade has few claims to attention. It is in the strictest sense of the term a melodrama, in which the finer shades of M. Hugo's wonderful story and the subtle and delicate touches of character in which it abounds are almost entirely lost under the efforts of the playwright to produce startling and picturesque effects. Those, however, who have a robust appetite for amusements of the stage, and are disposed to regard familiar melodramatic arts and devices with an indulgent eye, will find in this piece sufficient entertainment. The play is tolerably well acted, and Mr. Holt's performance of the part of Valjean has at least the merits of force and picturesqueness. The interest of the play, however, would have been greater if the story had been concentrated upon the history of Valjean, Cosette, and Marius, for audiences do not as a rule take kindly to a second generation of characters. Under the new management of Messrs. Holt and Wilmot the Duke's Theatre will become a house devoted to romantic drama, at prices somewhat lower than those of other houses—suburban theatres excepted. With these objects in view stalls have been suppressed, and the pit has been enlarged in a corresponding degree. That there is a demand for popular dramatic entertainments of this kind at moderate prices has been abundantly shown; and the enterprise of the new management is marked by a degree of spirit which justifies us in hoping that it will command success.

Mr. Byron will reappear at the HAYMARKET Theatre (after a long absence from the London stage) on Monday next in an original comedy-drama of which he is the author, entitled Conscience Money. The piece is in three acts.—The popular melodrama, the Two Orphans, will be revived at the OLYMPIC on the 23rd inst., with new scenery and decorations.—The COURT Theatre will reopen this evening for a short season under the management of Mr. W. H. Stephens. A drama entitled Marie, the Pearl of Savoy, will be produced on the occasion.—The FOLLY Theatre will reopen under the management of Miss Lydia Thompson on next Saturday.—A special performance in aid of the funds of the Hospital for Sick Children will be given to-day at the GAIETY. It is announced that the whole Gaiety company, including the band, the workpeople, and the Dampier Family, will give their services gratuitously on behalf of this excellent institution.

LEGAL

UNEQUAL JUSTICE.——It is to be hoped that when the proposed revision of the Criminal Code is brought before Parliament, some effort will be made to render impossible the passing of such outrageously disproportionate sentences as now from time to time arouse the surprise and indignation of the public. Last week, at Cork, Chief Justice May sentenced a brutal fellow to one week's imprisonment for beating his pregnant wife in such a way that she died of her injuries; whilst, on the other hand, we have Lord Craighill, a Scotch judge, sentencing to death a woman who in a fit of drunken fury had stabbed her husband. The contrast seems all the greater when we take into consideration that the wife-murderer expressed a hope that his victim would not recover, whilst the woman's conduct subsequent to her crime has been indicative of the deepest contrition.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——The Poet Laureate has obtained an injunction, restraining a newspaper proprietor from publishing one of his early poems, entitled "Confessions of a Sensitive Mind."—Mr. Thomas William Saunders, the Recorder of Bath, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Knox as magistrate at the Marlborough Police Court.—The Treasury have granted 50*l.* compensation to Mrs. Chalkley, the mother of the young man who, some months ago, fell over a hoarding in the Farringdon Road, and was subsequently arrested by the police on suspicion of being concerned in a burglary in the City Road, and whose death was caused by his removal from the hospital to a police cell.—A contemporary states that the governor of a Yorkshire gaol has just received from the Home Office a singular document informing him that "any relation of a condemned prisoner who shall be furnished with an order from a member of the Visiting Committee will be permitted to be present at his execution."—On Saturday a young man branded "B. C." was arrested at Kilrush on a charge of obtaining money under false pretences. Papers of a compromising nature were found upon him, and it is stated that he will now be charged with murdering the late Lord Leitrim. One of the papers has been forwarded to Dublin Castle to be transcribed. It is believed to be in Gaelic. The prisoner said it was in Sanscrit, and of no use to anybody.—Mr. Dennison, the man at whose house in Birmingham the recent calamitous fire took place, is in custody charged with the wilful murder of the four persons whose deaths resulted from the fire, it being stated that he set fire to the building. The coroner's warrant was issued for his arrest, but he surrendered to the police, who, on Tuesday, declined to produce him, and the inquest was adjourned with the intention of compelling them to do so.—The confession made by a pauper woman at Bedwellty, to the effect that many years since she had murdered three of her children, is supposed to be without foundation, as two of the children alleged to have been poisoned in their infancy are still living. The woman, who is probably insane, made the confession to the master and the medical officer of the union, and subsequently in writing to the police.—At Dublin a woman has been committed for trial for causing the death of her husband by setting a bulldog to worry him.—Some weeks ago, when a young rifleman in firing at a burglar accidentally killed his own mother, we pointed out the need of some regulation forbidding volunteers to keep their weapons loaded. Another shocking affair which has just occurred at Glasgow would seem to indicate the wisdom of forbidding them to have ammunition in their possession except when on duty. On Saturday a member of the 31st Lanarkshire Rifle Corps went home drunk and quarrelled with his wife, who to escape his violence jumped out of the window. This exasperated the man, who twice fired his rifle amongst the crowd which had gathered outside the house, and killed a young woman who was standing by. He was arrested just as he had armed himself with a knife.—Last week a man, who was shot a few weeks ago whilst committing a burglary at Leytonstone, made his escape from the London Hospital, contriving to get clear out of the building and over the railings, although a policeman was on duty at his bedside.—The other day, at the Marlborough Police Court, a month's hard labour was allotted to a woman for committing a violent assault. The virago, while being taken from the Court, seized a handful of red-hot coke from a plumber's stove and tried to throw it in the gaoler's face, and afterwards tried to strike him with a tin can which she caught up. Failing in this, she spat upon him several times, and threatened to rip him up. For this ebullition of temper she will have to perform an additional month's hard labour.—A woman employed at the Glasgow Royal Infirmary has had to pay 5*l.* damages for having taken a piece of flesh from the arm of a boy eight years of age in order to heal the arm of another juvenile patient. The parents sued the doctor also, but the case against him was held to be "not proven."—Two lads aged eleven years the other day placed a piece of iron on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway near Wigan; but fortunately they were seen to do so, and the obstacle was promptly removed, otherwise the consequences would probably have been dreadful, as there is a steep embankment on each side at the spot. The boys have been sent to prison for three days, and are also to be flogged.—On Monday night a drunken man got over the parapet of London Bridge, declaring that he would commit suicide, as he had lost his wife and two children by the sinking of the Princess Alice. He was rescued and taken into custody, and it afterwards appeared that his wife was alive, and that they had no children. His excuse was that he had been drinking with a friend who had lost both wife and children, and "the story had got into his head." Sir T. Dakin remanded him to Newgate that he might be kept sober at least for a few days.—On Friday last a Presbyterian chapel at Kentish Town was broken into by six boys, who drank the unfermented wine, maliciously destroyed a quantity of furniture, and carried off the contents of the collecting boxes. The sacrilegious young

MR. GEORGE PAYNE

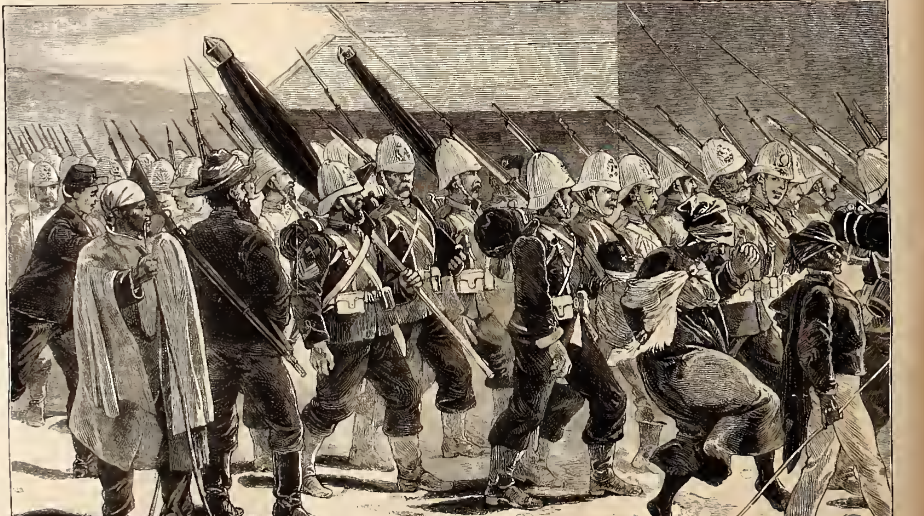
The subject of our memoir, the son of Mr. George Payne, of Sulhy Hall, Northampton, was born April 3rd, 1803, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. He lost his father at an early age, and on attaining his majority became one of the largest landowners in Northampton. For more than fifty years Mr. Payne was a zealous patron and supporter of the Turf, but he was anything but a fortunate man, never having won the Derby or any great race. His nearest approach to success was in 1840, when he was the owner of Welfare, which ran second to Lord George Bentinck's Crucifix for the Oaks. Although ardently devoted to betting, no suspicion of unfair dealing ever attached to his name, he never gave his jockey orders to "stop" a horse, or ran one for the purpose of "getting the weight off," tricks which some of his survivors are not above perpetrating. In his earlier days Mr. Payne was one of the boldest and best performers in the hunting field, and he was for many years master of the Pytchley hounds, from the management of which he retired with general regret. He was also a good shot, but next to racing he cared most for whist, a game of which he was for long regarded as the most authoritative exponent. Nearly all his last twenty winters were passed at Nice, where he formed one of a little party of Englishmen. He was attacked with paralysis on August 10th, and died September 2nd, at his house in Berkeley Square, thus surviving his old friend Admiral Rons little more than twelve months. "Mr. Payne," says The Times, "was endowed with a great charm of manner and vivacity, was highly popular in society, and especially among children, had a considerable knowledge of business, and being naturally eloquent might have made his mark in Parliament, if he had chosen at any time to be returned for Northamptonshire."—Our portrait is from a photograph by T. Fall, 9 and 10, Baker Street, W.

CARDINAL FRANCHI

By the death of Cardinal Franchi, the Pontifical Prime Minister, which took place on July 31st, Pope Leo XIII. lost a dearly-loved friend, as well as an able and wise counsellor. They had been close friends from youth, they had agreed, on the death of Pius IX., to unite their influence in favour of Riario-Sforza, and when the late Conclave met, Riario-Sforza having died meanwhile, Franchi besought his friends, instead of voting for himself, to transfer their votes and influence to Cardinal Pecci. Alexander Franchi was born at Rome, June 25th, 1819, and having greatly distinguished himself in the Roman Seminary, was soon advanced to important official posts. In 1852 he was sent as Chargé d'Affaires to Spain, where he made himself a general favourite, and showed much diplomatic skill in his treatment of the difficult question of the Concordat. He was equally successful when sent to Constantinople, in 1871, to settle the Armenian difficulty with Abdul Aziz. In 1873 he was made Cardinal, in 1874 Prefect of the Propaganda, and on the 5th March last he received from the hands of his old and faithful friend, Joachim Pecci, the highest dignity in the career of ecclesiastical diplomacy to which he had devoted himself,—that of Pontifical Secretary of State. He found the department in a state of great confusion, and worked with such unceasing zeal as to injure his health, and bring on the illness which caused his premature death. In temperament Cardinal Franchi somewhat resembled the late Lord Palmerston, combining powers of hard work with great animal spirits and joviality. In discussion he was always cool and polite; in diplomacy he was frank; he had no petty, intriguing spirit, and he was most generous both of his money and his time.

CARDINAL NINA

Lorenzo Nina, who has been appointed by the Pope to succeed to Cardinal Franchi's responsible office, was born near Ancona May 12th, 1812. He belongs to a middle-class family, his father, like Franchi's, being a notary. After being educated in his native town, he took his Doctor's degree in theology and law at the University of Rome. In 1835 he was ordained, and from that time followed the regular course of the Curial Prelature, rising rapidly and steadily, confining himself chiefly to the study of the Canon law. He was employed by Pius IX. in many delicate matters requiring ability and judgment, and acquitted himself so satisfactorily that he was named Assessor of the Holy Office. He was numbered among the domestic prelates of Pius IX., and on March 12, 1877, he was made a Cardinal. He is tall, handsome, and of somewhat florid complexion. In manner he is courteous and unaffected, mild in disposition, frank in speech, loyal in his actions, and through his distinguished career in the Curia he has gained considerable authority in the Sacred College.—Our portraits of the two Cardinals are from photographs by J. Eastham, 2, Devonshire Street, Higher Broughton, Manchester.



THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA—TROOPS FROM KING WILLIAMSTOWN MARCHING TO NATAL

thieves are all in custody.—At the Middlesex Sessions, on Tuesday, a man, who for fourteen years has been known to the police as a trainer of young thieves, was condemned to ten years' penal servitude for "receiving" a stolen watch. He seemed surprised at the sentence, and screamed loudly when it was delivered.—A ruffianly assault was the other day committed by two drunken fellows, who after riding some distance upon a tram-car, refused to pay their fares, and tried to throw the conductor from the roof of the vehicle, and would have done so but for the interference of the other passengers. They were each sentenced to two months' hard labour.—A warehouseman at Bristol has been fined 497*l.* for being found in possession of nearly 500 lbs. of smuggled tobacco, and another dealer at Cardiff has been amerced in 100*l.* for a like offence.—The Kilburn authorities have been greatly troubled of late by the vagaries of a hawker who calls himself the "King of all the Cheap Jacks," and who having pitched his caravan on some waste land declines to move on. It appears that he drives a roaring trade, attracting crowds of customers by a gratuitous distribution of gin and tobacco, and the noise is a great nuisance to some of the inhabitants. Others, however, to the number of five hundred, have signed a memorial declaring that his business and conduct are not objectionable, and a summons which has been issued against him has been adjourned in order to give him time to go elsewhere.—On Sunday night last, at Ballymacmorris, near Killbeggan, a number of men broke into a farmhouse. They forced the farmer on his knees, and after covering his eyes with a handkerchief, searched the place for firearms, but failing in the object of their visit the gang robbed the unfortunate farmer and decamped. Two little boys who had hidden themselves under a table recognised six of the offenders, who have been arrested.—A singular accident is reported from Preston. On Monday night a little boy, dreaming that burglars were in the house, got up and jumped from a window into the yard. His fall was broken by a clothes'-line, and he was not much hurt, but his parents, who were aroused by his screams, had some difficulty in convincing him that the dream was not a reality.—On Tuesday the Rev. J. T. Waller was lecturing at Limerick on behalf of the Church Mission to Roman Catholics, when the lecture room was besieged by a crowd whose violence was so great that the meeting was hurriedly dissolved. A brick thrown by one of the mob struck Mr. Waller on the head, and he was with difficulty rescued by a party of police.

MARRIAGE.

HEROES OF BRITAIN
IN PEACE AND WAR.
PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

"BRITAIN'S HEROES IN PEACE AND WAR" will be descriptive of GOOD and HEROIC WORK done by our countrymen at home and abroad. It will embrace an account of the struggles, the disappointments, and the failure or victory of the illustrious and noble sons of Great Britain and Ireland whose lives have been devoted to the good of others, and whose deeds are held in universal honour."

On Sept. 25 will be published

HEROES OF BRITAIN
IN PEACE AND WAR.

Amongst those whose careers will be traced in the work may be mentioned—HEROES OF THE FAITH, who have been ready to sacrifice all things in the interest of religious truth; PHILANTHROPIC HEROES, who have striven to relieve affliction and misery; CONSCIENTIOUS HEROES, who have suffered for conscience sake; PATRIOTIC HEROES, whose gallant deeds have exalted our country's fame; EVERY-DAY HEROES, who distinguish themselves by heroism in their daily calling; and SCIENTIFIC HEROES, whose lives have been devoted to the advancement of the various branches of science.

THE ABERCARNE COLLIERY DISASTER—SCENE AT THE PIT-MOUTH IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE EXPLOSION

Imperial Sentiment.——It is a long time since any Colonial Governor has attracted so much attention as Lord Dufferin, who has now said good-bye to Canada. Every important speech he has delivered has been read at home; and probably he has been the subject of more leading articles in the London papers than all other existing Colonial Governors put together. His popularity is partly due to the tact and judgment with which he has discharged his duties, partly also to the liveliness and grace of his public utterances. It has, however, another cause; and that is the thoroughly Imperial feeling with which he is imbued. He evidently takes pride in the grandeur of the English Empire, and there can be no doubt that he has succeeded in diffusing through Canadian society a good deal of his own patriotic sentiment. It is curious, when we look back a few years, to realise the importance which is now attached to this Imperial feeling by the English people. When Mr. Gladstone was in power, it was the fashion to talk of the Colonies as rather a burden than as a source of honour. They were constantly snubbed, and if they did not understand that we should be very glad to get rid of them, that was no fault of the leading British statesmen. Now Englishmen of all classes are fond of dwelling upon the splendour of the Empire they have inherited; and any politician who hinted at the propriety of giving up a foot of territory of which we have possessed ourselves would find that he had slight chances of rising to power. The Tories have completely identified themselves with this powerful movement, and it is possible that they may for many a day secure indemnity for mistakes in their management of home affairs by pointing to their endeavours for upholding and extending the Empire. Mr. Forster is the only prominent Liberal who has ever shown that his imagination is touched by the magnificent destinies of his country. If his party are to compete on equal terms with their rivals, they must in this respect be dominated more and more by his spirit.

Cotton Factories and Cotton Workers.——As a rule, when an interest is flourishing, the public don't hear much about it. Men make money, as bees make honey, quietly. But when hard times come there is much stir and talk, just as a mighty buzzing arises among the bees if a wasp gets into the hive. The wasp which at the present time is vexing the Lancashire beehives is known by the name of over-production. Thirty years ago it was more concisely styled a "glut." There is something very sad in the contemplation of the ideas suggested by this little word. In these days of swift and easy intercourse there can be no such thing as a really genuine glut. In the United Kingdom alone there are hundreds of thousands of people who would be only too glad to have new shirts and shifts for their backs, and new sheets for their beds, if—ah! there it is that the pinch comes—if they could but afford to pay for them. Hence general thrift and temperance would do much for Lancashire industry—far more than the foolish short-time panacea—because those virtues would save for the purpose of buying cotton goods thousands of pounds which are now muddled away in strong drink. But, as our countrymen are not likely to become suddenly thrifty, and as meanwhile foreigners are busy spinning and weaving as they never spun and wove before, it seems pretty clear that, as regards existing requirements, Lancashire has more spindles and looms than are wanted. Instead of working a hundred mills at short time, it would be better to shut up five-and-twenty, and work the remainder at full time, so as to keep the "dead" expenses down to the lowest level possible. The New England cotton factories, whose brightness and cleanliness, owing to climate, water-power, and anthracite coal, Old England cannot but envy—are, in spite of hard times, running full time, but then their workmen are content to receive proportionately lower wages than are current here, and they have also, thanks to Protection, the monopoly of their own market. Nor does there seem to be any tendency towards short time in the newly-established Indian factories, where the greedy millowners (unfettered at present by any Ten Hours' Act), work women and even tender little children thirteen or fourteen hours a day. It seems plain to us that if, while their foreign competitors are everywhere working full time, Lancashire operatives insist on working short time (thereby enhancing the cost of production) they will find themselves beaten out of the market by their rivals.

Greece and the Treaty of Berlin.——A great outcry is being raised against the Powers, and against England in particular, for not bringing pressure to bear upon the Porte on behalf of Greece. It is difficult to see, however, on what grounds the Powers could formally intervene. The Congress did not positively stipulate, as in the case of Servia and Montenegro, that Greece should receive an accession of territory; the Porte was merely advised to give moderate satisfaction to her wishes. If the Sultan chooses to disregard this counsel, no Government has a right to blame him; Europe can at best only point out to him the imprudence of opposing her deliberate will. So far as this, it seems to us, the British Government might safely go, and ought to go. It is quite natural that Turkey should hesitate about giving away any of her territory; but in the present instance it would be for her own interest to make the slight concession that is urged upon her. The Mahomedans of the district are said to be quite willing to accept Hellenic rule, and if the discontented Greek population were got rid of, the Porte would have all the more energy to look after its vitally important dominions. As for us, we are morally, although not legally, committed to the support of the Greek cause, interpreted in a fair and rational sense. We secured a hearing for the Greeks at the Congress, and our Plenipotentiaries were responsible for the proposal which has since occasioned so much discussion. To desert Greece now, therefore, would be to make her our permanent enemy; and this would be, for our own sakes, singularly unwise. All the world knows that although peace has been nominally restored the Eastern problem has by no means been solved. Russia will in due time renew her intrigues, and strain every nerve to make herself mistress of Constantinople. If England acts as the friend of the Greeks, she will always be able to prevent them from associating themselves with the Northern despot; but should she deceive them, or lead them to suppose that they are deceived, she will inevitably throw them into the arms of her rival. Besides, we must take into account the possibility that Turkey, through internal disorganisation, will fall into ruins. In that case Greece must play a great part in the East; and we shall be forced to encourage her development by every means in our power. Of course, at such a time as this, the Sultan may doggedly reject our suggestions; but the English Government can, at any rate, do no harm by firmly indicating to him the course which commends itself to the British people.

Native Indian Princes and their Armies.——In a certain sense we are the masters of India, but at the same time a glance at a map of the peninsula will show that our mastery is by no means complete. The "thin red line" of British dominion winds along the coast, but, within the vast space thus enclosed there appear green or yellow "islands" of various dimensions, representing the territories of "protected" sovereigns. Some of these princedoms are in extent and population equal to fairly-sized European kingdoms, and their rulers administer their own laws, and maintain large and well-equipped military forces. At the same time, with an outward show of entire independence, these States are not really independent. At each Court there is a British Resident, and the native potentates are well aware that if they incur the displeasure of this apparently unpretending personage, serious consequences may ensue, resulting occasionally, as in the case of Oudh, in annexation. The present Government of India has doubtless no desire to increase its responsibilities, but, at the time, the position of these Native States cannot be altogether regarded without uneasiness. The existing arrangements, even from a merely economical point of view, are not satisfactory. There are some very rich men in India, but the country as a whole is extremely poor. Yet it has to bear a threefold military burden. There is a native army paid by the Government, an army of Europeans to keep guard over the native army, and a series of armies maintained by native princes. Nor are the arrangements any more encouraging from a political point of view. During an ordinary outbreak—nay, even during such an extraordinary outbreak as that of 1857—which, however, be it remembered, was after all chiefly the revolt of a military caste, not of a people—self-interest would probably induce the native rulers to remain loyal to the Empire; but suppose the British raj appeared to be really in danger of collapse, it would be a serious matter if all or the bulk of these semi-independent forces were to join the enemy. It would relieve India of a considerable burden if there were but one native army, and if it were altogether under British control, but it is not likely that the native princes will voluntarily surrender their existing privileges, while, if compulsion were used, it might set the whole country in a flame.

Mr. Gladstone and America.——In the article which Mr. Gladstone has just contributed to the North American Review he presents an excellent view of the constitution of a British Cabinet. We question, however, whether a single American will be convinced that the system ought to be transferred, either in whole or in part, to the United States. In a vast Republic like America the evil that has chiefly to be guarded against is the pressure of ignorant opinion. An enormous multitude, swayed by fierce passions, is sure to act foolishly in times of unusual excitement if it can at once make its will felt. The comparative independence of the President enables him to offer a serious check to party fury; and most educated Americans would rather retain the present system with all its anomalies than have no such check at all. The nation is much more likely to be impressed by the eloquent utterances of Mr. Gladstone in praise of the future of America. He expresses an intense conviction that this country is about to be outstripped by the United States, nor does the prospect seem to him to be one for which we have the faintest reason to distress ourselves. We suspect that Englishmen generally are not quite so philosophical, and that if they thought the Americans were really to be soon so far ahead of us as Mr. Gladstone anticipates they would entertain anything but amiable sentiments towards their "kin beyond sea." It does not appear to us that the facts justify Mr. Gladstone in his prophecies. The Americans have far more land than we; but their intellectual, moral, and physical forces can never be so well organised as those of a smaller country. Besides, England is the centre of an enormous Empire, and the privileges of her position become greater in proportion as her responsibilities increase. Even if there were some doubt on the subject—which we do not admit that there is—it could hardly be wise for a statesman like Mr. Gladstone to address such flattering words to the Americans. We have great respect for them, not only as kinsfolk, but as an energetic and intelligent race; at the same time they have often been very troublesome to this country, and they may be quite as troublesome again. It will certainly not make them more conciliatory to tell them that we think they are a great deal better than ourselves. They have always been most easily managed when we have treated them with perfect courtesy, but with a firmness indicating no sense of inferiority either in our present fortunes or in our future destinies.

London Sewage.——The loss of the Princess Alice has revived this once much-discussed question. If the majority of the passengers by that ill-fated vessel had been skilful swimmers, no doubt most of them would have been rescued, but in trying to save themselves they would have undergone such an ordeal as few shipwrecked persons encounter elsewhere. According to the evidence of survivors, the water—rather let us call it the liquid—swallowed by those immersed was absolutely poisonous. It is true that the Thames at Barking is not in such a foul condition all through the twenty-four hours. The disaster to the Princess Alice unfortunately occurred just as the sewers were discharging their unsavoury contents—a process which happens twice a day—and no doubt this circumstance caused the death of some lives which might otherwise have been saved. Now comes the question, Do we get rid of our sewage in the best possible way by discharging it into the Thames at Barking? There can be no doubt that, if Barking were as favourite a residential spot as Richmond or Teddington, such a nuisance would never be tolerated. Of course there are difficulties in the way of any improvement. It is very easy to recommend the deodorisation of the sewage, and the production of a valuable and saleable fertilising product therefrom. Science can easily accomplish this, but so long as our refuse matter is diluted so largely as it now is with water, the solidifying process does not pay commercially. Still we maintain that the sewage of London should not be discharged at Barking in its present state. It should either be deodorised, or it should be carried right out into the North Sea. Either plan will involve extra expense to the rate-payers, but the cost is nothing as compared to the public benefit which will be produced.

Prince Bismarck and the Socialists.——Prince Bismarck was evidently keenly irritated by the assertions of Herr Bebel with respect to his past relations with the Socialists. In his reply he angrily denied that he had ever encouraged the party; and, so far as direct and open encouragement is concerned, his denial was doubtless perfectly sincere. But it is notorious that he was on very friendly terms with Lassalle, the founder of German Socialism, and he never took measures to remove the general impression that he was not unwilling to see the movement acquire considerable importance. Prince Bismarck has for a good many years been obliged to act with the Liberals; but he is himself a Conservative, and so long as Socialism was not positively dangerous, he liked to frighten his doubtful allies by references to its growing power. Now, however, that the Socialists are advancing with rapid strides, he is genuinely anxious to put them down, and he will bring all sorts of pressure to bear upon Parliament to secure the passage of the Bill which is under the consideration of a Select Committee. The measure will be modified in some of its details, but there can be little doubt that it will become law, at least for a limited time, essentially in its present form. The Liberals, we believe, will regret the pliant temper which they are now exhibiting. The German police are harsh and reckless, and they are certain to enforce the new legislation in a manner that will intensify the enthusiasm of the Socialists. They will also find means for seizing many Liberal speakers and writers under the pretext that their teaching has a revolutionary tendency. Prince Bismarck sees this clearly, but he does not shrink from the prospect, for he has an almost fanatical faith in the "blood and iron" method of disposing of political difficulties. The forces at work beneath the surface of society, however, are full of peril; and when he no longer controls them his successors may have good reason to wish that he had handled them less arbitrarily.

London Roadmaking.——Oxford Street shopkeepers have for some weeks past been enjoying the delights of a beleaguered roadway. Although this is the slack season, they have doubtless lost the custom of a good many country cousins who went elsewhere for their shopping. But they will presently reap the benefit of the new paving. It is pleasant both for buyer and seller to be able to converse without roaring as if through a speaking-trumpet in a gale of wind. Whatever the horses may think of the wood, the tradespeople will never wish the noise-emitting stones replaced. We wonder whether Regent Street will follow the example of her sister-thoroughfare. Hitherto Regent Street has been peculiar in the matter of paving. While other streets ran after new gods of wood and asphalte, she stuck to the time-honoured Macadam. Not, however, without inconvenience. Dust, and its unfailing comrade, mud, are both familiar Regent Street phenomena. The crossing-sweeper, rendered comparatively useless by asphalte or wood, still holds court there. And on a muddy day, when the street is thronged with carriages, you bless his existence, or, better still, you tip him. Now, hitherto, we have always believed that Macadam, the Colossus of Roads, as he used to be called, was responsible for all this dust and mud. A letter in the Daily News corrects our error. It seems that modern roadmakers, although they profess to worship at the shrine of Macadam, do not carry out his ideas. His leading principle was to have the stones uniformly broken to a small gauge. This precaution is neglected, and hence holes, dust, mud, and constant repairs. A road made as Mr. Macadam intended it should be made would be not only durable and comparatively noiseless, but far cheaper and safer for horses than either wood or asphalte.

Toy Pistols and Revolvers.——The Prefect of the Paris Police is about to prohibit the sale of toy pistols with explosive compounds, as they have caused many serious accidents. We would not go so far as to prohibit the sale of revolvers, but we should be glad to see some legislation which would restrict their numbers. In wild and thinly-peopled countries they may occasionally be of advantage, but in such a country as England they serve scarcely any useful purpose. Our modern footpads rarely give their victim the chance of firing at them, and the same may be said of burglars, besides which the man who shoots at a supposed burglar may find himself on his trial for manslaughter. What much more often happens is that those who keep such weapons as a protection against robbers end by accidentally shooting themselves or their friends. But, if useless as an engine of protection, the revolver is unrivalled as an engine of destruction. It figures largely in the annals of murder and suicide. Numbers of these horrors would never have been perpetrated, but for the existence of this pestilent little firearm. Try a revolver-tax, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE ABERCARNE COLLIERY EXPLOSION

There is little fresh news to add to the account given last week of the fearful catastrophe at Abercarne. The explosion took place about midday on the Wednesday, when 377 men and boys were in the workings below. From every house in the village, and from every workshed and office, men, women, and children, horrified at the sound and at the sight, rushed down the steep streets and hillsides towards the pit's mouth, screaming, shrieking, and waving their hands. A few brave fellows at once volunteered to form an exploring party, and they were lowered into the pit, and, after being repeatedly driven back by the foul gas, they at last succeeded in reaching a part of the mine where they found eighty-two men and boys alive, and mostly uninjured. These were speedily brought to the pit's mouth, and they proved to be the sole survivors, for very soon afterwards it was discovered that the pit was on fire, and all further exploration impossible. Another descent was, however, subsequently made by means of the Cwmcarne shaft, two miles distant, and a five hours' search resulted in the recovery of eight dead bodies. After this the search was abandoned, and a cutting was made in the banks of the canal, the waters of which were poured down the Abercarne shaft at the rate of 4,000 gallons per minute, with the view of extinguishing the fire. This went on until Tuesday, when an exploring party descended the old shaft to within thirty yards of the bottom, and it was ascertained that the object had been effected, and the work of pumping out was commenced, an operation which will take a long time. The Queen has sent a message of sympathy to the sufferers; and a donation of 100 guineas to the Mansion House Fund; started for their relief, which had on Wednesday reached the amount of 6,000*l.*, in addition to which about 1,000*l.* has been collected in the district itself. Some of the victims of the explosion were holders of life insurance policies and members of Friendly Societies, but in the great majority of cases the surviving relatives are left in a state of great pecuniary distress.

A BAZAAR AT LARNACA

This bazaar or market-place bears a strong resemblance to all places of a similar character in Eastern countries, being narrow, ill-paved, and exceedingly dirty. As a protection from the intense heat of the sun, it is roofed with a coarse kind of matting, stretching from side to side at a height of about twelve feet. The goods on sale are not of the best description, and the most exorbitant prices are demanded, especially since the arrival of the British in the island. The picturesque costumes, the strange medley of nationalities, and the different types of humanity always to be met with in such places, make them favourite haunts of the artist. The filthy insanitary condition of Larnaca, and of the other towns of Cyprus, will soon disappear now that Western energy and skill have taken the place of Eastern lassitude and ignorance. Lieutenant-Colonel White, the Civil Commissioner in Cyprus, has already invited tenders from engineers for supplying gas and water. The water for Larnaca is to be brought from some hilly sources eight miles distant.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Lieut. G. H. Lane, 101st Regiment.

WORK AT A COAL MINE—I.

The series of engravings which we commence this week under the above title we publish with the object of giving a general idea of the method of work adopted in the collieries of England and Wales, the operations and processes varying but very little in different localities. Our first sketch—

"Surveying under Difficulties." Here we have a "working" flooded with water, in which the men are wading knee-deep. The surveyor is taking an observation through the sights of a "miner's dial." An assistant holds one end of the measuring chain, whilst others (not shown in the sketch) are holding their lamps at various points in the distance, for the surveyor's observations."

"At the Edge of the Goaf." A "goaf" is where all the coal is worked out, and nothing is left to support the roof, which soon falls in masses, blocking the passage. Roads are sometimes kept open through such places by means of "pack-walls," and timber supports. In our sketch a man is shown craving forwards to ascertain whether a practicable way still remains, it being desired to pass through in order to examine the condition of the workings beyond.

"On the Pit Brow," shows a truck of coals passing over the weighing machine before its contents are added to the heap at the "tip." To each truck is attached a tin tally bearing the number of the collier by whom it has been sent up, and this being called out by a boy, the weight of the coals is set down against it in a book by the master's "weigher" in the cabin, the register being watched on behalf of the men by the "check-weigher." When the trucks are emptied the tallies are taken off by a boy, whose duty it is to collect them for the use of the men next day.

"An Awkward Passage" is a sample of what is occasionally to be met with, by the side of a "fault" for instance. The material here is not coal, but shale, or other stone found in the coal measures. The way is most difficult to keep open, as falls of the roof frequently occur. It is used only by the firemen or officials of the mine, and should be abandoned even by them as soon as an alternative cutting can be made.

THE RUSSIAN OCCUPATION OF BATOUM

Lord Beaconsfield was apparently right when he said that, as a harbour, Batoum rather resembles Cowes than Portsmouth. Mr. Bryce, the traveller, writing to the Daily News, says: "Batoum is a village with a tumble-down old castle, built on a spit of sand which juts out and forms a bay barely a mile across, and exposed to the violent winds which blow from the north. Still it affords better anchorage than any other spot on this bold and dangerous coast, and has, therefore, a certain commercial value. But military or naval importance Batoum has none. It does not command any road, and there is nothing to make it a specially suitable place for a fortress. A naval stronghold it can never become, for there is no shelter, no place where docks could be formed." The special correspondent of the Standard says that Batoum is a pleasant town, with clean and rather broad streets. Most of the houses on the shore are handsome-looking, and built in European style. It is, perhaps, the cleanest of all the Oriental towns. This cleanliness is due to the Greeks rather than to the Armenians, who are described as very dirty.

Our second sketch represents the territory recently annexed to the Russian Empire, lying between Batoum, the Valley of Tchuruk-Sou, and the old Russo-Turkish frontier, in Asia Minor. The Hossouhan Hill lies to the left. On this elevation Dervish Pasha established the Samie Redoubt, which constituted a strong point of defence, and the central position of the first line of fortifications facing the Russian camp, about twenty-four miles from Batoum. The little town of Tchuruk-Sou is seen in the centre, and, before the recent Russian occupation, was slightly fortified, and garrisoned by a couple of regiments of cavalry and infantry Ottoman troops. During hostilities the Turkish ironclads manœuvring in the vicinity were in the habit of sending shells with considerable effect into the enemy's lines. On the Russian coast and shore of the Black Sea the town of Poti is visible with the Caucasian range in the background.

The Valley of Tchuruk-Sou, with the serpentine stream flowing through the centre, is beautifully situated in the territory lately ceded to Russia, in Turkey in Asia. It lies about twenty miles from Batoum, between that seaport and the old Russo-Turkish frontier. The slopes and elevated positions on either side were well fortified when in possession of the soldiers of Dervish Pasha, previous to the late evacuation in favour of Russia. This place is accessible from Batoum by mountain passes and the military roads cut during the war, and no doubt the Russian Government will find it practicable and useful to run a railroad from Poti, along the shore of the Black Sea, past the opening of the valley, thus connecting Tiflis, the capital of Russian Georgia, with Batoum, and forming a closer communication with Kars and Ardaban.—We are indebted for our sketches to Dr. E. J. Mulligan, Surgeon, Imperial Ottoman Army, and they were taken when he was with the army of Dervish Pasha.

THE RUSSIANS' LAST LOOK AT CONSTANTINOPLE

During that anxious period which intervened between the signature of the Treaty of Stefano and the assembling of the Congress which subsequently remodelled the provisions of that celebrated document, there was considerable risk that at any moment War might be renewed. The position at Constantinople was most remarkable. The Russians had assembled a vast force outside the city. The Turks, defeated but by no means conquered, had assembled an almost equally large army for the defence of the metropolis. Meanwhile, in the adjacent sea there rode the fleet of a third Power, and it was no doubt owing to the determined attitude of this third Power that the Russians did not occupy Constantinople. And now at last the Muscovite invaders are about to depart; and the scene represented in our engraving is literally in process of realisation. A correspondent of the Globe, describing the review of the 17th ult., when upwards of 60,000 Russian troops defiled before General Todleben at San Stefano, uses expressions which are singularly applicable to our own picture. He says: "In front of us was the whole Russian army, while on our left the Sea of Marmora lay asleep, with the lovely Prince's Islands resting on its placid bosom, and the mountains on the Asiatic coast visible beyond. Looking eastward, the eye travelled over a gentle dip, about a mile in extent, and, resting for a moment on the Turkish positions which crowned the opposite rise, settled at last in admiration and wonder on the fairy-like minarets and domes of Stamboul. It was a sight never to be forgotten, the armed host of victorious soldiers gazing down longingly on the lovely city for which they had braved shot and shell, the bullet and the bayonet of their gallant adversaries, and the rains and storms of the cruel Balkans, and yet, restrained only by the word of one Power, they had not dared to seize this much-coveted prize." Once more, as in 1856, the Porte has got a reprieve; but if those who direct its counsels do not make wise use of the opportunity thus offered, it is pretty certain that before many years there will wave over Stamboul a flag, which may be Russian or Greek, or may collectively represent Western Europe, but will assuredly not be Turkish.

"AU REVOIR"

It is a pity that in our tongue we have no equivalent for this convenient French phrase, which implies that, although we part, we hope to meet again. In the farewell here depicted the surroundings are, as they should be, picturesque. The massive old wall with its buttresses and "louping-stane," as the Scotch call it; the winding road on which the pigeons are perching; the girl with one hand on the neck of her faithful dog, who would fain run after her adorer, while with the other hand she blows a parting kiss; and lastly, the lover himself, as he should be, on horseback. The circumstances of modern partings are too apt to be prosaic. The rickety station fly; the umbrella forgotten till the last moment, and anxieties as to whether the departing guest will catch the 3.47 express, detract somewhat from the tenderer emotions which ought at such a time to reign paramount. Let us hope that in this case the lover is loyal and true, and that she will not afterwards have occasion to say of him that which is sarcastically said of the cavalier in the ballad, "He loves—and he rides away."

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE IN THE HOLY LAND,
VI.—THE HOLY FIRE

All day on Friday pilgrims from all parts of Palestine have been arriving for this great ceremony. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre is left open all night, and hundreds of the pilgrims camp on the flags. Early on the morning of Saturday till late in the afternoon the building begins to be closely packed with pilgrims, becoming more and more fanatical every moment. Shouting, yelling, clapping of hands, and dancing up and down, and, to amuse themselves more fully, many chase one another over the heads of the densely-packed crowd, wrestling and struggling back into the mass as they are tripped up by some friend below. The Muslim guard, though much stronger in numbers to-day, seem to have but little control over the mob, and threaten to use the butt-end of their muskets. Refreshment is served round in the shape of water, and four or five will fight with one another for a drain to wet their parched throats. After a procession of bishops and priests thrice round the building, the Patriarch enters the Sepulchre. Now the noise becomes greater and greater, the shouts and cries are quite deafening, making the place more like an Inferno than the Church of Christ. A priest who has been standing near the two oval windows in the side of the Sepulchre, from out of which the fire is expected, thrusts in his hand, and brings forth a lighted taper, and immediately rushes through the lane the soldiers try to keep for him, and disappears into the interior of the church. The Holy Fire now issues from the holes in the walls, and hundreds of hands are stretched out as they frantically try to light their candles at the flame. One man has succeeded in igniting his taper, and in struggling through the crowd it suddenly flickers and goes out. He dashes the smouldering bundle into the Sepulchre, and rushes out of the church raving.

By this time one candle has ignited the other, and the crowd below is one mass of moving flame. And from every nook and corner of the church, from dome to floor, creeps the hissing noise of burning wax, until the scene beneath is almost obliterated by its smoke and fumes. So ends the great ceremony of the Holy Fire.

THE AUSTRIAN OCCUPATION OF BOSNIA

Invasion rather than occupation is the proper term. The so-called Austrian occupation has culminated in downright war, for no other term can be used when a first-rate Power like Austria has to employ from 100,000 to 200,000 soldiers, and where pitched battles are fought between the invaders and the natives. One of the most noteworthy events hitherto of this contest has been the storming of Serajevo, a town of considerable importance. The Austrian columns advanced upon the castle early in the morning under cover of a heavy fog. This castle was surrounded by a wall, and the insurgents had several guns in position there. After some hours' fighting the Bosnian guns were silenced by the fire of heavy artillery, and then the Austrian infantry advanced in swarms to the town. Fighting of the most horrible kind ensued. The troops were fired upon from every house, doorway, and window. Even women and the sick and wounded insurgents in the military hospital took part in the fighting. Ultimately the insurgents dispersed in all directions, and as soon as the town was completely occupied the Imperial flag was hoisted over the castle. Considering the desperate resistance they encountered, the Austrian troops behaved with great good-nature and forbearance. They lost only a small number of dead, but had three hundred wounded. Of the insurgents three hundred were killed and seven hundred wounded.—Our other engraving represents the commencement of a cavalry skirmish near Bussovacz. In the foreground a sub-officer of the 5th Uhlan Regiment is discharging his revolver at an insurgent Us-bashee, or captain, his comrades all being provided with similar weapons.

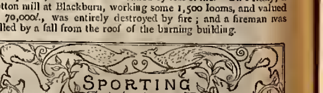
Political Affairs.——Parliament has been further prorogued to the 30th of November.—It is stated that an earldom is about to be conferred upon the Lord Chancellor, who will take the title of Earl Cairns. His lordship first entered Parliament in 1852 as member for Belfast, was knighted in 1866, raised to the Peerage in 1867, and first became Lord Chancellor in 1868, being reappointed in 1874.—The Observer announces that a firm of Bond Street silversmiths invites subscriptions of not less than half-a-guinea, from ladies only, towards testimonials in silver representing "Peace with Honour," to be presented to Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury. Whether the idea originates with the ladies or the silversmiths does not appear. Each testimonial is to cost 1,000*l*.—The Marquis of Hartington, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Lowe have sent to the West Ham Liberal Association letters of acknowledgment for the resolutions concerning the Anglo-Turkish Convention adopted by them. Lord Hartington simply expresses his thanks; Mr. Gladstone does the same, and adds that he is glad to see that the Association has noticed the dangerous character of the present financial policy; while Mr. Lowe protests against the assumption that a Government possessing a Parliamentary majority is at liberty to strain the prerogative of the Crown in any way they think fit. This, he remarks, would inevitably produce retaliation, and the Constitution would be shattered by the violence of parties alternately possessing themselves of the prerogative which was created for the benefit of all alike, and absolving themselves by a strictly party vote from the consequences of their offence.—Sir W. Harcourt, M.P., speaking on Tuesday at an agricultural dinner in Blenheim Park, said that he believed no one would contend that England could be placed in her proper position among European nations without taking some liabilities; and he thought that, had the Opposition been in power, they would not have hesitated to undertake them, and would have been the first to complain of any who were unpatriotic enough to lower the Government in the eyes of the country, or present a divided nation before Europe. There had been much talk about stretching unduly the prerogative of the Crown; but the nation, he took it, was a just master, and knew it would not be served well unless it trusted its servants. He thought if the Opposition wished to place themselves well with the country, they should assist the Government in placing England upon such a pinnacle that they would not be ashamed to see her if they themselves held the reins of Government.—The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the advisability of extending the hours of polling in provincial constituencies, have agreed to their report. They consider that in some instances decided advantages would accrue, but, on the other hand, the proposal is beset with such difficulties that they think the question had better stand over till the time comes for considering the continuance of the Ballot Act, especially as some experience may then have been gained of the effects of the extension of polling hours in the Metropolis.—On Wednesday Mr. J. Lowther, Chief Secretary for Ireland, speaking at a Conservative banquet at York, said that during the last four years the Government had been thoroughly supported not only by a large majority in the House of Commons, but by the great bulk of the nation. So great was the demoralisation which had been wrought under another Administration for some years before, that at one time it was hardly safe to talk about being a Conservative. That, however, had passed away, and the country was thoroughly prepared to support Conservative principles.—Messrs. Biggar and O'Donnell seem to have met with a rather lively reception at a Home Rule meeting, held in St. Mary's Hall, Belfast, last week. The moment they appeared on the platform the entire assemblage commenced a promiscuous fight, chairs, tables, and other furniture being smashed, and the fragments used as weapons. The battle lasted a long time, and many of the combatants were wounded. At last, when the hall was nearly empty, Messrs. Biggar and Parnell each delivered a long address for the reporters.—The revision of the lists of voters for the Metropolitan boroughs was commenced this week. In the City, the name of Sir Garnet Wolseley, which is on the Clothworkers' list, was objected to by the Liberals, on the ground that he had left his residence in Portman Square for Cyprus. It was, however, pointed out that it was not likely that he would return to vote, nor probable that any one would attempt to personate him, and the objection was withdrawn.—The Fenian prisoners, Condon and Melody, were released from Portland on Monday, taken to Southampton in charge of the deputy-governor and two warders, and put on board the Mosel steamship, which started for New York the next morning. Their removal was kept secret to avoid any possibility of a demonstration, and Her Majesty's pardon was only handed to them as the vessel weighed anchor for the voyage. Messrs. Ryan and Collins, of the Visiting Committee, visited them on Sunday, having received permission from the Home Office by telegraph, and, through the Governor, they presented them with a sum of 40*l*. Melody, in a letter to his uncle, complains of the long period of expatriation enforced. Both men were permitted to telegraph to their friends yesterday announcing their liberation.

The Loss of the "Princess Alice."——The Mansion House Fund for the relief of the sufferers by this unparalleled disaster amounted on Wednesday to 21,900*l*. The evidence of identification at the Woolwich Inquest was completed on Friday, when the coroner spoke somewhat severely of the carelessness of some persons who, in two instances, had sworn positively that the bodies they had seen were those those of missing friends, who were subsequently found to be alive. On Monday the coroner protested against the publication of affidavits in the newspapers, while the case was still sub judice, and the real business of the inquest was commenced by the examination of the crew of the Princess Alice. On Tuesday and Wednesday the inquiry was continued and will probably last well into next week. One witness said that no one was appointed to look out after dark, but was contradicted by the next witness, who deposed that the crew, when not engaged at the wheel, were expected, as a matter of course, to keep a sharp look-out. The chief engineer said the engines were in first-rate condition. Scenes have occurred between the foreman and the jury, the latter complaining that the foreman wasted their time with questions which had been already put and answered. The foreman resented being called a "perfect nuisance," but no one apologised. At the inquest at Barking upon a number of bodies picked up there, a formal verdict of "Found Drowned" has been returned, it being agreed to adopt the suggestion of the coroner to leave the question as to the cause of the collision to the Woolwich jury. Applications for relief have been received from twenty-eight widows, 163 orphans, twenty-six aged parents, and thirty-five widows left with children, together with forty-five survivors of the wreck; and many others are expected. A peculiarly distressing incident in connection with the event is the death of a young American lady, whose lover, after getting her into a boat, and saying "Good-bye, we shall meet in Heaven," sank to rise no more. It seems that, in the confusion, the poor girl was thrown out of the boat, and that after swimming or floating a distance of two miles, she was picked up two hours after the collision. She was most kindly treated by those who rescued her; but the shock to her system was so great that she died on Friday last.

Miscellaneous.——An account of the colliery explosion at Abercarne, and of the subsequent efforts to ameliorate the consequences of the disaster, will be found in "Our Illustration" columns.—The Trades Unions Congress at Bristol was brought to a close on Saturday. The business of the last two days included the adoption of resolutions in favour of appointing practical working men and women as factory sub-inspectors; the amendment of the jury laws, by lowering the qualifications and paying jurymen; the extension of the Employers and Workmen Act to seamen; the federation of trade societies; the assimilation of the borough and county franchise, and the extension of the hours of polling; labour representation; and against the 23rd Clause of the Poor-law Amendment Act; and the Parliamentary Committee was instructed to prepare a list of test questions, to be submitted to candidates at the next general election. A paper was read in favour of legislation to shorten the hours of labour, and it was resolved to ascertain, before the meeting of the next Congress, the number of working hours in every town in the kingdom. A proposal from the International Labour Union suggesting international organisation was referred to the Parliamentary Committee. Next year the Congress will meet in Edinburgh.—On Friday the Speaker distributed the prizes at the Glynde Cottagers' Show. He said that there were hundreds of thousands of persons in London who had never seen a garden. He passed half his life in the greatest city in the world, and, by the favour of the nation, he lived in the finest palace in that great city; but yet he had no garden. Next day, responding to the toast of his health at Glynde Park Harvest Home, he referred to the proposal which he had made five years ago that his farm labourers should on certain conditions share in the profits of the farm; and said that since then the profits, which were then five per cent., had decreased, and therefore he had not pressed his offer upon them. The diminished yield he attributed to a succession of wet seasons, and explained his intention of raising more meat and less corn in future.—It having been decided that the Eurydice shall be broken up, the work was commenced on Friday night.—The Welsh National Eisteddfod was opened at Birkenhead on Tuesday under the presidency of Mr. Osborne Morgan, M.P., who in his address said that since his boyhood the Welsh language had distinctly gained instead of losing ground, and that Wales was more free from crime than any other part of the kingdom, except the Orkney Isles, where, he was told, the only crime known was an occasional instance of husband beating. Eisteddfodau helped to break down the barriers between class and class and creed and creed which were the curse of English society. Men of every station united upon the broad ground of a common Christianity, and he thought that Eisteddfodau might be made instruments of God's Providence in hastening that period of peace and goodwill which after eighteen centuries of Christianity had not yet been achieved. Prizes were awarded to the successful competitors in singing and pianoforte playing, and also for literary compositions, but that of 100*l*. for the best English essay on "The conditions of the Welsh nation and the best means of securing its progress," was withheld, as all the essays received were adjudged to be of "inferior merit." There was a grand concert in the evening, at the conclusion of which an alarming accident occurred: the flooring of the ladies' cloak room suddenly gave way, and a number of ladies fell through, a distance of eight or ten feet, some being severely injured. On Wednesday the proceedings were resumed, and more prizes were given for literary efforts, including one for a Welsh translation of Poe's "Raven;" musical compositions, quartette and choral singing, and painting. It is curious that the artists, like the authors, were found incapable of satisfying the judges in regard to special national subjects, for although three pictures, of "The Interior of a Welsh Cottage, with a Blind Harper Playing before a Group of Figures," were sent in, neither was thought sufficiently good to deserve the prize of twenty guineas which had been offered for the subject.—The long-talked-of and oft-announced opening of Waterloo Bridge toll-free is now definitively fixed for the second week in October.—The violent gales which prevailed during Saturday night and Sunday over the greater part of the kingdom were the cause of much damage to property, especially around the coast. A large number of wrecks are reported, some of them attended by loss of life.—On Friday, a cotton mill at Blackburn, working some 1,500 looms, and valued at 70,000*l*., was entirely destroyed by fire; and a fireman was killed by a fall from the roof of the burning building.



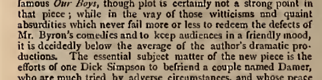
SPORTING

The Turf.——The Doncaster Meeting ended, as it began, somewhat flatly. The Portland Plate, however, brought out a strong field of sixteen, a hot favourite being supplied in Hackthorpe. He, however, received a kick at the start, and consequently was never dangerous. The winner turned up in Telescope, who, as a two-year-old, was one of the smartest of his day, and has done one or two good things since. On this occasion he carried 8st. 5lbs., including 7lbs. extra for a recent victory. In the Wharncliffe Stakes Kaleidoscope again showed that he retains his early spring form by beating Herald, Ecossais, and three others, with consummate ease. Dalham, also, who was sold to Count Lehndorf before the race, gave evidence that he, too, is not going to the bad just yet, though few horses on the Turf have run as many races as he has. The Cup on the Friday was a real sporting event, though only Pageant, Hampton, and Kingsclere—to make the running for the former—started. The betting shifted about considerably, but at the fall of the flag it was evens against each of the two first-named; and a ding-dong race they ran home, Pageant eventually winning by three quarters of a length. It must be remembered, however, that Hampton gave the winner 10lbs. We seem to be fallen on evil days when only an aged gelding and a reclaimed hurdle racer can be found to do serious battle for one of the great trophies of the Turf. Friday was a great day for Lord Falmouth, as far as his exchequer goes, for he took the Park Hill Stakes with Jannette, who showed that her Leger victory was no fluke, and the Doncaster Stakes with Childeric, who made small bones in beating Caerau, while Wheel of Fortune walked over for the Wentworth Stakes. It does not seem even at this long distance of time any very long odds against Lord Falmouth being first and second for the St. Leger of 1879 with the filly just mentioned and the Champagne winner Charibert, and thus supplying the two first horses in the race for three years in succession. By the way, another rather remarkable instance of an owner running first and second in an important race occurred at Paris on Sunday last, when in a field of twenty-six Baron de Rothschild occupied these places with Reveillon and Réserviste II. in the French Omnium, which corresponds with our Cesarewitch. As regards the last-named race, which comes off in the second week of next month, several favourites have been already found, Lady Golightly being at the head of the best at 7 or 8 to 1. Harbinger is next in demand, and after him Master Kildare. When it is remembered that the Irish horse just named ran third in the Leger, and has only 7st. 4lbs. in the Newmarket race, his prospects seem second to none. Julius, who occupied the same place in the Leger in his year, won the Cesarewitch with 8st. on his back.—As to the racing brought off this week there is little to be said. Lichfield was little short of a fiasco. Ayr, "the Ascot of the North," saw fair sport, Dukes and Earls hailing from the land of heather and whiskey running their horses freely enough for the honour of the nationality, and taking a fair share of the spoil. Hampton Autumn was "as per usual," and the Manchester meeting maintained its average excellence.—By the way, the yearling sales at Doncaster gave pretty strong evidence that the golden days for breeders have passed away, few lots running into four figures. The owner of Beauclerc, however, notwithstanding his hard luck with the Middle Park hero, did not hesitate to give 1,500 gs. for his half-sister.

CRICKET.—At Prince's the Australians have shown that they were quite equal to one of the best professional elevens which could be brought against them. They made 236 in their one innings, but the players could only muster 160, even with the assistance of Ulyett's 79.—They also made short work with the twelve of West of Scotland at Glasgow, winning easily in one innings. This was practically the last match they played in this country, for in that against Eighteen of Sunderland they did not use all their strength.—Inter-county cricket is drawing to a close. Leicestershire, of course, had no chance with Notts, which stands out as the premier county this season.

AQUATICS.——The scullers have been busy on the Thames. On Saturday last, Hawdon, of Seaton Delaval, a young oarsman who has already acquired some reputation, essayed to tackle the old ex-champion, J. Sadler, for 100*l.* a side over the championship course. There is little to be said of the contest, as it was an illustration, so often witnessed, that "youth will be served," and Hawdon had no great difficulty in winning.—The contest for the Sculling Championship, and the Challenge Cup given by the proprietors of the Sportsman, was nearly a repetition of the rowing at the recent International Regatta, as the Northern men had it all their own way, Elliott of Pegswood beating Higgins of Shadwell, and Boyd beating Blackman. In the final heat Elliott was awarded the victory after a foul—a most unsatisfactory termination for such a competition, and another nail in the coffin of professional rowing.

ANGLING.——Know all men that in the Great Roach Fishing Tournament at Cheshunt, on the Lea, Mr. Carrington has been declared Champion Roach Fisher for the season.—A few days ago, in an angling sweepstakes, a lady took the third prize. Have we no Waller, who wrote the ode "On a Lady Fishing," "See where the fair Clorinda," &c., to immortalise her?



THEATRES

WHILE our theatres are so largely infected with amateur feebleness, the return of Mr. Byron to the London stage with a new comedy written by himself, and comprising a prominent part especially designed for the display of his own powers as an actor, is an event on which playgoers may be honestly congratulated. Unfortunately his latest production, a comedy in three acts, entitled Conscience Money, brought out at the HAYMARKET Theatre on Monday evening, is not the happiest of his recent efforts. Even in its story it is very far inferior to the famous Our Boys, though plot is certainly not a strong point in that piece; while in the way of those witticisms and quaint absurdities which never fail more or less to redeem the defects of Mr. Byron's comedies and to keep audiences in a friendly mood, it is decidedly below the average of the author's dramatic productions. The essential subject matter of the new piece is the efforts of one Dick Simpson to befriend a couple named Damer, who are much tried by adverse circumstances, and whose peace and happiness are greatly imperilled by the machinations of a plausible scoundrel and unscrupulous libertine named Sefton. Damer has discovered just before his marriage that he is not entitled to the property he holds because an elder brother long supposed to be dead is still living, and, instead of confessing the fact to his intended bride, he conceals it, being enabled to do so by the circumstance that the elder brother, accused, though unjustly, of murder in Australia, is anxious to remain in concealment. Here, it will be perceived, is a dramatic idea, though not, perhaps, a very ingenious or powerful one. But to make it effective the wife should obviously have been a person setting her mind greatly on worldly goods, and likely to be as much overwhelmed by the discovery that she has married a poor husband as was the proud Lady of Lyons. Mrs. Damer, however, does not appear to be a person of this kind, and when the disclosure is made she puts up with her position without a murmur. But, even before this point is reached, the author has got far away from the datum, so to speak, of his story. The husband is represented as simply a weak creature, who gambles and permits Sefton, whom he knows to be a villain, to haunt his house and make advances to his wife. Detected in this, exposed, and expelled from the place, Damer yet receives Sefton again, and allows him to frighten him into abruptly leaving his home by a false tale about a warrant out for an offence which his victim has never committed. Thus we have both the brothers Damer weakly flying from justice, though perfectly innocent. Afterwards Mrs. Damer is represented as falling into the snares of the proved rascal, Sefton, in a no less childishly gullible way. The dénouement is furnished by the return of the brothers Damer, both now relieved from their fears by means which need not be mentioned—a circumstance which entails the final exposure of Sefton. The defects of such a story are too obvious to require further comment. Mr. Charles Kelly and Miss Pateman as Mr. and Mrs. Damer, Mr. Howe as the elder Damer, and Mr. D. Fisher, jun., Miss E. Thorne and Mr. Pateman in some minor characters strive in vain to give an air of reality to its scenes. Mr. Terriss, on the other hand, is able to strike the imaginations of the audience by a powerful piece of acting in the part of Sefton. The redeeming feature of the play, however, is the character of the good-natured humourist, Simpson, the old schoolfellow of Damer, who is always at hand to utter droll observations, and to uphold the deserving and confound the wrong doer. The humour is indeed thinner than usual—the wit occasionally rather strained, the good things certainly rarer than they have been known to be in Mr. Byron's pieces. Still there is enough of these qualities to save the piece, and even to secure it a cordial welcome.

The COURT Theatre has passed for a brief season into the hands of Mr. W. H. Stephens, who has revived here a version of an old French melodrama, entitled La Grace de Dieu, the story of which is familiar, in the shape of the libretto of Donizetti's opera, Linda di Chamouni. The piece is of an old-fashioned sort, and is infected with artificial sentiment. Its production on Saturday evening, with Miss Agnes Leonard in the part of the heroine, was received by a scanty audience with banter and derision.

A morning performance of Mr. Burnand's Jeames will be given at the GAIETY Theatre to-day.—The FOLLY Theatre reopens this evening with a new comedy adapted by Mr. Wyndham, and entitled The Idol, and a new burlesque by Messrs. Reece and Farnie, entitled Stars and Garters. Miss Lydia Thompson and Mr. Lionel Brough will take part in the performances.—DRURY LANE Theatre will reopen on Saturday next with a revival of The Winter's Tale.—The OLYMPIC will reopen on Monday with a revival of the Two Orphans.

Mr. Hollingshead has written a touching little story, entitled Nobody's Child, which is published in pamphlet form at the GAIETY Theatre and elsewhere, the profits of the publication being devoted to the funds of the Hospital for Sick Children in Great Ormond Street. The matinée at the Gaiety, on Saturday last, given in aid of the same institution, is stated to have resulted in a clear profit of 150*l.*, including contributions to the "Toy Fund."

THE ALHAMBRA.——Miss Emily Soldene, who has just returned from a tour round the world, has every reason to be satisfied with the hearty reception accorded to her on the first night of the reproduction of Geneviève de Brabant, with which her name, in the character of Drogan, is inseparably associated. She was in splendid voice, and was several times rapturously encored by the audience which crowded every part of the immense building. Miss Constance Loseby resumed her impersonation of the Duchess, and was equally well received, as were also Mr. Aynsley Cooke as the Duke, and Messrs. Marshall and Bury as the never-to-be-forgotten gensdarme, to whose song, "We run 'em in," several new verses have been added. It is scarcely necessary to say that the piece is magnificently mounted with new scenery and dresses, and much of the music is also new. Mr. Albery's ballet of the Golden Wreath follows the opera-bouffe, for which it is safe to predict a lengthened run.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.——The Autumn Season will commence on Monday, September 30. The programme will be Doubleday's Will, The Paris Exhibition, and An Artful Automaton. A New First Part, by F. C. Burnand, and a New Musical Sketch, by Mr. Corney Grain, are in active preparation, and will be produced without delay.

MOORE AND BURGESS MINSTRELS.——This unrivalled company of sable songsters can boast of a permanency of popularity to which few, if any, other caterers for the amusement of the public have attained. On Wednesday they celebrated the beginning of their fourteenth consecutive year at St. James's Hall, and it appears that they had up to that time performed 6,445 times without the intermission of a single lawful night. A new programme was provided for the occasion, which was heartily received by a crowded audience. Mr. H. de Brenner's beautiful voice was heard to great advantage in a new ballad, "My Lonely Star," while Mr. W. S. Leslie was equally successful in Hobson's favourite song, "Sing, dearest, sing." Mr. Charles Ernest, Mr. Sydney Herbert, and Herr Rudolf, whose rôle is the sentimental and pathetic, were also much applauded in their vocal efforts. The comic element was strongly represented by Messrs. Sully, Charles Sutton, and Walter Howard. With regard to the second part of the entertainment, Mr. Frank Pieri was, as usual, an operatic star of the very first magnitude, while the Gee-hards displayed the india-rubber-like elasticity of their prototypes, the Girards.

M. ERNEST QUETELET, the director of the Brussels Observatoire, and well-known for his meteorological and astronomical studies, has died in Belgium, at the age of fifty-three.

A FINE QUARRY OF LITHOGRAPHIC STONE has been found in Algeria, near Oran. The stone is reported to be equal to some of the best specimens from the old Munich quarries, now exhausted.

A "WAVERLEY DICTIONARY," containing a list of the characters in Sir Walter Scott's novels, with abstracts of the plots on the plan of the "Dickens Dictionary," is being compiled in America.

A BED OF 352 SNAKES was found last week on a farm near Carmarthen. Over 100 of the snakes were from 9 to 12 inches long, and three were very large, while there were thousands of eggs in clusters like bunches of grapes.

THE "ARROW."——We have received from Mr. Tankerville Chamberlayne a very pretty coloured lithograph of his yacht, the Arrow, executed by Mr. John B. Day, from a drawing by Josiah Taylor. Additional interest attaches to this picture, as it is one of Mr. Taylor's latest works, his death having taken place on the 5th inst.

THE SUNDAY OPENING OF THE MANCHESTER FREE LIBRARIES appears to be more appreciated by the people as the movement becomes better known. Last Sunday the number of readers considerably exceeded that of the previous week, and at one branch library in particular there was an increase of nearly five hundred persons on the preceding Sunday.

FRENCH PROTESTANTS propose to establish a daily halfpenny journal, Le Signal, to advance Protestant interests, secure converts, and combat Clericalism and Materialism. The Signal will hold Republican views, and will be conducted by converts from Romanism, while the paper will not appear until suitable capital be forthcoming, 5,200*l.* already having been raised.

MARSHAL VON MOLTKE has had a plaster model of his hand taken for a devoted admirer. The three first fingers and thumb grasp a pencil, the little finger being stretched out, and the wrist is encircled by a military cuff peeping from the edge of a cloak. The hand itself rests on a small square pedestal, with laurel leaves at each corner, and in front is the fac-simile of the Marshal's signature.

CYPRUS has brought out its first newspaper, a small weekly journal—Kupros—printed in Greek and English. The journal is to be devoted to the interests of agriculture and commerce, and contains local news and a laudatory article on English government. The letter "w" being apparently absent from the English type, all words requiring the letter are spelt with two v's, which produces a somewhat curious effect.

A BALLOON RACE is to take place at Cincinnati, the Transatlantic public being weary of walking, swimming, and riding matches, pigeon and glass-ball shooting, and being eager for a novel contest. Thus the aeronauts are to decide which can mount highest into the clouds, and remain longest in a rarefied atmosphere. Instruments and a skilled person to make the necessary observations are to be taken by each competitor.

SOME AMERICAN BLACK BASS have been brought over for the Marquis of Exeter, who intends to try and naturalise them in England. Black bass are considered by many persons to be the finest flavoured fresh-water fish of any in America. These specimens travelled in a tank where the water was kept fresh by the injection of air every ten minutes, and have borne the journey well. Talking of finny creatures the Brighton Aquarium has acquired a rare soft-shelled tortoise—Trionyx Argus—which is a native of the West Coast of Africa.

TELL'S CHAPEL, on the Lake of Lucerne, is to be restored, and the damaged frescoes, scrawled over with the names of tourists of all nations, will be replaced by four large pictures representing "The Oath of the Swiss Confederates at the Rütli," "Tell Shooting at the Apple," "Tell's Escape from the Boat," and "The Death of Gessler in the Hohle Gasse, near Kussnacht." The little chapel by the lake side, now nearly five hundred years old, is very shabby at present, having been much injured by damp and the weather, to say nothing of the roughness of visitors, while the sister edifice at Kussnacht, built where Tell is asserted to have shot the Austrian tyrant, is in much better preservation.

LONDON MORTALITY continues low, and the deaths last week numbered 1,259 against 1,260 during the previous seven days, being a decline of 1, at the rate of 18·4 per 1,000, and 106 below the average. There were 90 deaths from diarrhœa (a decrease of 34, and 45 below the average), 37 from whooping-cough (a decline of 17), 32 from fever (an increase of 7), 27 from scarlet fever (a fall of 3, and 52 below the average), 13 from diphtheria (a rise of 3), 7 from small-pox (an increase of 4), and 6 from measles. There were 2,373 births registered against 2,416 in the preceding week, exceeding the average by 35. The mean temperature was 59·1 deg. 1·3 deg. above the average; and there were 40·1 hours of registered sunshine out of the 90 hours during which the sun was above the horizon.

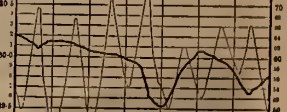
SEPTEMBER 12TH TO SEPTEMBER 18TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The week ending Wednesday, the 18th instant, may be divided into two periods. During the first part the weather was very fine and bright, the barometer almost steady, and temperature at about the mean for the time of year. On Sunday, the 15th instant, however, the barometer began to fall very quickly, and the weather ever since has been of an entirely different character. Extremely heavy showers fell on Sunday evening, the 15th instant, and the wind at the same time rose to a fresh gale from the south westward or westward. This continued throughout Monday, the 16th instant; but the weather cleared on the morning of that day, and the after part was fine, though very gusty. The barometer rose quickly throughout Monday, the 16th instant; but on Tuesday, the 17th instant, it began to fall again, and dull weather once more prevailed. Very little rain fell, however, until Wednesday morning, the 18th instant, when a steady fall set in, lasting for several hours. About noon the same day the weather cleared again and became very bright; but reports from various parts of the country showed that conditions were extremely unsettled, so that the improvement which had then set in was not at all likely to continue. The barometer was highest (30·20 inches) on Thursday, the 12th instant; lowest (29·53 inches) on Sunday, the 15th instant; range, 0·67 inches. Temperature was highest (72°) on Sunday, the 15th instant; lowest (45°) on Friday and Saturday, the 13th and 14th; range, 27°. Rain fell on three days; total, 0·40 inches; greatest fall on any one day, 0·29 inches, on Wednesday, the 18th instant.

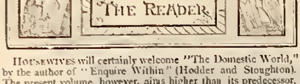
FROM THE PICTURE BY FRED. G. COTMAN, EXHIBITED IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY



Housewives will certainly welcome "The Domestic World," by the author of "Enquire Within" (Hodder and Stoughton). The present volume, however, aims higher than its predecessor, and declares itself a manual of social economy, while it embraces so wide a range as to include moral dissertations on Life and Education, hints on dress, cookery recipes, legal information, the management of pets and flowers, the origin of sundry manners and customs, with other heterogeneous subjects. Several errors are visible, by the way—particularly regarding postal arrangements and the Royal Family; while why is lawn tennis excluded when croquet is admitted?—For housekeepers of a limited income "Cold Scraps made into Dainty Dishes," by a Lady Help (Tinsley), supplies easy and inexpensive recipes, with a rather over liberal use of onions. To recommend sausages for dinner two days running is also too much of a porcine diet.—The thirst aroused by the Lady Help's compounds may be allayed by Leo Engel's "American Drinks" (Tinsley), some of which are good, others decidedly intoxicating, and several presumably nasty—to wit, a mixture of gin, absinthe, and noyeau, with the poetic title of "Ladies' Blush."—Besides providing us with drinks America sends a pleasant novel, "Watch and Ward," by Henry James, jun. (Trübner), which depicts the trials of a bachelor who adopts an orphan and trains her for a wife.—The newness of all things in the United States must account for the value set upon a wooden figure of the God of Wine, carved by an English prisoner in 1776 for a Transatlantic hostess, religiously preserved as a precious relic, and its history now narrated by Brigham Payne, in "The Story of Bacchus" (A. E. Brooks, Hartford, Connecticut, U.S.).

Mr. W. Tegg's "Posts and Telegraphs" (W. Tegg), is hardly so happy as his previous compilations. Mr. Tegg is more at home with antiquarian customs than with such a scientific subject as the telegraph, and although the history of the rise and progress of the postal service is in his old vein, the details concerning the telephone and phonograph differ little from those fully given of late in various publications.

Mr. W. H. G. Kingston is indeed untiring, for here is "True Blue" (Griffith and Farran), a fresh sea story of the last century and the glorious 1st of June. "True Blue," however, unlike its forerunners, is undeniably dull, its hero is too perfect, and the perpetual sea-fights which stud nearly every page become monotonous at last. Nevertheless the book would be well fitted for a ship library from its sound good teaching.—Moral lessons are also conveyed by "Great and Small," from the French by H. Poole (same publishers), an agreeable story of Gallic juveniles; while there are some entertaining stories in "Animals and their Social Powers," by M. T. Andrewes (Griffith and Farran), printed in large type for unpractised readers.—Just in time for the holidays comes the half-yearly volume of "Little Folks" (Cassell), a very mine of wealth to the young ones.

There is considerable merit in "My Star," by Berthe Vadier (F. Warne), scraps of autobiography woven into a short story, charmingly and simply written.—So much cannot be said for "Violet Stuart," by H. E. P. (Charing Cross Publishing Company); while as to "The Painted Deal Locker" (same publishers), by R. S. Freeman, which purports to contain stories and poems "declined with thanks," the contents strikingly demonstrate the good sense of obdurate editors.—Nos. 2 and 3 of the new series of the "Tales from Blackwood" (W. Blackwood), maintain the interest of the first volume, more particularly No. 3, which includes the "Battle of Dorking."—Sad feelings are aroused by "The Last Four Days of the Eurydice," by Captain Verney (Simpkin and Marshall). The small volume narrates the probable events of the last days on board, with other details respecting the lost ship, and the profits of the sale are intended for the Eurydice Fund.—Lovers of the days of Wallace will be interested in "The Burning of the Barns of Ayr," by the Marquis of Bute (A. Gardner), an enlarged form of a lecture delivered by him on an incident of the Scotch uprising against Edward I.

The time appointed for the opening of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre at Stratford-upon-Avon—April 23rd, 1879—is fast approaching, and the Council of the Shakespeare Memorial Association have brought out a "History of the Shakespeare Memorial" (Cassell), which relates what has already been done, and what it is further proposed to do. It is hoped that the History will awaken fresh interest in the scheme.

Sermons, not in stones but in newspaper clippings, are preached by Mr. Spurgeon in a fresh, tiny volume of his Shilling Series, "The Bible and the Newspaper" (Passmore and Alabaster). From the current events of the first quarter of this year, as chronicled in the columns of the daily journals, Mr. Spurgeon deduces some salutary lessons, drawn with that terseness and vigour which have won him so much fame.—School-books are so often written in a style above childish comprehension, that the learners too frequently can only grasp the words without the sense. "Simple Lessons for Home Use" (E. Stanford), however, fully carries out the promise of its title. Couched in clear straightforward language, these papers cannot fail to be understood by children; and collected together in their present form will be as useful for home teaching as for regular school instruction. The lessons are by Mrs. Fenwick Miller and Messrs. Proctor, Buckmaster, Morris, Bevan, &c., and embrace a wide range of subjects, from food, health, clothing, and the structure of the body, to astronomy, weather, birds, and flowers.

The first volume of the new series of "Design and Work" (Purkess), with its interesting details of recent inventions, is a very storehouse of information for mechanics.—Two stories by the late Professor Aytoun and Mr. Francillon form the contents of the fourth volume of "Tales from Blackwood" (Blackwood).

SWIMMING

The appalling catastrophe on the Thames shows, among other teachings, how urgently necessary it is that more attention should be paid to the value of swimming as an art. Incontestibly, additional scores of human lives might have been saved had a knowledge of this art been the rule, instead of the exception. The distance from shore, though considerable, was not beyond the reach of a moderate swimmer; but the power of swimming even a dozen yards might have enabled many a hapless person to grasp hold of a means of safety instead of sinking into the merciless waters. Among other excellent remarks on this subject in Charles Knight's "English Cyclopædia," it is well observed that, "Next to walking, there is no art more necessary for man to be adept at than that of swimming. To quadrupeds this art comes naturally, but with bipeds such is not the case. A horse or a dog on entering the water for the first time is able to swim by making the same motions as he does to walk on land; whereas the human frame is far heavier than the animal one in proportion to its displacement of water, and the relative position of the centre of gravity is different. Sea-girt and intersected by so many inland streams as Great Britain is, the inhabitants of no other country in the world have better opportunities of learning the art of swimming. In addition to this, we are more on the water, both in pursuit of commerce and of pleasure, than any other nation in the world; and yet" (this is the cogent matter in reference to the subject of the recent calamity) "the per-centage of English men and English women who can swim is notoriously less than in any other country." This last statement seems to us somewhat exaggerated, but the degree of truth contained in it is lamentably certain.

What a heart-breaking list is that which our maritime records present of valuable lives lost at sea by the wrecking and burning of ships! How can any reasonable person evade the conviction that hundreds of these lives might have been saved had swimming been more in favour? Think of the President, disappearing when on her way to America, and consigning every person on board (so far as is known) to a watery grave. Think of the Dundas, with the loss of the captain and most of the passengers; and of the Ocean Monarch, burnt to the water's edge off Orme's Head, involving the sacrifice of 180 lives; and of the Amazon, also lost by burning, with passengers and crew in great number sunk in the waves. (For it is worthy of note that most of the sufferers in a burning ship find a grave of water, not of fire.) Then we read that noble example of calm discipline the sinking of 440 human beings in the Birkenhead troop-ship, wrecked near the African coast: how the soldiers obeyed the word of command as steadily as if on parade, literally going down into the deep as they stood; and the Dunbar, losing 120 valuable lives at the entrance to Sydney harbour, after she had successfully braved the dangers of the open ocean; and the Royal Charter, returning prosperously from Australia to be finally wrecked upon our very shores, and 459 persons drowned; and the London, losing 220 of her passengers and crew by wreck in the Bay of Biscay, while on the way out with a large body of emigrants. Taking them in the order of date, there was next the loss of the splendid turret ship-of-war Captain, carrying to the bottom of the Atlantic the awful number of 490 officers and crew, including Captain Burgoyne, Captain Cowper Coles (inventor of that hapless ship), a son of Mr. Childers the statesman, and a son of Lord Northbrook the recent Viceroy of India.

If we continue the melancholy catalogue to later years, we find, in 1873, the case of the White Star steamer Atlantic, which was lost while crossing the ocean whose name she bore, consigning 560 human lives to the waters; and the Northfleet, run down by the Murillo off Dungeness, with a loss of nearly 300. In 1874 the Cospatrick, which, on her way to New Zealand with 480 passengers and crew, foundered, carrying with her all but five of the doomed people; in the same year the La Plata, wrecked while conveying a telegraphic cable to some distant station, losing the cable and (much more sad) 68 of the persons on board. The year 1875 was full of such disasters—the Schiller, involving the loss of 312 lives, off the Scilly Islands; the Deutschland, 70 lives, at the Kentish Knock; the Strathmore emigrant ship, 44 lives, on the route to New Zealand; and the little Mistletoe, run down by the Alberta near the Isle of Wight. In 1876 took place the loss of the Franconia with 17 lives, cut down by the Strathclyde off Dover; and of the Pacific, near California, 150 lives. The black list for 1877 and 1878 is too well known to need recapitulation.

Beyond all doubt, as we have said, multitudes of the lives sacrificed in these and similar calamities might have been saved had the crews and passengers been versed in swimming. The long-enduring displays need not be emulated; a man may save his life although he cannot, like Captain Webb, swim for twenty-two consecutive hours. Nor is scientific swimming a sine quâ non. It is a secondary matter to be told by experts that the side-stroke is more effective than the breast-stroke, and that by its means a swimmer can pierce the water, or glide over its surface, four miles in fifty minutes. Of course the quicker a swimmer effects his work the more chance he has of reaching the shore or a passing vessel; but the main point is to acquire the power of floating and swimming in a moderate degree, instead of hastening the approach of death by wildly flinging about the arms.

Water employments, water amusements, water accidents—all tell in the same direction; all point to the urgent need for an extended knowledge of the art of swimming. How many are the families into which desolation is brought every summer and autumn by accidents during bathing! It is really disgraceful that in our large national and public institutions so much indifference is displayed on this matter. The Royal Navy, the Mercantile Marine, the colleges and great public schools, workhouse schools, Reformatory schools—nearly all the adults and youngsters could be taught swimming if there were only the will to set about it; difficulties there would be, but these, could be surmounted.

Nor is it to one sex only that these observations apply. Females number largely among our emigrants, among our pleasure parties on river steamers, among our visitors to seaside resorts; and surely the saving of their lives is a matter worth taking into account! Some years ago a clever tract was written (we believe by Miss Powers) advocating the practice of swimming by women and girls. She said, "It is remarkable and strange how small is the number of female bathers one sees even in our best watering places, and in the beautiful rivers of our inland towns many never bathe at all. One great reason of this is, that most of us cannot swim, and consequently cannot obtain the full benefit and enjoyment which bathing is calculated to bestow." This lady was honorary secretary to a Sanitary Association. She spoke out bravely for all alike, but in reference more particularly to her own sex her remarks were really valuable: "There is a method of floating which requires very little exertion, and by which even a weak woman may sustain herself on the surface of the water for several hours. Now, when an accident happens, even a dozen yards from land, women can do nothing but cling in helpless groups to some brave man who risks his life to save them, and the result is, all sink in one miserable heap."

A woman or girl need not be a show-swimmer like Agnes Beckwith or Emily Parker; much more humble achievements would have sufficed to save scores of lives from the hapless Princess Alice. But men and boys should first set the example, by learning to swim.

We may add that Mr. J. Garratt Elliott, Hon. Secretary of the London Swimming Club, lately addressed a letter to The Times, mentioning a fact which is but little understood by the general public:—"We are continuing our gratuitous tuition, which has gone on uninterruptedly since 1869; any one can obtain a ticket entitling him to free instruction by applying here for one. The terrible loss of life [adverting to the Princess Alice] should cause this matter to be taken up by the Government. Sums of money are annually voted for horse-racing; and I think it high time that swimming should have some encouragement and State patronage." Or else, we would say, municipal and corporate aid.

EXCURSION TRAINS

We suppose that there is no country where the excursion system has developed itself more strongly than in this country, although in France at the present time it prevails to an extraordinary extent in consequence of the Great Exhibition. It has certainly given great advantages to industrious bread-winners who are obliged to study economy in all its branches. The system has so many permutations and combinations that it pretty well extends, under varying conditions, to all classes of society. We have excursions round the world and excursions to Little Pedlington. The system is not without drawbacks which might be ameliorated, and a danger of wounds and death which might altogether be eliminated from the programme. The system answers so many purposes of utility and pleasure, and is so firmly interwoven with our ways of living, that it is not likely that the annual catastrophe, or any number of them, will permanently affect their popularity. By it the scattered members of poor families are enabled to meet, a courteous healthy exchange is kept up between town and country, new and beautiful neighbourhoods are opened up, and all classes can have pleasant tours on reasonable terms. It cannot, however, be said that the companies invariably show them that amount of courtesy and consideration which is due to the considerable item which they constitute in their revenues. Excursionists are a much enduring race, and stand with good humour any amount of procrastination and contumely. Some persons have been advocating the abolition of Lord Campbell's Act, but the public will be slow to part with this safeguard, and would rather desire an extension of its provisions.

We have tried the excursion system in various parts of the country. In some parts it has been admirably managed, so much so, that we are inclined to doubt whether it is absolutely necessary that the train should arrive so late that it is time to leave directly it gets in, and whether a little management might not avert the necessity for being shunted for several hours together. All the usual rapidity and regularity often disappear in the case of an excursion train, which perhaps has something to do with the alarming percentage of accident. The history of a metropolitan excursion train is stereotyped. It presents a few invariable salient features. We start in good health and good spirits; not very punctually, indeed, but we give a laughing welcome to the boys and girls, not to say the old women with bandboxes, running along the platform. The great majority of the passengers are third-class, and genial camaraderie and good cheer are the order of the day. Even at this early stage chance friendships are struck up, and mysterious-looking bottles exhibited in the early stage of amity. The journey down is always pleasant. The English landscape, garden and park combined, present a perfect diorama of features of interest. Then we have all of us the penny papers to fall back upon. The talk of a third-class carriage is always worth listening to. There is no social disguise to interfere with plain statements or plain exhibitions of character. There is a great deal of downright argument. Sometimes there is more than this. An individual in the compartment will rise up to address or preach to his brethren. It is just a chance whether a number set up a hymn, or whether an itinerant fiddler starts on spec. a comic tune, to be followed by a collection of halfpence. It is just as possible as not in the broken weather of last summer that the rain comes down, blotting out the landscape and steaming the windows. We will, however, adopt the favourable hypothesis that the weather is fine. The train reaches its destination, which we will assume to be Ramsgate or Margate, or some other favourite sea-side resort. There the cargo of passengers are poured forth, and all are left to their own devices. They are lost among the thronging multitudes on the roads, on the rocks, on the pier. An appreciable proportion of the metropolis, including a considerable number of the children of Israel, are settled here for a brief season, and they are daily reinforced by armies of excursionists. We exchange nods or kindly words with such of our fellow travellers as we chance to meet. We hurry back to the station, with stern notions of railway punctuality, at the time advertised for the return. We might have spared ourselves the hurry. For a long time there is no train at all, and we may enjoy the fast falling evening dew as much as we wish. Then train after train draws up, but it is not our train. The wonder is where all the trains have come from. We are not surprised to find that the signals are against us all the way up. The unpleasing idea is obtruded that, having taken our money, the Company is under no particular anxiety to completely fulfil the terms of the contract. The return journey is by no means so pleasing as the morning journey. We cannot see the landscape, and we cannot read the papers. Those who are inclined to quarrel, quarrel violently; and those who are inclined to make love, make love violently. The mysterious-looking bottle has been an active element, and not a very favourable one. Then the train stops, goes on, goes slowly, comes to a final pause. There is something wrong. In official language, traffic is suspended. When we are entering the region of London suburbs, when the best plan might have been to have got out and done the best for ourselves, we are detained for hours. We don't get out, for the night is cold and dark and rainy, and we know not what train might suddenly dash along those complicated steel or iron lines. When the pallid morning light is breaking in the east we enter the deserted terminus. Our poor friends often find that their cheap excursion has proved a very dear one. They have perhaps come from a distant suburb and have buoyed themselves up with the hope that they will catch the last omnibus or the last train on the District or the Metropolitan Railway. Instead of that they will have to charter a cab, which will cost them more than their railway ticket. Worse than that there may be no cab, and wife and little ones, ready to cry with fatigue, may have to trudge the weary miles home in the wet and cold. This undoes all the good which the excursion might have effected. They begin to think that the excursion itself is a delusion and a snare.

But it is not always so. We have taken an extreme case because it is also not an uncommon one, we fear. But there is a more cheerful side to be stated. In our modern life the excursion system is a great gain both to the health and intelligence of the poor. They often get their first view of the hills, the first gleam of the sea. In the summer our readers often see the numerous appeals for help to give the little ones a day in the sweet, fresh country air. And when town boys go into the country, the country boys are often sent up to town. They see the Zoological Gardens, and the Houses of Parliament, and Westminster Abbey. The town boys get their first view of lanes, and fields, and wayside ponds. Perhaps an East End parish pours forth its children, with many of the parents and friends. Six or seven hundred persons will thus come out at a time. An East End incumbent, who publishes his experience, says that some of the lads had never in a whole lifetime been in the country. "A bunch of withered last year's evergreens lying in the road seemed to them a treasure all too beautiful; they divided the leaves fairly, and decorated themselves with joy. But when they came into the veritable country lanes, they could not contain themselves. By lucky chance one had discovered in his pocket a lump of red ochre; they at once painted their faces, and gave themselves up to the delightful abandonment of savage life à la Robinson Crusoe. The well-conducted people who passed us in the road shook their heads sadly and sorrowfully, and yet the dear lads were as good as gold, and not one single wrong word was spoken."

To our mind the pleasantest specimens of the excursion trains are those which take us to the very end of the railway system in the Far West or the Far North. A very large proportion of the travellers go first-class. They are going for several weeks, to districts both romantic and remote, when the old stage coach supplements the railway, or you have to hire or proceed on Shanks's famous mare. There is a whole pleasant day in the journey down and another in the journey back, in which anticipations and reminiscences are exchanged. There are the tourists who work up the history, archæology, and scenery of a neighbourhood, and rather enjoy the use of money than the spending of it. Some excursion trains are gratefully remembered as giving facilities never enjoyed years ago, and at a time when extended knowledge and taste have enabled us to make the most of them.

A SUSSEX STOOL-BALL MATCH

During a recent stay at a country house situated in one of the pleasantest parts of Sussex, within a short distance of an ancient town famous for its traditional observance of the Fifth of November, I had an opportunity for the first time of becoming acquainted with what may be called a specialty peculiar to the eastern division of the county. A ten miles' drive through shady lanes and by picturesquely grouped cottages and well-stocked farmyards brought us to our destination, a noble Elizabethan mansion, sheltered by the adjoining Downs and by its own extensive, rook-colonised woods, and as soon as the last carriage had arrived with its expected contingent of visitors, and an ample luncheon had been done justice to, the whole party adjourned to a spacious lawn in front of the house, and eagerly awaited the commencement, whether as actors or spectators, of the great event of the day.

The Rev. W. D. Parish, in his ably compiled and highly interesting "Dictionary of the Sussex Dialect," describes as follows the strictly local pastime we were about to witness, under the heading of "Stool-ball, an old Sussex game, similar in many respects to cricket, played by females. It has lately been revived in East Sussex by the establishment of stool-ball clubs in many villages. The game," he adds, "is thus alluded to in Poor Robin's Almanack for 1740:—

> Now milkmaids' pails are deckt with flowers,
> And men begin to drink in bowers:
> Sweet sillabubs, and lip-loved tansey
> For William is prepared by Nancy.
> Whilst hob-nailed Dick and simp'ring Frances
> Trip it away in country dances:
> At stool-ball and at barley-break,

Stool-ball, as remarked by the above-quoted writer, greatly resembles cricket, inasmuch as it is played by eleven on a side, each of whom has her appointed post corresponding with the ordinary positions of fielders, with the exception of the bowler, who takes her stand midway between the wickets. These consist of a long staff firmly fixed in the ground, at the top of which is a square piece of wood, which is, in fact, the wicket, a ball striking any other portion of the staff counting for nothing; the bats, or rather rackets, are of heavyish wood, and the balls the same as those used for lawn tennis. The number of balls constituting an "over" varies according to the decision of the captains of the contending elevens, but generally consists of twelve; in every other respect, including the obligatory presence of umpires, the similarity between the two games is complete.

On the afternoon in question—for two o'clock had struck before the fair athletes were ready for the fray—the sides were composed of the younger branches of the leading county families in the neighbourhood within a radius of ten or twelve miles, supplemented by a few village girls admitted to make up the indispensable twenty-two. The captain of one eleven was a bright-eyed damsel, wearing the badge of her local club representing a grasshopper; while the opposing team, in whose success I was mainly interested from the circumstance of my host's three daughters being members thereof, had for its chief a lady becomingly attired in white and violet, but evidently inexperienced in the important matter of placing her field. Our side (as I may venture to call it) having lost the toss, the others elected to go in, and the game began; but it was clear, after the first half-dozen overs, during which some thirty runs were scored without the loss of a wicket, and two catches awkwardly missed, that our party were deplorably overmatched, and that, barring accidents, the "Grasshoppers" were destined to have it all their own way. Their principal champion—a very doughty one, in a costume of olive green—belonging to a numerous family in this division of Sussex, two others of the same name forming part of the eleven, a fourth officiating as umpire, and a fifth (if I am not mistaken) as scorer, completely puzzled the bowlers by the freedom of her hitting; and when, after remaining more than an hour at the wicket, she was ultimately caught out, her contribution to the aggregate score amounted to no less than forty-eight runs. She was admirably seconded by the captain and by a tall, handsome girl, sister of the Châtelaine, the hardest hitter, and perhaps best all-round player of her side; but these once disposed of, the remainder gave comparatively little trouble, and the innings closed with a total of a hundred and twenty-one.

It was already past four, and arrangements having been previously made for the convenience of all parties that play should cease at six, very few minutes elapsed before the fielders were at their respective posts, and the two leading performers of our eleven took their place at the wickets. One of these, a fair-haired lassie, who in the excitement of the game had divested herself of her hat, soon received her quietus; but her companion, foremost among the keenest stool-ball players in the county, was not to be so easily got rid of, and manifestly intended doing her utmost towards retrieving the fortunes of the day. In vain change after change of bowling was resorted to, in vain "point," personated by a diminutive village girl of india-rubber elasticity, who never let a ball go by her, kept her watchful eyes on the formidable racket, its gallant wielder, improving on the example of Dr. Watts's "busy bee," gathered runs instead of honey, and had already succeeded in scoring thirty-seven when an untimely catch at long-off abruptly terminated her career, and delivered the "outs" from their most dangerous opponent.

From this moment all went wrong with us; our captain did little or nothing, the village recruits proved to be absolute duffers, and were bowled down one after another like nine-pins, and two of my own particular trio, whose attire, by the way, of flannel, with crimson jupes, was orthodoxy itself, succumbed to the excellence of the fielding and the indefatigable activity of the wicket-keeper, while the third, who had distinguished herself in the previous innings by a remarkably clever catch close to the ground, was finally left without a partner, and triumphantly carried out her bat. At twenty minutes to six the last of our rustic auxiliaries, a small girl with a huge straw bonnet, having been "clean bowled," and our total score amounting only to fifty-eight, the match was announced to have resulted, as had been generally anticipated, in the victory of the "Grasshoppers" by sixty-three runs. Half-an-hour later we were all on our way homewards.

ALL THE WORLD AT PARIS

Chapter VI.

> Through Paris streets with turban fair,
> And caftan streaming in the air,
> I saunter on—the admiration
> Of this short-coated population.
> This sewed-up race—this buttoned nation—
> Who, while they boast their law so free,

"The light of civilisation, as well as the light of the sun, must rise in the East," as though the sun rose in China.

Last night, as we went to see Les Fourchambault, we witnessed a touching act of Eastern munificence. We found ourselves following in the train of two Indians in red and light green puggrees and blue caftans, who were streaming down the Boulevards, the observed of all observers.

The Indians seemed fascinated by them (their own legs were little better). They studied them closely for a minute or so, and then gave her a trifle.

She expected, no doubt, all the wealth of Ormus and of Ind, but she was disappointed.

Les Fourchambault was very good. People laughed a good deal all round us, and we struggled hard to see the jokes.

It is our last day but one in Paris, our very last at the Exposition. We are to make it as long as possible by going there at 8 a.m., which we can do by paying 1fr. extra.

Fancy having the whole Exposition to ourselves!

To get at it we pass through a restaurant—a restaurant in the early morning. There is no more sickening sight!

Tables unwashed and beastly, waiters undressed and horrid, floors littered and filthy—could anything fit to eat come out of it?

In the picture galleries the portraits seemed to welcome us with a smile. They knew we were not critics. One or two of these kings of terrors were gliding about jotting down truculent notes, "at every word" of which "a reputation dies."

Hoarse organs were being tuned, jangling pianos strummed.

Now was the chance to surprise the Japanese in déshabille; but no—they were up and dressed in their dreadful black coats, trousers, and neckties—nice little, ugly, miniature men.

We walked through the street of the machines. Most of them were covered up and sleeping peacefully.

One or two had woke, and with a selfishness well-nigh human were whistling might and main to wake all the rest up. The boot-cleaning machine was tucked up comfortably. Papa gently lifted the corner of its coverlid and looked at it with eyes beaming with love—"Slumber, my darling," those eyes seemed to say, "till ten o'clock, then begin afresh thy pretty ways, and go on, tiring every one, thyself untired, till bed-time." * * *

Dear affectionate machine-tickling old aphid! as the author of "Erewhon" calls man, the machine-parasite of the future.

We couldn't get him away. "If we wanted to see the Eastern people, we might go. They were savages and he didn't like them." So we left him alone in his glory.

Even Mamma did not care for the Eastern people, for she said they were not Christians. But Lillie and I loved them. They were so interesting and picturesque.

First we went to see those two kind Indians who were the makers, we found, of those lovely shawls one of which it is the ambition of each of us to own some day. It was past ten now, and people were crowding round them. An Englishwoman, who had been in India, was twisting her face into all sorts of shapes in her endeavours to speak to them. They smiled at her with a half puzzled, half amused expression. We thought she was making herself very conspicuous.

In the Chinese Court one of the great Panjandrums with the feather brushes (for they all wore little buttons on top) had been attracted by a pretty little child, carried in the arms of a pretty little nursemaid.

Even Panjandrums are philo-progenitive. The maid drew back afraid. She had heard that Chinamen ate puppies, and thought they might have a taste for babies, too.

Two women from the country seized the chance of trying whether the Chinaman's pigtail was of real hair. They will be trying ours' next.

Hideously ugly these good women were!—and I had heard them say of the Chinamen a minute before "Comme ils sont laids, ils sont épouvantables."

She gave us her address, No. 5, Rue de Toulon, Algiers.

Two Moorish girls sit embroidering in the midst of a wealth of silks and embroideries, brasses, and vases most tastefully arranged. The Moorish girls are not shams. Their jet black eyebrows and eyes, and nimble hands, are all that is to be seen of them.

People stare and stare in at the portico, and the women think there is something uncanny about those muffled-up figures, and say "They are not Christians, you know."

We passed by the stall of a frightful black dressed in red fez and blue jacket selling sugar-plums, of all things in the world. Never did trade and tradesman seem more ill-matched.

He roared out ever and anon, with a bull-like bellow, "Bomboms, bomboms d'Avrique!"

He roared, as one may say, "like any sucking dove." Lillie ventured to sketch him. Some one came to warn her that he was an exceeding fierce giant, and as a Mussulman would not be sketched at any price. In fact, the Gnome, Ghoul, Spahi, or whatever he was, seemed to smell the blood of an artist, and stalked towards us threateningly.

P.S. by Mr. Ogle:—

I have had my day at last, and enjoyed myself thoroughly—spent it amongst the machinery mostly.

For a whole week have I been dragged about, looking at pictures, and savages, and a pack of gimcracks. What's the use of 'em?

What's the use of Charlie's Greek and Latin when he don't know a piston from a cylinder?

I shouldn't mind all the money I have spent on Lillie's schooling if she would only draw me that boot-cleaning machine, but she says it isn't picturesque.

I have been somewhere else. I wouldn't have them know it for the world. After dinner an American (a good fellow, only he smokes too much) took me to a kind of garden to see a bit of life.

Galvanised life, I call it! On my honour, I wouldn't have believed it. I wouldn't really. Talk of devil dancers from Ceylon! Why there's no women amongst 'em, at any rate. And here is France just now setting herself up as schoolmistress of the world, and this is the spectacle of her civilisation that she offers to the outer barbarians now in Paris.

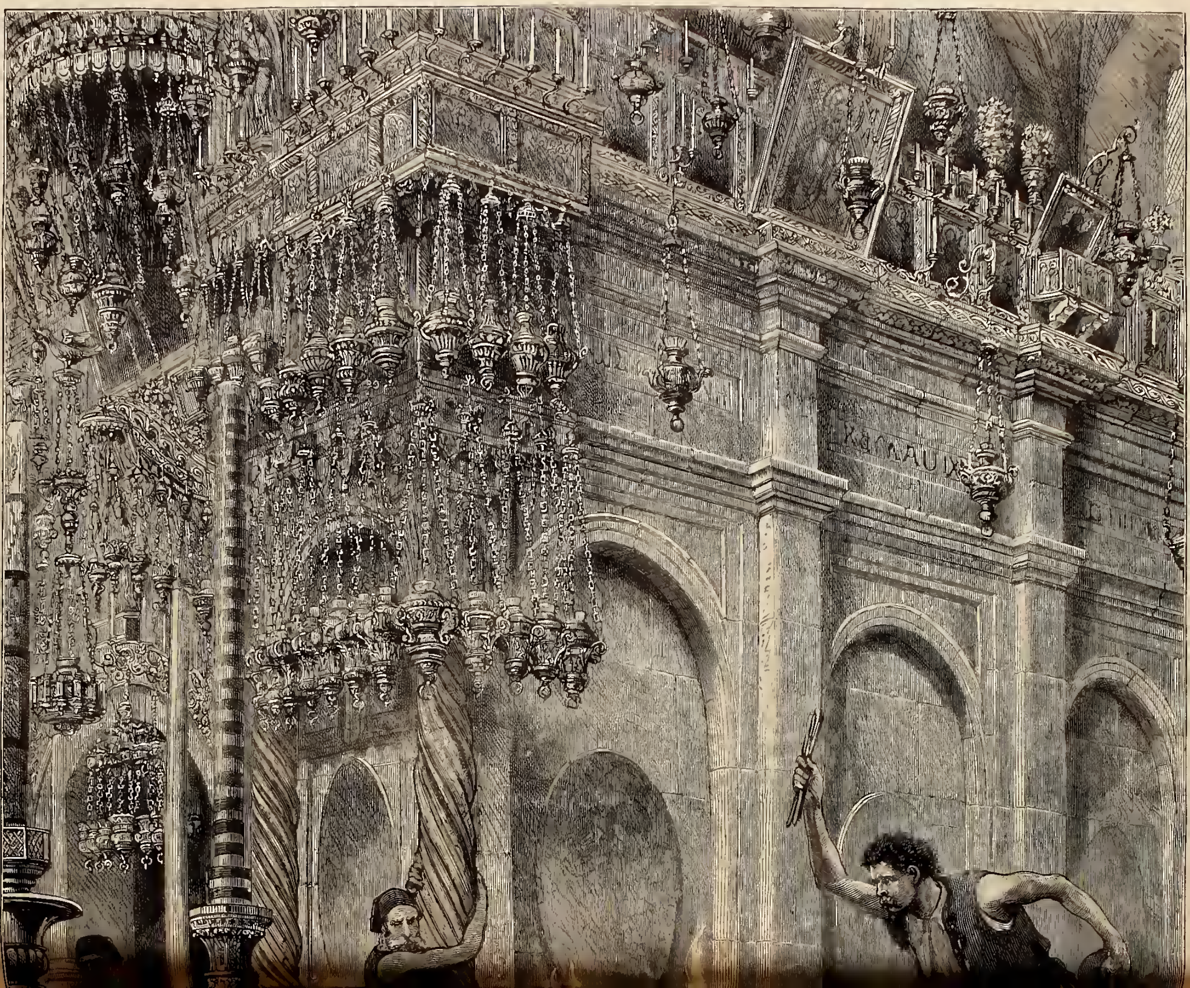
HOG-HUNTING IN BENGAL

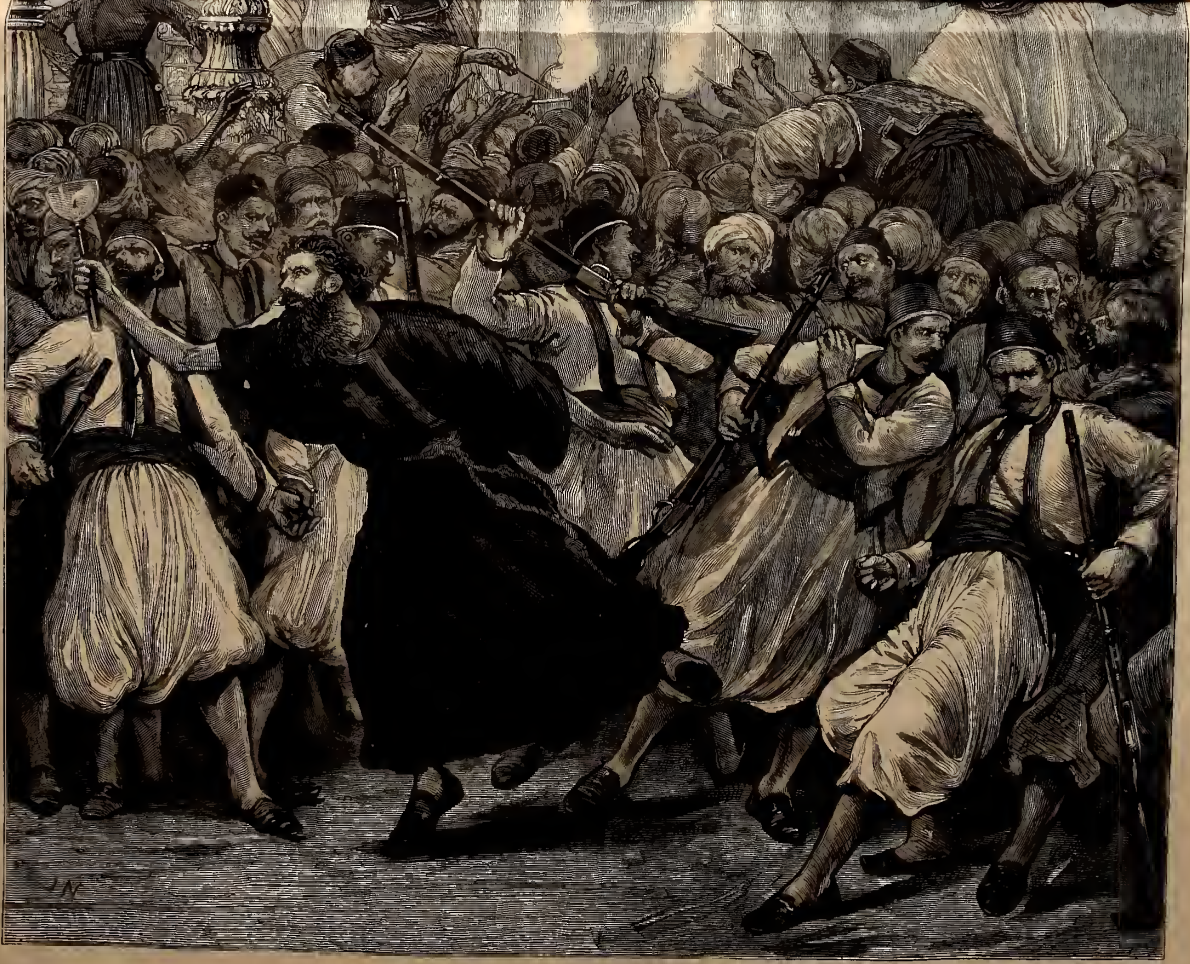
"The Start from Camp."—Sportsmen who love to start at daylight, or even before, find that, when the sport is at its best, their men are getting sulky with hunger and fatigue, and that, when the cards are dealt for the rubber after dinner, it is a hard matter to keep their eyes open. The gentlemen before us have breakfasted comfortably; have given the elephants time to bring in their forage, and the men to dispose of their piles of boiled rice, and are prepared to go on beating till daylight fails them, or till all their hunters are knocked up. The Collector, moreover, has already got through a good morning's work, has listened to scores of reports, and has passed hundreds of orders, which he is now signing rapidly, while his bearer buckles on his spurs, and his khidmatgar is stirring his last cup of tea. He works hard, does the Indian district officer, and, when in the saddle of the well-bred Australian who is waiting for him, will show that he can put some energy into his play too. A party of jungle people, not Mahomedan ryots, but lovers of pork and keen sportsmen, attended by their dogs, are in attendance to show the likely ground for hog, and gaze with wonder on the white-faced ruler, the representative to them of the great but mysterious Government. Several gentlemen, eager for the fray, are already mounted, and moving off with the first batch of beaters, one of them sorely discomposed in his seat by the gambols of his light-hearted horse. Another, in the centre of the picture, lighting his pipe before putting his gun together, will take command of the line of elephants, and on his judgment and unselfish diligence will depend much of the sport of the day. We will hope that, by way of recompense for his labours on behalf of others, he will have the luck of a shot at a leopard—where there are hog, leopards are seldom far away. His howdah is being made fast; the beater elephants are ready, and cluster in the background; on the pad of one of them certain refreshments, principally liquid, are being stowed; the sweeper is coupling up the dogs, and the last of the sportsmen comes forth from his tent towards the weight-carrying hunter, who with ears laid back, and haunches tucked in, shows strong disapproval of the burden which he has to bear.

The line of elephants has been formed, and advances slowly along a wide valley, now covered with thick reeds and grass, with a narrow stream winding between deep banks from side to side, but a few months ago the bed of a mighty rushing river. The spears have taken up their positions, hidden by bushes, on the edge of the high ground above, and have not long to wait before the rush of unseen animals through the grass and the trumpeting of startled elephants proclaim that the game is on foot. From the howdah the leader shouts his orders, to keep the line unbroken and force the hogs from the water towards the open country, but again and again, though not one black back has been seen above the grass, the invisible enemy, refusing to face the plain, breaks back through the line of elephants, scattering them in affright; again and again the impatient spears dash into the sea of grass, and try to ride the hog out, only to return baffled to their posts; but the time comes at last, and, one after another, from a corner where a ravine runs up into the plain, sows and squeakers and half-grown boars slip out, and trot quietly across the open towards a distant covert. The horses plunge wildly with excitement as they recognise the hog, but shouts of warning from the howdah keep the riders still, and at last, bigger far than anything that has broken yet, with his ivory glistening in the sun, "the boar shows in the open," and stands listening intently for sounds of his foes. He knows that danger for him is not with the elephants, but in the open country. Now, gentlemen, keep perfectly quiet and out of sight until he is well away, and then you may ride.

"The Gallop."—No rushing mob of spears here, racing for first blood, and jostling one another over the Pubna mustard fields, but each man riding for his own hand in a rough country, that three months ago was a lake six feet deep, then mud poached by the hoofs of buffaloes, and, lastly, baked hard by the sun; hillocks, fissures, and deep pools, all hidden from sight by long grass and rose bushes; the boar leading the dance at a pace that keeps the horses at a stretching gallop; frequently lost to view as he plunges into heavier patches of jungle; the riders needing all their eyesight to keep the quarry in view, and leaving the horses to deal unaided with the difficulties of the ground. We gallop unheeding where, in cooler moments, we should hesitate to ride at all, dimly seeing the white egret as he rises from the water's edge, and the jackal as he skulks from under the hunter's hoof, and we think of nothing but that dark grey back fleeting ever through the grass before us, and seeming no nearer than when first we started in pursuit. Our only hope is that we are pushing him so straight that he must soon be in cultivated country, and we can catch him then.

"Riding Jealous for the Spear."—Will you or I win the honour of first blood? Over the bare rice fields the tiring hog had no chance with the long stride of the "Romeo" blood. He turned short that last time, and now crosses the narrow lane down which a string of empty carts is crawling from the village.





AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND, VI.—THE HOLY FIRE IN THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE AT JERUSALEM DURING THE GREEK EASTER

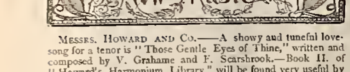
Neither man nor horse will dream of turning now; a hollow lane with a cart in it looks ugly, but it is really nothing for a willing hunter, and we are riding for the spear.

"The First Spear Lost—and Won."—This boar runs better than he fights. Once, twice, he jinks, and disappoints the bloodthirsty blade that hangs within two inches of his back, but the third swerve clears one foe only to meet another, and the diamond-shaped head at last sinks deep into his brawny shoulder. He will run no more; he will fight now to the end.

After receiving the first spear, the boar stands for some seconds, facing his foes, and then, while they pull up their blown horses and turn to attack him again, he trots slowly away. It needs only the gallop of an assailant to bring him round with a gallant charge, and, unless eye and hand and heel serve truly together to meet him, the horse will suffer. Retreating and turning, charging again and again, only to be met with a steady point, the boar fights his way to a stream of water, and here we have to finish him. This is no easy matter; the bottom is probably deep and sticky, and if the hunter cannot jump out as quickly as he jumps in, he is sure to be cut. Our friend in the background has left his spear in the hog, and, while he waits for the after rider to bring him another, looks down anxiously at his horse's stifle, as if he shrewdly suspected that the tusk had come home. We cannot let the boar beat us thus; come up, old horse, you must mind your footing, and I will mind the spear.

After the victory we must count the cost. He must have made good his charge, and got under the horse, for he has cut him a deep long gash in the further stifle. The hunter will be useless for a month at least. The experienced sportsman, in view of such accidents, never fails to carry in his pocket, stuck into a cork, one or two curved needles, and now, while the syce holds up a foreleg to prevent a kick, and a friend looks critically at the operation, he applies a stitch or two to bring the edges of the wound together. The after-rider indulges himself and his pony with a drink from a tank, on the opposite side of which the second horses are coming up, and the third of the gentlemen in at the death is pulling his spear out of the dead boar.

We have made our way to the shady spot, whither the grey-bearded khansaman has brought the luncheon. The five who started from camp in the morning were not all present during the pursuit, or at the death of the boar, but none are absent now. One, still on his horse, is giving orders to his syces; a second, with solicitude not unnatural, considering the country over which he has been galloping, is passing his hand down his hunter's back sinews; a third is looking at the dead boars which the coolies are bringing in; and the other two, with a healthy eye to the business of the moment, have commenced an attack on the provender. One has had his first drink, and, with his bottle by his side, is going on to something more substantial, while the other, holding a tumbler with something in it, eyes the old man with a fiercely thirsty expression, as he fumbles with the wire of a soda-water bottle.—Our engravings are from sketches by Mr. E. Vesey Westmacott, B.C.S., who has also furnished the foregoing description.



New Music

Messrs. Howard and Co.——A showy and tuneful love-song for a tenor is "Those Gentle Eyes of Thine," written and composed by V. Grahame and F. Scarsbrook.—Book II. of "Howard's Harmonium Library" will be found very useful by students of that instrument; it contains nine easy pieces, five of which are by the editor, F. Scarsbrook; a pleasing melody in C, "Allegretto in A," "Marche à la Fête," "Allegretto in D," and "Slow Movement in C," all equally good and very easy for inexperienced fingers and feet. The remaining four are a simple but musicianly "Adagio in C," and an "Interlude" by Niemann, together with a pleasing "Slow Movement" in G, by T. Whitford, and a "Prelude in F," by W. Wilson.—A brief, showy pianoforte duet is "The Knight's Return," a so-called "grand march," by Carl Volti, arranged by Alfred Mullen.—S. Bagnall's pretty song, "Beautiful Lily," has been faithfully transcribed for the pianoforte by C. Greenwell.—"Sunny Wavelets," a morceau de salon for the pianoforte by Wm. Smallwood, will be welcomed by his youthful patrons (for whom he has written so little of late). It is a graceful, though easy piece.—There is little or nothing to say in praise of the badly executed, though well-intentioned, frontispiece and music of "The Capstan Polka," designed and composed respectively by A. Councan and W. J. Roberts.

Messrs. Wood and Co.——Two more than ordinarily good songs, music by Eugene Tiesset, are "La Vedova" (The Widow), a Sicilian lullaby, translated from the dialect by E. H. C., and "The Vesper Bell;" the former is composed for a contralto, the latter for a mezzo-soprano, both display a refinement of musical ideas.—"Murmures Æoliens," 2nd caprice brilliant, by Carlo Tiesset, is worthy of its title, and, if played clearly and correctly, will produce an excellent effect; it is, however, a pitfall for the scrambler and indifferent timist.—No. II. of "Perles Classiques" for the pianoforte, edited and fingered by Carlo Tiesset, is Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso" (Op. 14).

Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co.——A very doleful song for a contralto, albeit both music, by Miss M. Lindsay, and words, by E. Oxenford, are excellent in their way, is "When Summer Dies." This song is published in C and D to suit a contralto or soprano voice.—Pleasing poetry allied to a suitable melody, the former by Mrs. Hemans, the latter by Ciro Pinsuti, are combined in "Soft Star of the Night," a narrative song of medium compass.—Dull, though possibly sleep-provoking, are both words and music of "Sing Me to My Slumbers," written and composed by Mrs. Crawford and Ciro Pinsuti.—"Classical Extracts from the Works of Great Composers," by J. Duval, are superior to the general run of fragmentary excerpts of the same genus; in seven pages we have "Andante from Beethoven's Funeral March Sonata," the "Nocturno" from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, and an "Impromptu," by F. Schubert, a concentrated tuneful essence of which, could the composers enter a protest, we should hear a fierce complaint.—"The Coronation March from Le Prophète" has been more or less elaborately arranged by transcribers, adaptors, &c., since first Meyerbeer's opera made its appearance. F. Lemoine has failed to discover a new field for originality in his adaptation therefrom.—An excellent schoolroom study after the holidays is "The Flowers of the Forest," by W. S. Rockstro.—Two sets of waltzes of a very ordinary type, by Claude Davenport, give promise for the future; they are entitled "Queen of Hearts," with a frontispiece ugly enough to condemn them for the general public, and "The Swallow's Farewell," the better of the two both from an inward and exterior point of view.

Miscellaneous.——Glowing with eager enthusiasm Russell Day composed the music and Linnæus Banks supplied the wholesome words for a patriotic song dedicated to Lord Beaconsfield—who is always willing to bear and forbear. The title of this song is "England's Great State Pilot," compass from E to F; chorus which terminates thus:—

May bravely bid defiance
To the Cæsars of the world.

(Messrs. Metzler and Co.).—"Tears, Idle Tears," a pathetic poem by Alfred Tennyson, has inspired more than one composer to a melodious setting before Lady Ross, who has nevertheless done well for a mezzo-soprano (J. B. Cramer).—Very simple words by "Rita" have been elaborately set to music by Carli Zoeller, under the title of "Spring Time;" the best part of "The Berlin Congress Polka," by Leon Marteau, is the frontispiece, with its more than usually veracious portraits of those who who assisted thereat (Messrs. Neumayer and Co.).—"Le Gage d'Amitié" valse, by J. De Vaux, will probably please the friends of the composer, more especially the owners of the clasped hands as represented on the frontispiece (Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co.).

ERECTION OF CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE

Since the arrival of the Cleopatra in the Thames, after its perilous and disastrous voyage, the Obelisk has been the object of constant public attention. While the little vessel lay at anchor in the stream pending the decision of the question as to the most suitable site for the erection of the monolith, it was daily visited by scores of curious sightseers, and from May 30th, when the Cleopatra was moored alongside the Embankment, until last week, when the Obelisk was placed in its erect position, crowds of interested spectators assembled day by day to watch the progress of the engineering operations. The method of unshipping the huge stone and raising it in a horizontal position has already been described in our pages (Vol. 17, No. 444, June 1) and it now only remains to tell what was done last week, in the presence of some thousands of spectators, the wide roadway of the Embankment being thronged for some distance, and quite a fleet of boats and steamers occupying the river in front of the site. A saloon steamer had been specially engaged for the accommodation of those who were immediately concerned, amongst whom were Mr. Dixon, Dr. Erasmus Wilson, Admiral Sir E. Ommanney, several eminent engineers and architects, and some members of the Board of Trade.

At three o'clock the signal was given, and the ropes attached to the smaller end of the Needle being slackened, the giant beam gradually turned upon its axis as slowly as the minute hand of a clock; and so nicely had the centre of gravity been calculated, that little or no labour was needed to bring it into an exactly vertical position, some six inches above its pedestal. As soon as that was accomplished, the English and Egyptian flags were run up to the flag-staffs which had been lashed to its summit, and a ringing cheer from the spectators hailed the completion of the achievement. On board the saloon boat, votes of thanks were given to Mr. Erasmus Wilson for his gift, and to Mr. Dixon for the skill which he had displayed in bringing the monument from the Egyptian Desert and placing it upon the banks of the Thames.

On Friday the Obelisk was lowered to its pedestal, upon which it was found to rest in a perfectly perpendicular position.

All that now remains to be done is the building up of a few blocks of masonry, the cutting away of the ponderous iron stirrup and jacket, and the removal of the scaffolding, after which the monument will be thrown open to the full gaze of passers by on road and river.

The following exceedingly miscellaneous collection of articles was placed in the cavity in the base of the Obelisk:—

Standard foot and pound; a bronze model of the Obelisk, ½ in. scale to the foot; copies of Engineering printed on vellum, with plans of the mechanical contrivances employed in erecting and transporting the obelisk, together with its complete history; jars of Doulton ware; a fragment of the Obelisk itself, chipped from it in the process of levelling the base; a complete set of British coinage, including an Empress of India rupee; a parchment copy of Dr. Birch's translation of the obelisk's hieroglyphics; a standard gauge to 1,000th part of an inch; a portrait of Her Majesty the Queen; Bibles in French and English, the Hebrew Pentateuch, the Arabic Genesis, and a translation into 215 languages of the 16th verse of the 3rd chapter of St. John's Gospel; Bradshaw's Railway Guide; a shilling razor; a case of cigars; some pipes; a box of hairpins and sundry articles of feminine adornment; a feeding bottle and children's toys; a hydraulic jack, as used in raising the Obelisk; specimens of wire rope and submarine cables; twenty-four maps of London, copies of the daily and illustrated newspapers; a 2ft. rule, a London Directory, a Whitaker's Almanack, and last, not least, photographic likenesses of a dozen beautiful Englishwomen.

AN IDYLL OF MEMORIES

O golden years in Hellas long ago,
When Pan's wild truants, from the mountains ringing,
Made every river reed a pipe to blow,
When every maiden was a mouth for singing;

Danced the night dead in the Thessalian hollow;
When Tempè trembled to the timbrel strain,
Till Ossa blushed to greet her own Apollo;

Or, when with foaming vats the year was crowned,
Some village Orpheus, garlanded and hoary,
Would chant brave hymns of victors laurel-bound,
Or Colchian dragons, or the mystic story

Or bees that swarmed on poets' lips song-laden,
Or Hercules, in Scythian woodlands cold,

Or prowess of gaunt heroes, seamed with scars,
To whom the great gods gave to sit for guerdon
Ageless and passionless above the stars,
Watching the slow years drag their dreary burden.

O golden hours, when shepherds, long ago,
Striving in amorous music amœbean,
In white breasts, purer than the heart of snow,
Kindled the love light of the Cytherean.

But these things cruel centuries have thrust
Far from our eyes, and time that overtaketh
Kingdoms and crowns, hath made them but as dust,
Faded, like as a dream when one awaketh!

New Novels

"The Nabob: A Story of Parisian Life and Manners," by Alphonse Daudet, translated by E. Clavequin (3 vols.: Smith and Elder).—This is a translation of Daudet's "Le Nabab," a book which created no little impression in Paris, where every one was eager to recognise in its dramatis personæ portraits of the celebrities, political, financial, and artistic, of the Second Empire. How far the many guesses hazarded upon this point may be well founded we cannot take upon ourselves to say; the author, it seems, however, has declared that all the personages of his story are creations of his own fancy save two, the Nabob, Bernard Jansoulet, himself, and the Duke de Mora, standing of course for the famous Duc de Morny, who may truly be described as the "most brilliant incarnation," as well as the pillar, of the Second Empire, and whose private secretary Daudet for some time was. "I painted him," he has said, "with that impertinent and serene smile which he always wore whenever I happened to see him, and with which he liked to appear in public, in his double character of Richelieu-Brummell." That as a satirist, and the depictor of a singularly false, vicious, and rotten society the author shows very great power and ability there can be no question; but the reader is not long in learning that he must not look for anything like a complete and connected story in these pages. The scenes and episodes we come upon are knit together in the loosest fashion, and indeed there are many of them that might be passed over altogether, so far as their bearing on the whole is concerned. Jansoulet, "the Nabob," is a Frenchman of the extreme south, of the lowest and obscurest origin, who, after a youth of privation and misery, has somehow amassed a colossal fortune at Tunis under the patronage of the Bey. Like the true Frenchman that he is, his desire is naturally to spend his money in Paris and make a figure there. Of course he is forthwith surrounded and seized upon by a crowd of sharpers and adventurers, great and small, titled and untitled, who live upon him and flatter him, or promise to push him on in society, whilst they all plunder him remorselessly, in a style that even his wealth will not bear. The poor Nabob is, in truth, a great deal too good for his surroundings. His character has been drawn for us with great care; and, with all his faults, it is impossible not to feel a hearty liking for him. His frank avowal of his lowly birth; his desire to do good with his money; his willingness even to be robbed in moderation, as a sort of compensation that he owes the world for having become so very rich; his amiability; his gratitude for kindness; his tenderness towards his old mother; and his placability even to his rival and enemy, the banker Hemerlingue, who seeks to ruin him, and finally succeeds—are all traits in him that please and win our regard. It seems a hard lot that one so kindly and well-intentioned should incur so much hatred and be treated so cruelly. We have not the space to dwell on the picture we have here of the Duc de Morny, beyond saying that it is, on the whole, painted in colours far more favourable than we might have anticipated. We suppose that a French novel would hardly be held complete without the sauce piquante of a little immorality, and that this must account for the episodes in which Felicia Ruys, the beautiful artist, plays a part, and for the uncomfortable and unnecessary scandal about Madame Jenkins—episodes, all of them, which have nothing to do with the proper development of the story. The chapters filled with the memoirs of the old simpleton, Passajon, the office porter, whose mingled conceit and greediness render him so ready a dupe of sharpers, are very good; and good, too, are the glimpses we have of French home life in the history of the Joyeuse family. We must add, in conclusion, that the author's French does not seem to have been always very successfully rendered by his translator, though we cannot attempt here to support this criticism by instances.

"Maid Elice," by Theo. Gift, author of "Pretty Miss Bellew," &c. (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—This would have been a better story but for a certain tendency on the part of Miss Theo. Gift in the direction of exaggeration and sheer absurdity. It is out of the question that we should accept as a possible personage the Squire Herne of Herncroft, who seems to claim descent from Hengist and Horsa; habitually uses a Saxon phraseology; and talks of "the Normans"—under which term he includes all Frenchmen, and foreigners generally—as though he lived in the eleventh or twelfth century, instead of the nineteenth. We may venture to hope, also, that such a perverse, sulky, and ill-conditioned young lady as his handsome daughter Margaret is hardly to be encountered in actual life. Setting these two and their respective vagaries and eccentricities on one side, the tale is not a bad one; and is, at any rate, fairly up to the average mark in interest. Perhaps the best drawn character is Gordon Maxwell, the young Roman Catholic, who wants to be a priest, but in deference to his father submits to be a civil engineer. When we come upon a Roman Catholic in a novel it is generally either as a saint, or as a "frightful example," and it is rather a refreshing change to meet one who is nothing but an honourable and well-intentioned prig, who makes just the blunders that one with his training and ways of looking at life would naturally fall into. On the whole there is cleverness in the book that may be allowed to weigh against not a little nonsense.

"A Little Western Flower," by M. C. Helmore, author of "Cap and Bells," &c. (Marcus Ward and Co.).—This story—another of the "Blue-Bell" series—is told by Miss Helmore with her wonted taste and vivacity, but she has not made sufficient allowance for the dimensions to which she was restricted. There are complications enough in the tale to have filled three volumes; and the result is that they have to be stated so briefly that before long we find ourselves in a hopeless state of bewilderment as to what it is all about. However, we think we have gathered a sufficiently clear idea of the story to be able to say that, if somewhat over-ingenious, it is very pretty; and the characters of the young American girl, Fantasy Baldwin, and her compatriot Sandy Hawke, an extraordinary compound of the poet—in aspiration, that is—and the 'cute man-of-business, would make amends for many defects, even if the defects of the tale were far more grievous than they are. But we should recommend Miss Helmore to study more carefully the necessary conditions of the novelette.

In "A Tale of a Spoon," by Mary Trevor Pembroke (Remington and Co.), we have a manifest echo of Miss Broughton, but a little tale not without some merit in its way. The pretty heroine, who has protested she could never fall in love with a man with an unattractive name, is made to be subjugated by a Captain Adolphus Silver Spoon—the subjugation, of course, being effected by the usual process of indifference to her captivating airs and graces—and the plain heroine, who tells the story, wins the heart of her cousin, the Adonis, who, as she thought, never troubled himself to remember her existence. It is a mere trifle, but at any rate unpretentious—and there is very little of it.

I.

WHAT course does the tourist in Ireland generally pursue? He "does" Killarney, and then turns away from the kingdom of Kerry perfectly satisfied that he has seen everything that is really worth seeing; and yet there are other nooks and corners unvisited by tourists, which reveal many a scene of wild mountain grandeur. About twelve miles to the west of Killarney Lakes we pass through a wide chain of highlands and little mountain tarns, and come to another lough, Lough Caragh, embedded in solitary hills, and strangely attractive from its beautiful isolation. Here are no boatmen, no buglers, no guides; but here may be seen the Munster peasantry at home, living among turf bogs, crammed into filthy smoke-grimed hovels, and supporting life on nine shillings a week. As these Milesians jabber away in their native Irish, we are struck with the difference between them and the peasantry of other counties. In Kerry we hear of no agrarian outrages, no landlord murders; the people are, as a rule, plodding and patient. Doors and windows may be left open all night with perfect safety. Politics with them are not an all-absorbing theme. Sunday-closing Bills and the intricacies of Home Rule do not set them in a ferment. The mixture of races in Ireland is one of those difficulties which will always perplex well-meaning legislators. The Kerry peasants are utterly unlike their Tipperary brethren; Celtic ferocity and Saxon determination do not work together like frenzy in their blood. They are pure Milesians. To see them en fête, we should go to Puck Fair, held on the 11th of August in the little town of Killorglin, four miles from Lough Caragh. Goats are plenty in the neighbourhood, and from time out of mind a goat or "puck" has been the presiding genius of the fair. The handsomest which can be found is decked with ribbons and sent round the country in search of contributions. The evening before the fair he is hoisted up on a scaffolding, twenty feet or so from the ground, and there he is left to be monarch of all he surveys, and a bleating spectator of the dancing and fighting which go on briskly at this Kerry Donnybrook. All the previous night the roads are crowded with herds of little "Kerries." "Mountainey" men, with their bare-headed wives or daughters riding behind them on improvised pillions, flock down to this carnival of the year. We seem to be transported seventy years back as we gaze at this eager throng, with their strange guttural speech, hurrying down to get their share of the mirth and "divarshin," which must last them till another "Puck" comes round. Any one who has never heard of Puck Fair is looked upon as a marvel of ignorance. But Killorglin, with its fair, is London or Paris compared to other parts of the wild West. Beyond Tralee is the once-famed country of the Desmonds, a scantily inhabited tongue of land washed by the broad Atlantic, and the scene of the Black Earl of Ormond's raid. At Smerwick Harbour is Fort del Ore, where Lord Deputy Grey defeated the little Spanish army which was entrenched on this projecting cliff in 1580. Dotted about the rock-bound coast are Ogham Stones, ruined castles, and oratories, while from Dunmore Head—"the next parish to America"—are seen the fantastic forms of the Blasket Islands, with their flocks of white sea birds. The only place for miles round which can be called a town is Dingle—anciently Daingean Ui Chuis—the fortress of O'Cush, or some say "of the Husseys"—which was an incorporated town in the days of Queen Elizabeth, whatever it is now. To reach this Ultima Thule we must drive thirty-one miles from Tralee. We may either hire a car, and drive round by the wild and beautiful pass of Connor Hill, or we may take the mail car, which goes another road. We see more of human life by doing the latter. A new vehicle has been lately started which is a vast improvement on a rattling old "jingle" that used to be the only conveyance for Her Majesty's mails. It was a bright July morning when we took our seats on it. An intelligent young farmer who had lately come from British North America, and who informed us that our vehicle was exactly like a "Democrat Waggon," next mounted up. He was accompanied by an elderly maidservant, who blinked her eyes and puckered her forehead in the sun as she sat opposite to us, but who wore no head-gear, except the usual shawl, which as often as not fell back on her shoulders. Kerry women seem to have the most unaccountable aversion to hats or bonnets, and scarcely ever wear them, even on Sundays. We had also a red-nosed man, who seemed inclined for silence, and our driver, who drove in his shirtsleeves, smacked his whip over his lean wiry steeds, and informed them that he would have none of their roguery. Seven o'clock A.M. was the time for starting, and the mist-enshrouded, stone-besprinkled mountain range of Cahirconree was scarcely visible as we passed. Cahirconree, or the Fort of Conrigh, is so called from the remains of a stone fortress on the top of the mountain. We are told by Keating, in his account of the Knights of the Red Branch, how a fair maiden called Blanaid was captured from the Isle of Man. Conrigh chose her for his share of the spoil, but his claim was disputed by a certain champion, Congculionn. A fight ensued—ça va sans dire—Congculionn was beaten, and his hair cut off by his rival, the foulest indignity that could happen to a warrior. But Blanaid's heart was given to the defeated hero. When he secretly returned, after a year's absence, she told him of a plot by which her husband could be entrapped. She was to beg Conrigh to build a palace for her of the most enormous stones that could be found. Accordingly, poor hen-pecked Conrigh sent out his troops in all directions to collect as many stones as possible. While this work was going on, the faithless Blanaid agreed to give Congculionn a signal that, when everything was ready, she would pour a quantity of milk into a stream which flowed down the mountain, and is called Fionnglaise, the White Brook, to this day. No sooner said than done. Congculionn saw the stream run white, marched on the unprotected Conrigh, slew him then and there, and carried off Blanaid. But her punishment soon followed, for a certain poet, a favourite of Conrigh's, seized her in his arms as she stood on the verge of a precipice, and flung her down along with himself.

The mist now began to lift, and the present grew more interesting than the past. Mountains upon mountains, peaked, rounded, conical, stretched like a majestic, far-reaching panorama before us. "Is there much land in Ireland?" was once asked. "So much that we have to put it in heaps," was the answer. And in heaps it surely was—vast, lonely, precipitous. Here was the Mountain of the Bridges,—there was Glounagalt, or the Madman's Glen—there was Loughnascaul,—there was the Gap of the Wind, and a hundred more with names which only Kerry mouths can pronounce. There were no trees, and yet what deep purple shadows, what streaks of living sunshine, what mysteries of light and shade, flung by the shifting clouds, lingered on these stony mountain solitudes! And the air, how soft and delicate it was along those Western shores! "Success to the Gulf Stream!" travellers may cry.

"Do many tourists come here in the summer?" we asked our driver.

"Tourists! not one in six months. I've as many with me winter as summer."

"It's a pity no one works up this country. If it was in Scotland, there would be coaches running three times a day, and steam-boats starting every half-hour along the coast."

"Ireland will be always down," laconically remarked our driver. "Steamers wouldn't pay, railroads wouldn't pay, coaches wouldn't pay."

"There's an awful lot of land going to waste," said the silent man. "Look at all them furze-bushes."

"You wouldn't see that in British North America," briskly put in our travelled companion. "The Irish work hard enough when they get over there. They never stop till they drive in their carriages, but then, to be sure, the land's their own."

"They work hard enough here," said our driver, turning round. "There's people over beyond who've worked harder than any one under the canopy of heaven. They've carried stones on their backs as big as this car, and eaten nothing but a bit of yellow bread and a drink of milk to wash it down. They've spent the marrow of their bones on the land, and for what? For a five years' lase."

"But they can get the value of their improvements. The Land Act——"

"It's all moonshine," interrupted our irrepressible Jehu. "Just a slice off the loaf. The barristers can set the valuation aside. And a rich man will never mind giving twenty or thirty pounds when he knows he can get six times as much from the next man that comes in."

"But the tenant may get another farm."

"It's out of the frying-pan into the fire. They should have long lases."

So far our friend. His ideas may not be worth much, but they show the prejudices of his class. As for the Kerry landlords, many of them seem really anxious to do their best for their tenants. One is doing good service by knocking down the old cabins, and building up two-storied stone houses. Mud cabins are never found in this land of stones. Even the village of Annascaul is built entirely of stone, though the smoke issues from almost every door in true Irish fashion. This pale blue turf smoke is quite a feature in the landscape; some of the halting places where we stopped to change horses were a study for an artist, the black recesses from which the horses came, and the groups of bare-legged children standing in the sun, made a spot of life among the lonely hills. The "many twinkling smile" of the Atlantic was seen every minute—lost beyond one headland, it peeped out beyond another. We rattled up the hill of Dingle, the observed of the curious who wait for their daily excitement, the arrival of the car. To be thirty-one miles from railways, gas, and booksellers' shops—in a sea-side place, where mutton is sixpence a pound, and bathing-machines are unknown, is rather new in these days of progress.

THE STEEL AGE

THE ages arbitrarily and incorrectly called stone and bronze ages have passed away, and in the iron age there are now fully developed symptoms of change. It is about a century only since the death of Benjamin Huntsman, the Quaker discoverer of the English method of making cast steel, which gave so great a stimulus to Sheffield trade. That cementing process continued down to the days of Bessemer's discovery to supply the requirements of users, but the price limited materially the use. The large extension of the producing capacity by the process and by the Siemens-Martin process enabled not only the wants of the world to be better supplied, but stimulated those wants by continued reductions in price until the cost was practically brought down to that of malleable iron. On railways, the use of this steel has been demonstrated to be economical, for not only is its price within a few shillings of that of iron, but its durability is proved to very greatly exceed that of the latter metal. As its production has been enlarged, and as the price has diminished, the use has extended, and now not only are rails, but tires, tools, and many other articles made of steel in preference to iron, but the reign of the latter in the manufacture seems unstable. The extent of the change in the first-named may be gathered when it is said that the weekly production of iron rails in the kingdom in 1873 was about 18,300 tons, but last year it had sunk to about 4,300 tons; whilst steel rails, produced in the earliest of these two years at the rate of about 4,800 tons, rose in amount to about 12,000 tons last year. This change is still continuing, and its force may be known from the fact that in the largest iron-producing district in the kingdom, works have been erected for the smelting of foreign ores close to illimitable deposits of native ironstone. In short, Bessemer steel, in the words of an authority, has "effected something like a revolution in our iron industry." It has not superseded steel made by the old and dearer processes for cutlery; but it has enabled us to "use a coarse or semi-steel for purposes to which iron was formerly applied, and a much cheaper steel for rude and heavy steel implements."

Our home supply of iron ores for Bessemer steel making is chiefly that of the great district in the north-west, that of Furness and West Cumberland, but we import large supplies from Spain, Norway, and other parts. In the mode of smelting the ore, between the modes of treatment of the iron ores and the hæmatite ores which yield Bessemer steel, the differences are only local, the constituents and the mode of action in the blast furnace being the same in either case. But when the fluid metal leaves the furnace, the change in the mode of treatment is great. In the case of the ordinary ores, the liquid resultant flows into sandy furrows—"sows" and "pigs"—and there cooling, it assumes the colour and appearance of what we call pig iron, to be afterwards melted in a flat-bottomed furnace—a "puddling furnace"—where the melted mass is stirred until its impurities are removed, and the infusible iron is ready for being forged to its destined shape. But the Bessemer pig iron has other experience. It may be allowed to cool, or conveyed in its molten state directly to the "converter," as in later-erected works. This important vessel is shaped, roughly speaking, like an egg, one end being "spiked." Lined with fire-clay or "ganister," and having a flat circular bottom, which is fitted with small fire-clay cylinders, perforated, the converter is mounted on an axis, on which it can be turned. Receiving the charge of metal—direct from the furnace, or "pig" melted in a cupola—the red-hot converter receives through the air-chamber and the perforated cylinders a powerful blast, and with this "blow," a fierce flame leaps from the spiked end or mouth of the converter. This fiery flame increases in intensity, it leaps outwards for yards, irradiating the air for a considerable distance, glowing and scattering a shower of sparks all around. For some minutes the flame increases in brilliancy, the sparks shower in frequency, whilst the blast continues to pour, raging through the tortured metal, and then, when the great glow has passed its most eye-dazzling height, there is a contraction of the flame, and the converter is lowered to receive an addition of spiegeleisne from a cupola near, and as this crude iron, rich in manganese, is added, there is, in the mixture of it with the decarbonised pig iron, an internal convulsion, the outward token of which is that a pale and slow flame issues, instead of the fierce whitish yellow. After some twenty minutes of this conversion, the Bessemer steel is made; the converter is dipped till its contents flow out into an immense ladle, which is slung around over the long moulds for the ingots. The ladle being tapped from the bottom, a thin stream of the fluid descends into the mould, and when it is solid the mould is raised from the yellow mass by means of crane and chains attached to it. Carried now by a small engine to furnaces, where gas generators supply the heat, the ingots are conveyed to the mill, through the heavy rolls of which they pass and repass, and assume the length, and gradually the shape, of rails. Thence to the finishing portion of the machinery, where they are sawn to the required length, punched, straightened, and tested, and placed on the railway trucks for conveyance to their destination—possibly within a very limited period after the issue of the molten metal from the blast furnace.

In this mode the richer iron ores are converted into a material which, in the words of Dr. Siemens, is "gradually supplanting wrought iron in many of its applications;" and now, as another authority has said, steel is no longer "a luxury," to be "made exclusively in small quantities." Great advances have been made in cheapening the production, in extending the production, and in producing a more equally reliable metal. Our capacity of production of steel has been raised by the Bessemer process, just glanced at, and by the Siemens-Martin process, to close upon a million tons yearly; and its cost has been very greatly reduced, whilst by the adoption of the "direct process," above outlined, a saving in fuel to a very large extent has been made possible in the manufacture. With a capacity for meeting a demand of any probable extent, with a cheapened cost of production, and with a longer "life" in the product than that of iron, steel becomes the metal of the future, and in the constructing and engineering world its domain is daily widening.

ROLLING STONES

WHO cannot number in the list of his acquaintances a "rolling stone?" A family might with as much truth deny the existence of a skeleton in one or more of its cupboards, as for one of us to refuse knowledge of a "rolling stone" in our circle of relations and friends; and, strange to say, the higher we mount the social scale, the more rolling do we find the proclivities of the stones—at least, so history teaches us, and so observation points out to us every day. Rolling stones, although doubtless quite as distinct a branch of the social family in olden times as at present, have been fostered and encouraged to increase in numbers in a far greater ratio by the peculiar characteristics of the modern age, by which we mean the last half century of enterprise and exploration. In the days which we still like to term "good old," there was but little field for the rolling stone. Folks lived tranquilly at home for the most part; there was little to tempt them abroad in the shape of El Dorados and objects of discovery. Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, and Raleigh were without doubt rolling stones of the first order; but they were such exceptions to the general rule that they had matters pretty well their own way, and, unhampered by competition or rivalry, won for themselves the place in our adventurous island history which we so dearly love to associate with our early fame as colonists and explorers. In those days there was little but an irrepressible nature, an inherent love of tempting Fortune away from her beaten paths, to induce a man to become a rolling stone. At present there is every temptation for the restless mind, the careless daring spirit to betake itself to a congenial atmosphere; and, as a proof of this, we have only to cast our eyes over the map of the world. Rolling stones are ready by the hundred to enrol themselves at an hour's notice as artists, correspondents, and even as actual combatants at a seat of war, be it on the shores of the Black Sea, on the frontiers of India, in Kaffir Land, or in New Zealand. And let it be borne in mind these rolling stones are for the greater part men of good birth, of excellent education, men as much at ease in the drawing-room as in the camp or saddle. Your rolling stone is rarely a "cad;" lower natures are not susceptible to the romantic, poetic features of a roving life, and above all things the genuine rolling stone abhors the stern, practical view of life and its surroundings, taken by his more sober-minded kith and kin. Upon reflection it will be found that we owe a very great portion of our political and commercial power in the world to the efforts and deeds of rolling stones. The first conquerors of India were certainly rolling stones, and more than one of the princely houses of far Cathay owes its origin to the pluck, hardihood, and shrewdness of some aimless, wandering adventurer of past years. Why, then, should the term, "rolling stone" be universally applied in a derogatory sense, and why should the bearers thereof be so mercilessly tabooed as the pariahs of society? Certainly, from a Sandford and Merton point of view, it is best that well-brought-up young men should stay at home, increase and multiply, and secure for themselves and families a comfortable competency in old age, but with the roving Norse and Saxon blood still tingling in our veins, it is almost as well that as a set-off there should be an element of what we may term "rolling stonism" amongst us. Trace the histories of the men who have left to us as legacies the discovery of "great lone lands," or who have opened our eyes to the fact that much which has hitherto been considered "great lone land" is a world in itself, and it will be found that they have been one and all rolling stones. Not that the life of a rolling stone is a golden view to hold out to ambitious youth. In our line regiments, and amongst the crews of our great iron-clads, are many rolling stones who have simply rolled into oblivion—men who were never formed to gather moss, and who never will. But, as a class, rolling stones are by no means to be despised simply on account of their being such. There are natures which cannot bear a curb, which must be up and a doing, and in our small, but over-populated, isle, it is just as well that this restlessness and longing after active movement without fixity of purpose should exist.

Moreover, stones do not for ever roll. As men cease to sow wild oats, so must restless minds at length seek rest as a relief, and the moss they may have gathered is, perhaps, the sweeter for having been won in a hard stand-up fight with the rough-hewn corners of life. After a while the rolling motion palls, and the stone settles down into its bed, and becomes a respectable member of earth society.

OSTRICHES IN SOUTH AFRICA are becoming so valuable for the recently-developed trade of ostrich-farming, that at a recent sale of these birds in Middleburg they realised on an average nearly 200*l*. per pair. 285*l*. were given for one pair, and the lowest price realised was 130*l*., while a few years ago, according to The Colonies, ostriches could be procured in South Africa for the catching, and were purchased for a mere trifle for exhibition in London. The Zoological Gardens do not possess a single specimen of the South African ostrich, the last specimens having been killed by swallowing the halfpence thrown to them by visitors.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Austrians have resumed operations in Bosnia, and, strengthened by large reinforcements, are now able to take the offensive. The insurgents seem most active in north-eastern Bosnia, where they have been holding Novi-Brcka, on the Save, and were only expelled on Tuesday after a severe bombardment, the Austrians subsequently burning the town for its treachery. Marshal Bienerth, however, has occupied the district from the Bosna to Sakova and Gradacac, which he entered peaceably on Sunday, while Count Szapary assisted from Doboj by taking Graçanica, whence the insurgents retreated back to Tuzla. This Zwornik district contains the chief strength of the insurgents, estimated at 40,000, and accordingly the main portion of the Austrian staff is to be moved back from Serajevo to Brod, as a more convenient centre for directing operations, fighting being still vigorous in western Bosnia. Here General Zach is again advancing on Bihacs, and has defeated the rebels at Isasich, also scoring a success at Zavalje. In other parts of the province the troops are meeting with little opposition, except near Trebinje, where General Magy was attacked and defeated during a reconnaissance at Gorica. Marshal Philippovich continues at Serajevo, and although there are unpleasant reports of the executions of Servian merchants and Mussulmans who had assisted the insurgents, the Marshal's schemes for the reorganisation of government in the town and the surrounding country seem fairly well received by the inhabitants. The Marshal is hopeful that peace will be restored by the end of October, and meanwhile the Austrian Government is trying to keep the movements of the army as secret as possible, a plan very distasteful to the public in Vienna and Hungary. The Austro-Turkish Convention is still undecided, and the latest proposal is for Austrian and Turkish troops to occupy jointly the district of Novi-Bazar. All is quiet at present in Albania, and the Porte intends to send a strong force under Fuad Pasha to restore order and punish the murder of Mehemet Ali.

Turkey, however, is too busy just now with diplomatic troubles to pay much attention to military matters. Although she has escaped the collective remonstrance of the Powers suggested by Germany on account of the non-fulfilment of the Berlin Treaty—England having declined to adhere to the proposal on the ground that the Porte is resolved to evacuate the fortresses, and has already endeavoured to settle the Servian and Montenegrin frontiers—the Greeks are pressing hard for their answer. The Hellenic Memorandum, soliciting the mediation of the Powers, states that Greece applied to Turkey in July, and has as yet received only evasive replies. Greece cannot longer remain inactive, and as the Porte, by signing the Berlin Treaty, recognised the principle of the cession of certain territory to Greece, Turkey's present attitude must be regarded as an endeavour to elude the resolutions of the Congress. A number of Epirote and Thessalian refugees at Athens have also presented the British Minister with a petition to the Queen, begging her to hasten the liberation of their provinces, while warlike preparations are reported all over Greece. The Powers have not yet replied, but Italy has counselled Greece to act moderately. The Porte has disclaimed all intention of a rupture with Greece, and has drawn up a memorandum detailing her efforts to comply loyally with the conditions of the Treaty. The Turkish Cabinet also has been considering home affairs, and has unanimously accepted the British scheme of reforms in Asia Minor. Although many difficulties stand in the way of carrying out these reforms, by reason of the Sultan's jealousy of interference with his authority, the weakness of his Ministry, and the want of money, the acceptance is looked upon as a decided step in favour of a more hopeful policy, another proof of which has been furnished by the recall of Midhat Pasha. Informed that the Sultan was ready to recall him, Midhat wrote for permission to return to Turkey, but not to Constantinople, and has been allowed to go to Crete; funds from the Turkish Treasury and a special vessel being placed at his disposal. It is generally thought that his journey to Crete is the precursor to a return to office, Constantinople needing sorely a firm and practised ruler just now. Paper money has fallen so low, and provisions have risen so high in the capital, that a Commission has been constituted to consider the best means of withdrawing the Caimés from circulation; but all efforts to raise a loan for their redemption have hitherto failed. In order, however, to obtain funds the Porte proposes to sell its domains in Bulgaria, with the supplies and war material stored away by the Government, the sale being estimated to produce two or three millions sterling. Alarmists, too, are dreading disturbances when the Russian troops withdraw; and Prince Lobanoff has formally advised the occupation of the evacuated districts with regular troops, as the Russians are fast leaving the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and San Stefano will probaby be finally vacated by the beginning of next week. Such precautionary measures are certainly needed in ASIA, for the Archbishop of Erzeroum has telegraphed to the British and French Ambassadors asking for protection for the Christians, as the Mussulmans threaten to make a descent on the town directly the Russians leave. Erzeroum was to be vacated by the Russians on Thursday, and the last detachment of Turkish troops left Batoum last week; 30,000 Russians being now in possession.—ROUMANIA is grumbling that she cannot erect a bridge over the Danube on any portion of the Dobrudscha, and asks for a small strip of ground near Silistria.—Fever continues severe in CYPRUS, although the weather is cooler, and the authorities are finding considerable difficulty in deciding what lands belong to the Sultan under the Convention.

FRANCE.——Military affairs have put politics into the shade this week, and the great topic has been the review of 50,000 men by Marshal MacMahon at Vincennes on Sunday. The army is declared to be in better condition than has been known for fifteen years, and the French people are heartily delighted at the revival of their old military glory, which had sunk so low. The reserve forces proved as satisfactory as the regular army, the artillery—the weakest point in the late war—was said to show admirable precision, and the marching of the troops was excellent. A number of foreign princes—including the Duke of Cambridge—and prominent military men attended the review, and provincials and Parisians flocked in thousands to the Vincennes Polygon, which is better fitted by nature for such military displays than the ground at Longchamps, and is also less familiar to the general public. Conveyances were at a discount, and in many cases it was fairly impossible to move along the road. Indeed Paris was crowded for the occasion, some 16,000 persons having arrived on Saturday, and the Bois de Boulogne racecourse and the Exhibition were alike crammed with an influx of visitors. The Marshal has issued an order of the day, expressing his satisfaction with the appearance of the troops.

As a contrast to this warlike demonstration, the "Ministers of Peace," MM. Freycinet and Bardoux, have been making fresh speeches during their tour, the former having visited Valenciennes, where he declared that the Republic was now founded upon indestructible bases, since it rested upon the almost unanimous approval of the nation, and having delivered another oration at Douai, appealing to all men of good will to rally to the support of the Republic. In his turn M. Gambetta has been orating in the South, and delivered an important speech at Romans on Wednesday, justifying the Republican policy. He was received with great honours at Lyons and Valence, the townspeople making holiday to greet him, and receiving in return an emphatic warning not to make any particular man an idol, but to appreciate universal suffrage and preserve concord and moderation. The leader of the Left has thus inaugurated the autumn political campaign, which the Liberals are so quietly preparing to result in a victory at the Senatorial elections, and the Republican prospects are asserted to be much improved by the late Conservative circular, which is considered to exhibit a decided division in the Monarchical party. The Municipal Councils will probably meet to nominate the Senatorial delegates about Nov. 24th, but nothing will be decided till the return of M. Dufaure, who has been employing his leisure by writing a conciliatory answer to M. Louis Blanc's protest against the recent suppression of the Socialist Congress. The Radical deputies are contented with the apology, and intend to let the matter drop. M. Léon Say has come back from England with sundry projects for reorganising the postal system, a much-needed reform, as the English evening mail was late in Paris three times last week. Paris is looking forward anxiously to the announcement of the Exhibition prizes, and French exhibitors are heartily angry that foreign exhibitors should be acquainted even unofficially with the decision of the juries while they themselves remain in ignorance, more particularly as they argue that they will lose valuable orders and prestige if the awards are not known before the day of the distribution. The annual meeting of the Iron and Steel Institute has been held, and the first fruit and vegetable show has been opened at the Exhibition. The only theatrical items are the revival of Corneille's Rodogune at the Odéon, and the production of a comedietta, Une Mission Délicate, by M. Adenis, at the same theatre.

GERMANY.——The Anti-Socialist Bill has been discussed this week in the German Parliament. The debate began on Monday, Count Stolberg, as representative of Prince Bismarck, introducing the Bill, and begging the House to furnish the Government with sharp and effective weapons to combat the Socialist danger. After some remarks from the Ultramontane leader that the revival of Christianity was the only efficacious means of resistance, the Saxon Socialist, Bebel, brought forward a vehement accusation against Prince Bismarck, alleging that the Chancellor had been connected with Lassalle, the founder of German Socialism, and had sought in every way to gain over and court the Social Democrats, and denying that the attempts of Hödel and Nobiling had any connection with Social Democracy. The Minister of the Interior gave a half denial of the relations of the Government with the Social Democrats, but Prince Bismarck was by no means content with his colleague's defence, and came down next day to the House to refute the accusation. The Prince spoke most vigorously against the Social Democrats, styling them a company of bandits with whom as a party he had never had anything to do, although he had sent representatives to various Socialist meetings to collect reports for him. Declaring that all existence would come to an end if Germans were to live under such tyranny, he concluded by an appeal to the Reichstag for protection for the Emperor's life. The Prince's speech was not one of his most effective orations, but his uncomplimentary language towards the Socialists was sorely resented by Herr Bebel, who, amid a perfect storm in the House, vainly appealed to the President to call Prince Bismarck to order. Finally the Bill was referred to a Select Committee of twenty-one members, the Ultramontanes siding with the National Liberals to send back the measure for further consideration. The result of the deliberations is awaited with great anxiety, as large numbers of Socialists are reported to be now in Berlin. Great disappointment is felt at the death of Nobiling, who, it was hoped, would have made some confession respecting his accomplices. Nobiling, however, died so suddenly that no information had been obtained, the authorities having been careful to avoid the subject, so as not to excite his brain. Emperor William has improved wonderfully in health by his stay at Gastein. He has gone to Cassel, and rode out on Tuesday for the first time, while he can now write with his right hand. The loss of the Grosser Kurfürst gave rise to an animated debate in the Reichstag last week, the Minister of Marine declaring that the regulations and the officers of the vessel were not to blame, and begging the House to defer the discussion till after the official inquiry into the disaster.

INDIA.——The Afghan Mission has not yet left Peshawur, the Ameer's reply, believed to be in the hands of Mir Akhor, being hourly expected. The Mission will number some 1,000, with an escort of infantry and Hussars, will be guided through the Khyber Pass by the Khyberees, who have given hostages for the safe conduct of the party, and will be escorted by the Commissioner to Pakha, on the other side of the Pass, where a strong force of Afghan troops is assembled. Reports of the Ameer's sentiments towards the British are not very favourable. He is asserted to have declared in open Durbar that he "will hurl every rupee at the head of the British Government, and roll the border troops against them like blasts of fire;" but the date of this furious declaration is not stated, and it is hoped Shere Ali will be materially smoothed down by the bearer of the Viceroy's letter, who is very popular at the Cabul Court, and was warmly received on his arrival on the 10th inst. The most likely successor to the throne now appears to be Ahmed Ali Jan, an intelligent well-educated youth of eighteen, the child of the Ameer's favourite son who was killed in 1865 The Indian journals are still warmly advocating a firm military policy, and opinions are strong that the present frontier line is indefensible, and that the outlets of the Passes should be held if we desire the Himalayas to serve as a natural barrier for the protection of India. The appointment of Sir Neville Chamberlain is looked upon as most judicious, the envoy being an old campaigner, well acquainted with frontier tribes, a good linguist, a shrewd tactician, and a most courteous gentleman.

UNITED STATES.——The yellow fever epidemic at length shows slight signs of abating; cooler weather has set in, and it is believed that the worst is over. Nevertheless in New Orleans the deaths up to Sunday last numbered 1,951, and at Memphis reached 1,791, while the sufferings continue intense for want of help. Money, however, is plentiful.—Sober Puritan Massachusetts has nominated General Butler as Governor, much to the annoyance of moderate New Englanders, to whom the appointment of a Democrat, and friend of Kearney, the head of the Communistic Greenback and Labour party, is particularly distasteful. General Butler was chosen in the midst of a riot, his supporters seizing the hall and turning out the State Central Committee. The Republican Convention, however, have brought forward another candidate, Mr. Talbot, who was acting Governor of Massachusetts in 1847.—The notorious Cimbria has arrived at Philadelphia, bringing crews for the four Russian cruisers bought from the Americans in the late war scare.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In ITALY the Pope has been ill, and has been obliged to suspend his audiences. He has appointed a congregation of five Cardinals to further the negotiations with Germany. The King and Queen have been present at the army manœuvres at Brescia, and have unveiled a monument to Victor Emmanuel at Monza; a congress of Orientalists has been held at Florence; and Vesuvius continues active, volumes of lava being projected from the new crater.—In EGYPT Mr. Rivers Wilson has been definitely appointed Finance Minister, and a French official will probably take the post of Minister of Public Works and Agriculture. The Nile is threatening an overflow.—The CANADA elections have resulted in a complete victory of the Opposition, and the Cabinet will probably resign.—A memorial for a remission of the death sentence on the Kaffir chiefs, Mocamo and Gongobella, lately captured at the CAPE, has been presented to Sir Bartle Frere.

THE COURT

THE Queen remains in Scotland, and the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold are still with Her Majesty at Balmoral. The Queen held a Council on Saturday, at which Prince Leopold, the Marquis of Lorne, Mr. Cross, and Sir T. M. Biddulph were present, and Parliament was further prorogued to November 30th. Afterwards Her Majesty drove with Princess Louise and Prince Leopold round the Lion's Face, and in the evening the Rev. A. Campbell joined the Royal party at dinner. On Tuesday the Queen visited the Prince of Wales at Abergeldie, and the Prince dined at Balmoral in the evening. Her Majesty also invested the Marquis of Lorne as a Knight Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George. Next day the Princess Louise and the Marquis left Balmoral for Inverary. The Queen and the Princesses have also visited the Glassalt Shiel, while the Princess Beatrice has been out riding with the Marquis of Lorne. Sir T. M. and Lady Biddulph, Mr. Cross, and Lieutenant-Colonel Clarke have been among Her Majesty's guests at dinner.—The Queen has sent a reply to the address sent by the Dunbar Corporation, expressing her satisfaction with her recent visit.

The Prince of Wales returned to town last week from Doncaster, and remained at Marlborough House until Monday evening, when he left for Scotland. The Prince travelled all night, breakfasted at Perth, and reached Abergeldie in the afternoon. The Princess and her three girls have spent this week at Rumpenheim with the Danish Royal Family, and leave to-day (Saturday) to join the Prince in Scotland.—Princes Albert Victor and George watched on Saturday night a large fire at a Dartmouth shipbuilding yard, engines and working parties from the Britannia helping to subdue the flames.

The Duke of Connaught has returned to England from Potsdam after a month's stay with the parents of his betrothed.—Prince Leopold has sent 25*l.* to the Princess Alice relief fund.—The Duke of Cambridge on leaving Kissingen made a short tour in Switzerland, and has been staying in Paris, where he dined with Marshal MacMahon and was present at the Vincennes Review on Sunday.—Canada is making great preparations to receive the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, and Lord Dufferin will probably remain at Ottawa to welcome them on their arrival.

CHURCH NEWS

PROPOSED METHODIST ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.——The Dublin correspondent of the Standard says that much interest has been awakened among the Methodist body by the arrival of the Rev. Dr. Haven, of Syracuse University, United States, charged with a proposal from the Methodist Church in America for an Œcumenical Council, embracing representatives from all sections of the Methodist denomination throughout the world, to meet in London. In Ireland the project is received with favour. It is suggested that the Conference should be composed of ministerial and lay members in about equal numbers, who would represent a community of about fifteen millions of people, of whom about four millions are recognised Church members; together with about thirty thousand ministers and sixty thousand lay preachers.

VARIOUS.——The Convocations of Canterbury and York have been further prorogued until Dec. 2nd.—A circular has just been sent from the Education Department to every School Board in England and Wales, calling for a return of the provision made by each, respecting religious teaching and religious observances in School Board schools, with copies of bye-laws, by which such provisions are regulated."—Dr. M'Evilly, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway, addressing his congregation after Mass last Sunday, said that police constables were told off to attend the services of the Roman Catholic churches of Galway, and to note down and report what might be said by the officiating clergy. This, he said, was an outrage on Catholics which should be resented; but he "begged of the people to take the matter quietly," as he himself would seek reparation in the proper quarter.—Much indignation has been excited amongst the inhabitants of Grimstone, in Leicestershire, by the refusal of the vicar to allow the corpse of a woman who had died a Wesleyan to be carried into the church. On Sunday the church was almost empty, and the vicar on his way thither was followed by a crowd beating tins and pans.—On Saturday about six hundred converts to Mormonism sailed from Liverpool for America, in charge of a missionary agent and seventeen elders. England supplied about 200, Scotland forty, and Wales fifty. Of the others, 265 came from Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and adjacent countries, while sixty were Swiss or Germans.—The question whether the teacher of an infant school should be allowed to give Scripture lessons on "The Fall" to the children under her charge came before the Belper School Board on Tuesday. A clerical member of the board said the teacher knew no more about the subject than his shoes did, and he should not allow any child of his to receive instruction from any one on such a subject. After some discussion the consideration of the subject was adjourned for a fortnight. —Mrs. Girling and her community have removed from the lane at Hordle into an adjacent field. They have been offered gratuitous lodging at the Grand Stand on the Kingsbury racecourse at Hendon, by the proprietor of the Welsh Harp, who doubtless hopes that they will attract custom to his house. Mrs. Girling hesitates to accept the offer.

MUSIC

WORCESTER FESTIVAL.——What will chiefly tend to commemorate the Worcester Musical Festival of 1878 (the 155th meeting of the Three Choirs) is the return, with certain modifications, to the long established form. The modifications are fair enough, and there is good reason to believe that both parties are satisfied. Stipulations were made to the Festival Committee, stanch upholders of the time-honoured fête which, once every three years, used to make Worcester one of the gayest of cities, and through the wise counsel and consideration of the Bishop of the Diocese, accepted. Concessions were also demanded from the opposite side, and, again by the advice of the same thoughtful arbitrator, after some protest, agreed to. Thus it is clear that to the esteemed and learned prelate, who has been a zealous conciliator throughout, the inhabitants of Worcester are indebted for the restoration of their festival upon its traditionary basis. Moreover, the Bishop, having the courage of his opinions, did not hesitate to preach the sermon, customary at such times, on behalf of the widows and orphans, intermingling his discourse with much that was relevant to the use of music of the highest character in the service of the Church, and giving solid and convincing arguments for the line of policy he had adopted. There can be no possible question about the fitness of the special morning service which now "inaugurates" the festival, or of the special evening service which brings it solemnly and devoutly to an end; to the short forms of prayer that precede, or to the Episcopal Benediction that follows every performance of oratorio in the Cathedral; and we are very much mistaken if both Hereford and Gloucester do not speedily imitate the example set by Worcester, and thus ensure the perpetuation of these elevating and charitable commemorations sine die. Should they do so, it will be for the general benefit of the three counties which for more than a century and a half have been associated in the good work. The opening special service is considered by many sincere adherents to be somewhat lengthy, although it is a grand Cathedral service, in which the entire choral and instrumental forces (more than 300 singers and players), as well as the leading "solo" vocalists, assist. The subject, however, is open to discussion, and a remedy may easily be found. The service lasted about three hours and a quarter; and there being, of course, no "interval" allowed for refreshment and temporary repose—a liberty which, dividing an act of worship into halves, it will be readily understood the clerical authorities could on no pretext tolerate—the objection as to length can hardly be regarded as without foundation. The Cathedral, now restored with such splendour and completeness, was an attraction of itself at this festival; and though the new disposition of the platform for the singers and players, now on a level with the congregation, is by no means calculated to exhibit favourably the superb acoustic qualities of this magnificent building, still the conviction remains that, to be fully impressed with the beauty and grandeur of the Messiah, Creation, Last Judgment, Elijah, Hymn of Praise, and other sacred compositions by the masters of their art, we must hear them as we have just heard them, in a cathedral, which invests them with a gravity unattainable in any secular hall or building of the kind. Add to these the immortal Requiem of Mozart, which (being a Mass for the Dead) might have appeared to sticklers for consistency a little out of place in what the authorities of the cathedral (the Bishop in his sermon not excepted) seem determined to regard as an ordinary choral service—the oratorio to stand in place of anthem—and it will be seen that a varied and admirable selection of important sacred pieces for the week was made by Mr. Done, who, by right of his position as organist of Worcester Cathedral, is traditionally entitled to the post of festival-conductor, the duties of which he fulfils with such zeal and assiduity, yielding his place at the organ to Mr. C. H. Lloyd, organist of Gloucester. The new organ, the gift of Earl Dudley, to whom the Dean and Chapter are under such deep obligation for his liberal contributions towards the renovation of their noble church, is as yet on its trial. It is a large instrument, built by Mr. Hill of London; and, proceeding from such a highly eminent firm, may be credited with all essential qualities. Nevertheless, erected, as now, at the south side of the transept, in front of the choir screen, where the orchestra is placed—instead of as formerly at the west terminus of the nave—it is lost to the sight of a large majority of the congregation, and in a more or less degree, it must be admitted, to their hearing as well. Mr. Lloyd played, as voluntaries, day after day, compositions by J. S. Bach and other masters; but either the organ was not in proper condition, or its situation prevented its full powers from being audibly appreciated at their worth. Mr. Lloyd, who succeeded the late Dr. S. S. Wesley at Gloucester, being a player of more than average ability, must be absolved from any shortcomings caused by the unfavourable position in which his instrument is situated. About the oratorios, &c., we have enumerated there is no occasion to say a word, so familiar are they to amateurs and musicians; nor with regard to the distinguished solo singers are we called upon for anything more than an admission, cheerfully given, that they all did their very best—our daily contemporaries having supplied ample information on this point. They were Mesdames Albani and Patey, Misses Anna Williams, Mary Davies, and Bertha Griffiths, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Guy, Wadmore, and Santley—the mere record of whose names will answer all purposes. Two new works of considerable importance were produced in the course of the week. The first of these was a short oratorio, called Hezekiah, by Dr. Armes, organist of Durham Cathedral. This had already been heard at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and was strongly eulogised by critics, there and thereabouts. It is undoubtedly a work of real promise, although Dr. Armes (who himself directed the performance) has much to learn before he can hope to excel in this, the highest branch of musical art. He is young, however, and much better things may fairly be expected from him. The other work was an anthem (or cantata), the narrative of which is selected from Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and relates, with appropriate comments, the resurrection to life, by the miraculous interposition of Jesus, of the young daughter of "one of the rulers of the Synagogue." The Daughter of Jairus, from a more experienced pen than that which furnished Hezekiah, was given at the special evening service (also under the direction of its composer). All we can say now, however, of either work is that all possible pains were bestowed upon the execution, alike by vocalists and instrumentalists. We shall return to both, having something more to say about the Festival of 1878, which to the general satisfaction has proved one of the most brilliant and successful ever held by the united Choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester. The miscellaneous concerts in the College Hall, for instance, merit notice apart; while there are some other points worthy further comment, however brief.

WAIFS.——Madame Adelina Patti has purchased Craig-y-nos Castle, in the Swansea Valley, late the property of Mr. Morgan Morgan. She is said to be delighted with her bargain.—Madame Christine Nilsson has arrived in London. After her English tour there is a probability of her accepting a brief engagement for performances in opera at Nice.—A short musical festival was held on Saturday last at Tewkesbury, to aid the fund for the restoration of the fine old Abbey.

A COUNTRY PARISH CHURCH IN SCOTLAND

WASHINGTON IRVING remarks that "there are few places more favourable to the study of character than an English country church," and the remark applies with striking truth to the little church, which I am about to describe, in a Scottish parish. Situated in a sequestered valley, four hundred miles from the Great Metropolis, and one hundred from the Scottish capital, it yet gathers together, within its plain, white-washed walls, representatives of almost every possible phase of country society—from the peer to the ploughboy—the merchant to the miner.

Perhaps the best time to see this quaint little church is at Christmas or in the shooting season, when the great families are at home. Then from my quiet pew in the area I look around and above on four hundred faces, some furrowed and careworn, some round, plump, and contented, and others bright with the white-and-pink bloom of youth. The majority of the worshippers are "constant quantities," being discernible in the same places from week to week and month to month; farmers, shopkeepers, tradesmen, serving-men, gardeners, and miners, with their wives and families, scattered over the area and the back part of the galleries. The "variable quantities" again are the aristocratic element, whose places are filled only at occasional seasons. Opposite the pulpit sits the Earl of (say A, B, or C), a quiet-looking gentleman whom one might pass on a country road without notice, but whose ancestors have been distinguished in Scottish history for centuries. He is one of the pillars of the Scotch Church, and has been Lord Commissioner to the General Assembly. Beside him sits the Countess, as unpretentious as himself, and several sons and daughters of various ages. The Countess is the Lady Bountiful of the village, and to her, and to the family next in order, the school children owe many joyous treats.

The next family is that of a well-known baronet, who is also a pillar of the Church, his ordination to office being the event which has occasioned a larger attendance on the particular Sunday of which I write. He is the chief resident landowner in the parish, being at home for a considerable part of the year, and his hospitalities—like those of his forefathers—are proverbial. The numerous household around him present a pleasing picture. In the background of the galleries are seen butlers, coachmen, gamekeepers, housekeepers, and housemaids, the picture being family-like and interesting in the extreme, but with a touch of the feudal element, softened by the civilisation of the nineteenth century.

Add, to the elements already enumerated, a few country gentry, and we have before us every conceivable element of modern life—nobility, gentry, army, navy, agriculture, commerce, trade, and the professions generally. Altogether, this blending of social molecules, this Communism of the country church, is most salutary. All are equalised for the time by their interest in higher things, and reminded of their future equality by the tombstones on every side. "Outward Religion," says Carlyle, "originates by Society; Society becomes possible by Religion." "Religion is the inmost pericardial and nervous tissue of the Body Politic, which ministers life and warm circulation to the whole." Long may these social elements hang together in their entirety, though, alas! in many parishes the landlords have "flown" from the Presbyterian nest, and taken refuge under the eaves of Episcopacy.

But hush! the opening hymn has been given out. The human voice is the only instrument usually recognised in the Scottish Kirk. But in our parish the music is quite advanced; there is a little harmonium in front of the pulpit which attempts, and with considerable success, the sweetest and newest hymns; there is also a well-trained choir, itself a representative of parochial society, the line of sopranos containing, I see, a schoolmistress, a farmer's daughter, a post-mistress, a draper's assistant, a dressmaker; and the line of bass, a doctor, a clerk, a coal-grieve, a butler, and a farmer. The harmoniumist and choir-master is the village teacher, who has much credit by his flock, but now and again the Earl's daughter presides, and last Sunday (Sabbath, I should say) the Baronet's daughter made her début. The tune (Bethlehem) now being sung is quite a recent innovation in a Kirk whose traditions till lately eschewed everything savouring of Popery or Episcopacy; and as these had, from time immemorial, been in possession of the most precious music, hymn-literature, and general liturgy of bygone ages, the poor devoted Kirk was reduced to the "beggarly elements," the Psalms of David in metre to the barest and baldest of music. All this is being gradually changed, "Redheads," "Te Deum Laudamus," and "Lux Benigna," taking the place of "Elgin," "Martyrs," and "Dundee,"—tunes immortalised by Burns in the "Cottar's Saturday Night." The musical service, too, is assuming larger proportions, and is gradually encroaching on the preaching, the ancient copestone and glory of the Scottish Kirk.

But is this glory faded? Perhaps in a sense it is. In days when newspapers were rarely met with, beyond the walls of a town; when country libraries did not exist; and when books were few and scarce; the pulpit provided the only literature within reach of the bulk of the population. Then the minister spoke with an amount of boldness and of acceptation which one seldom meets with now, save in remote districts of the Highlands. The sermon was the chief feature of the service—but we question if it is so now. At least, preaching has toned down considerably from what it used to be. Read sermons and, in some cases, read prayers have superseded the extempore; the preacher's expression of opinion is more cautious; and one seldom hears of such gesticulation as that in the quaint description of an old divine—"He grat, and he swat, and he spat." And in country churches, it was a common thing for the service to include two sermons (with only a psalm and a prayer between) in too many cases provocative of sleep, from which the rural mind awoke, "if not edified, at least refreshed." Now, in most cases, there is but one short sermon; the music is a chief feature, if not of equal interest and importance with the sermon; no one thinks the service long, and the devotional feeling is better awakened. The read sermon, as a rule, is more thoughtful, better put together, and less rhapsodical. But there is a danger that this mode of preaching may in course of time become cold and lifeless. A preacher should, like Prometheus, steal fire from heaven occasionally—cast aside his paper—send home the pathos of his words by the personal emotion of voice, look, and gesture, and by a quasi-dramatic treatment of his subject draw tears from the pious eye, and send a thrill of terror through the sinner's frame. The pulpit might with profit take lessons from the stage—the preacher become the pupil of the player. Vocal training, graceful and suitable gesticulation, in fact, the principles and practice of oratory must receive greater and more general attention if the pulpit is to retain its influence, and the preacher to stand on a higher platform than that of a pleasant-voiced Scripture reader.

But while we muse, our preacher has brought his sermon for the day to a close, and intimates, amid multitudinous clearing of throats and readjustment of posture on the part of his hearers, that the ordination of an Elder will now be proceeded with. A hymn is given out, a step is heard on one of the gallery stairs, and the Baronet descends and takes his place in front of the pulpit, where the other Elders have already assembled. The hymn being ended, he steps out into the open space, a man in the prime of life, of true Saxon type, pleasant faced and thoughtful; himself for the moment the cynosure of every eye. His manly response, "I do," to the different questions of faith and of Church-allegiance directed to him is audible to every ear. He will uphold the Church and State, Presbyterianism as by law established, and strive in general walk and conversation to be an "ensample" to the congregation and the world. The ceremony, simple and of few minutes' duration, yet solemn and impressive, is concluded with prayer, the other Elders, one by one, give their newly admitted brother the right hand of Christian fellowship, and the congregation slowly disperses. Groups gather at the outer gates, for your upland rustics must have a last look at the nobler elements of humanity; the rumbling of wheels becomes fainter in the distance, and all wend their ways homeward, for another week, to the mansion, the farmhouse, or the cottage, having imbibed, we venture to hope, in the words of Keble:

One other little innovation I venture humbly to suggest, which may bring a smile to the lips of some parsons of my acquaintance, and besides to the verge of rebellion. The Scotch Kirk is generally tenantless except on Sabbath. Let it be opened for an hour or two each day, so that one so disposed, whether footsore or heartsore, may turn in and rest. Enter a Continental Church on an ordinary day, and you see a market-woman with a basket of eggs kneeling in a corner, a workman in his blouse lifting his eyes to the Cross. But in Scotland the Church is for the Sabbath only—and the village inn for the week-days.

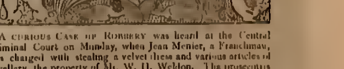
TRADE ON THE SIBERIAN RIVERS is fast developing, and the River Obi is now being navigated by over thirty steamers. The first successful trade voyage to North Siberia, made in one summer with cargoes both ways, has just been completed by a Bremen vessel, which has reached Hammerfest with Siberian wheat. The Neptune entered the Obi on August 13 with a miscellaneous supply of mercantile goods, and left again fully laden on the 24th ult., arriving at Hammerfest in thirteen days.



LEGAL

A CURIOUS CASE OF ROBBERY was heard at the Central Criminal Court on Monday, when Jean Menier, a Frenchman, was charged with stealing a velvet dress and various articles of jewellery, the property of Mrs. W. H. Weldon. The prosecutrix was Mrs. Weldon, whose name has recently been before the public in connection with her alleged illegal confinement in a lunatic asylum. Eleven years since she established an orphanage at Tavistock House, Tavistock Square, at which house she resided with her husband until a few years ago, when he went to live elsewhere. In 1874 the prisoner was introduced to her by M. Gounod, the composer, and she became considerably intimate with him and his wife. Last October Mrs. Weldon and the prisoner's wife left England for Paris, it being arranged that during their absence Tavistock House should be left in charge of a Mr. and Mrs. Lowther, the prisoner having no right to remain there. Finding him at the house, however, Mr. Lowther declined to stay in it, and he was left in possession. A few months afterwards, Mrs. Weldon returned to London, and on going to Tavistock House found a woman packing up a box of linen, her jewel case empty, and a considerable quantity of property missing. The relations between the prisoner and Mrs. Weldon appear to have been of a peculiar nature, and it was shown in the examination that she had lent him considerable sums of money, on one occasion the amount being 400*l*. The evidence was somewhat contradictory, one witness stating that she was present on one or two occasions when plate was sent to be pledged by the prisoner with Mrs. Weldon's knowledge, and that she had often heard Mrs. Weldon say that the prisoner was her partner, statements which Mrs. Weldon warmly denied. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, strongly recommending him to mercy on the ground of his being a foreigner, and his peculiar relations with the prosecutrix, and he was sentenced to six months' hard labour. Considerable amusement was caused on the second day of the trial, by Mr. Besley requesting that Mrs. Weldon should change her seat; and on her asking to what part of the court she should go, he replied, "I don't care where you sit but I really cannot perform my duty if Mrs. Weldon sits constantly before my eyes."

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——One of the results of the late collision on the Thames is the appearance of a woman "decently attired in mourning," who introduced herself to the inhabitants of Edmonton as the niece of the Rev. H. W. Burrows, vicar of that parish, stating she had been requested to collect subscriptions for the Mansion House Fund for the relief of the sufferers by the accident. As a matter of fact she had no connection with Mr. Burrows whatever, and it being proved that she had obtained several sums of money she was sentenced to a month's hard labour.—We had thought that butlers were a dignified and self-respectful class of men, though not altogether ignorant of the good things of life. But

THE ERECTION OF CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE ON THE THAMES EMBANKMENT every rule has an exception. The butler at Mr. Vaughan's, the magistrate, aroused one night last week by his dog, went into the kitchen, and saw a man lying under the table smoking. The man was John Anderson, also a butler, who explained that he had "been out drinking, and a friend had promised him a night's 'bunk.'" He was charged at Marylebone police court with the offence, when he said his friend, another butler, had promised to leave the window open for him. He had made a mistake in the house, and, in tapping at the window, it "got broken." He then pushed hard against the shutters, which gave way, and he got in and "fell down inside." He was discharged with a severe reprimand. People with butlers had better beware, if their servants go out drinking and leave kitchen windows open for inebriated or locked out friends.

—The conflict of authorities in Birmingham anent the recent fatal fire has ended in the release of Mr. Dennison, who was charged with the wilful murder of the people burned. What has become of the "fifty or sixty witnesses" which the superintendent of police said he had against him?—The report that Edward Reeves, recently arrested at Kilrush for obtaining money under false pretences, was implicated in the murder of Lord Leitrim is untrue.—The trial of James Prior for alleged frauds in connection with the Lombard Deposit Bank is postponed till the October Sessions.—A milk-dealer of Camden Town was fined 20*s.* and costs on Tuesday for selling milk containing sixteen per cent. of added water.—A young gentleman, a solicitor, was fined 20*s.* for ringing a bell "for a lark" at a quarter past one on Tuesday morning, Sir A. Lusk remarking, "It was a pity that some one did not pull the defendant's nose."—At the Central Criminal Court on Wednesday sentence of death was passed on Thomas Smithers for the murder of Amy Judge at Battersea last July. The defence unsuccessfully endeavoured to show that the prisoner's mind was not in a sound state when he committed the crime.—At Southsea on Wednesday a coroner's inquest was held on the body of Mrs. Florence Bravo, widow of the late Mr. Bravo, of Balham. The jury found that death was the result of excessive drinking.—On the same day a man named Thomas Hill was sentenced to twenty-one days' hard labour at Worship Street for starving and beating his daughter, aged thirteen. The medical officer of the parish said he had never before seen such a case of distress.—A writer in the Colonial Office has to undergo three months' hard labour for stealing books from the library of that department.

W. C. BENNETT'S NEW VOLUME,
Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 4s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett. "While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or riverping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.

THE FOUNTAIN—For all Christian Families.
THE FOUNTAIN—For all Sunday School Teachers.
THE FOUNTAIN—For all Sections of Christian Society.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—THE FOUNTAIN is designed to be a Family Paper, and is therefore marked by a great variety both of matter and style. In its pages will be found Prayers, Sermons, Articles, Essays, Reviews, Poems, Riddles, Puzzles, News, Illustrations, Points for Speeches, and Outlines for Sermons. THE FOUNTAIN, being under the commercial direction of an American Merchant, who has literary connections of special value, reprints the best American literature in addition to contributions by able English pens. Special regard is paid to the department of Fiction, so as to secure all its advantages without running any of its risks. The Pulpit section has been placed under my personal care, in which there will not only be fully reported sermons of my own, but, as often as practicable, a column of Sermon Seed by various writers, which preachers may find useful in suggesting topics of discourse. THE FOUNTAIN is already well known for the attention it pays to the wants and tastes of children and young people. In this department, parents will find much that will instruct and entertain their children, and gladden the whole Family circle. Allow me, therefore, very cordially to recommend to your immediate attention,

Tong Lane, Whitworth, Near Rochdale,
June 15, 1878.

Dear Sirs,—I received the box of Pills you sent by post safely. This medicine has been of the greatest use to me and my family without the aid of any doctors at all. No other medicine has been used but yours. I cannot fully detail to you how much good they have done our household.

About fifteen years ago I was suffering from colds and surfeits deeply rooted in the system, which resulted in partial locked-jaw. I tried various means for six or seven months. I was advised to try a great doctor that understood such cases. He examined me and told me he would cure me for £10 or £12; but I was unable to afford such a sum. At last I procured a small box of your Sovereign Remedy; the remarkable effects I shall never forget. After taking one small box at 2s. 9d., I was perfectly cured.

I confess myself to blame that I did not report this to you at the time. I cannot half recommend your Pills enough. I have never required any other medicine since I commenced with them. They clear the body from all impurities, and give comfort and sound health. We are never without them. You are at liberty to make what use you like of my letter.—I remain, yours truly,
JOHN WORMWELL,

To Messrs. Roberts & Co.

The above letter ought to convince the most sceptical of the amazing curative powers of PARR'S LIFE PILLS.

CORPULENCE. — DR. YATE HOLLAND'S POWDERS (or Pills) speedily and safely absorb superfluous fat and reduce corpulency, however long standing. 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. a box. —MARTIN and CO., 3, Paradise Road, London, S.W., or through any Chemist.

GOUT and RHEUMATISM.—The excruciating pain of gout and rheumatism is quickly relieved and cured in a few days by that celebrated medicine, BLAIR'S GOUT and RHEUMATIC PILLS. They require no restraint or diet during their use, and are certain to prevent the disease attacking any vital part. Sold by all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per box.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS are the finest purifiers of the blood. They speedily correct all disorders of the liver and stomach, are invaluable in cases of dysentery, and as a general family medicine have no equal.

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS. By the use of this invaluable medicine the blood is purified, and the constitution built up and strengthened.

Disease is thus prevented, and life prolonged. Evidence of the truth of these statements have been received by the Proprietors, during the last fifty years, from all parts of the world. One trial will convince the most sceptical of their value.

England and Afghanistan.——Great Britain has rarely received a grosser insult than that which the Ameer of Afghanistan has ventured to inflict upon her. A small party among us maintain that we ought not to have put ourselves in a position which made the rebuff possible; but, happily, this is not the view taken by the majority of Englishmen. The Government of India had the best reason to know that Russia was intriguing against us at Cabul; and to have made no effort to baffle her schemes would have been to incur the contempt of every native prince and of more than half the native population. This, however, is now a minor question. The main fact is that a petty Asiatic ruler has openly flouted us; and all parties are agreed that either he must make ample reparation, or that we must effectively punish him. It is improbable that the former alternative is the one before us. Whatever the ultimate designs of Russia may be, she professes to be his friend; and he evidently believes that she will help him to fight her battles. Of course there can be no doubt as to how the war will end, if war it is to be. A good many people shake their heads and recall the disastrous incident in the war of 1839; they apparently forget the special causes which led to that incident, and the ultimate issue of the struggle. Warned by previous experience, the military authorities will take every precaution; and, whether Afghanistan is backed by Russia or not, she will sooner or later be altogether at our mercy. Our triumph will be made all the more easy by the fact that many of the wild tribes over which the Ameer nominally rules are discontented with his government, and would welcome us as friends. When the war is over, it will be a most serious question what we ought to do with the country we have subdued. We can hardly annex it, since we have already more territory than we can easily manage; but we must so far make ourselves its masters as to secure the inlets and outlets to the various passes of the Suleiman range. This has now become absolutely essential, for Russia is steadily pressing forward, and is already far nearer to us than would once have been deemed possible. In these circumstances we should almost deserve to lose India if we did not adopt obvious precautions for its defence; and it certainly cannot be said that the Afghans will be losers by our increased power. If our influence prevails in their country, they will retain all the solid advantages of independence; advantages of which they would soon be deprived were they to place themselves under the control of Russia.

Coroners' Inquests and their Objects.——Would it not be well if the scope of these inquiries was more accurately defined than appears to be the case at present? There is a vast difference between endeavouring to ascertain the cause of a death, and endeavouring to ascertain whether, in cases where the fatality is attributable to human agency, any particular person or persons is to be held responsible for it. In the case of the victims lost by the wreck of the Princess Alice the cause of death was self-evident,—they were drowned through the collision of two vessels on the river. The inquest on some of the bodies which chanced to come under the jurisdiction of the Poplar coroner was held on this principle, and consequently, after a very brief inquiry, a verdict of "Found Drowned" was returned. The Woolwich inquest is being held on the other principle, namely, with the view of finding out, if possible, whether any persons (and, if so, what persons) were to blame for the disaster. Of course, it is most proper that a searching inquiry of this sort should take place, but, as it involves the presence of an array of lawyers, and the production of a vast mass of so-called evidence, it is questionable whether the coroner is the proper officer to undertake such an exhaustive investigation, for the simple reason that here we have all the apparatus of a criminal court of justice—barristers, jury, and witnesses, presided over by a functionary who has usually no trained knowledge of law. A crucial example of the defectiveness of such unskilled presidency was afforded by the Bravo case, where the coroner was completely overridden by the counsel who appeared for the various parties interested, and where an enormous quantity of allegations was allowed to be made, having no practical bearing on the matter in hand, and of an extremely scandalous and offensive description. Besides, under the existing system, the same evidence is repeated two or three times over, causing a great waste both of time and money. In the Wainwright case, the coroner's inquest and the magistrate's examination were running side by side, and then this twice-told tale had to be repeated all over again at the Old Bailey. Just so with regard to the Princess Alice. The same witnesses who appeared before the coroner will give their evidence before the Wreck Commissioner, and should any persons be accused of manslaughter, first a magistrate, and then a judge and jury will have to hear the whole story over again. Another objection to the present method of conducting coroners' inquests is that a man may appear as a witness and be afterwards committed for trial, having thus, contrary to the established principle of English law, given evidence against himself.

Austria and Bosnia.——The Austrians may still have some trouble in Bosnia; but the struggle appears to be virtually at an end. At any rate, even the most enthusiastic Mahomedan knows that it must ultimately result in the triumph of Austria; and probably very few have the least expectation that when once the invader has possession of the country he will ever voluntarily leave it. Austria undertook the task of ruling the province nominally only for a limited time; the difficulties she has had to encounter will, however, give her an excellent pretext for declaring her "occupation" perpetual. There can be hardly any doubt that Count Andrassy has aimed at this all along. At the time when the troubles in Herzegovina broke out it was well known that Austria had secretly encouraged the insurrection; and she can scarcely have done this from any other motive than the hope of profiting by the disasters of the Porte. Englishmen have no reason to regret that in all her future movements in South-Eastern Europe Russia will be met by a watchful rival; but the Austrian Emperor may well doubt whether he has made a profitable bargain. He is adding largely to the Slavonic element among his subjects, and this is the very element over which his dynasty has always had the weakest hold. To Western Europeans, who can never forget the fate of Russian Poland, it appears strange that Russia should attract the sympathies of a single Slav beyond her frontiers; nevertheless, it is true that she has an extraordinary fascination for the Slavs of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. These races are so ignorant that, in their opinion, a Pan-Slavonic State, with Russia at its head, would bring them unheard-of advantages from which, so long as they are under the Hapsburgs, they must be for ever excluded. A war with Russia would, therefore, be attended by grave dangers for Austria; dangers which she herself is deliberately increasing. Could Count Andrassy have hoped to excite the enthusiasm of the Hungarians and the Germans by the annexation of Bosnia, it would have been possible to understand his policy; but the Hungarians are deeply offended by what is going on, while the inhabitants of the German provinces seem to have no other feeling than regret for the brave soldiers who have fallen in the enterprise. To add to these vexations, every taxpayer in the Empire is irritated by the increased expenditure forced upon a State already overburdened. Count Andrassy will have cause to congratulate himself if all this discontent does not seek for utterance in something more threatening than eloquent speeches.

Dismal Art.——The complaint, which has been justly made, that the bulk of the subjects chosen by our modern artists is of a sorrowful or repulsive character, may be applied to other matters besides pictures. Most of our modern poets pitch their effusions in the minor key, the writers rarely afford the impression of being in thoroughly vigorous bodily and mental health, there is a trail of dyspepsia and blue-devilism in all they touch. The minor versifiers, too, who write songs to be wedded to music, are equally doleful. If at a concert, or in a drawing-room, you hear a ballad the words of which are robust and jovial, you may be pretty sure that it was written at least thirty years ago. Of course there are plenty of comic songs in existence, but they are for the most part either vulgar or cynical, and are usually, in actual fact, more depressing than their professedly melancholy congeners. As for our novelists, too, they are also a dismal tribe, taken collectively. Vice and crime are the levers with which they chiefly try to raise public interest, and the art of provoking an innocent (as opposed to a cynical) laugh seems almost extinct. Of the modern drama we need not speak, as it can scarcely be called a British product—it is merely a pale moon borrowing its light from the garish Parisian sun. How comes it that we are so much more dismal than our ancestors, who lacked many things which to us seem necessaries? Perhaps we are dismal just because of these luxuries, and of the changes they have brought with them. Incessant travelling (of a kind, too, which affords no bodily exercise), the substitution of outdoor excitement for quiet home employments, late hours, over-indulgence in tea and tobacco, and, above all, the want of a hearty belief in God and in a future state, are possibly some of the provoking causes of the depressed animal spirits of this generation.

Russia and Afghanistan.——The Russians vigorously deny that they have any connection with the violent proceedings of the Ameer of Afghanistan. No one expected them to do anything else, but, all the same, their guilt is beyond question. The Ameer is a headstrong and impulsive barbarian, but he is not so very silly as to rush without encouragement upon his own destruction. Russia must have done everything in her power to induce him to defy us; and it is not at all hard to understand her motive. Although we made many concessions to her at the Berlin Congress, she knows that she came off second best in her diplomatic contest with us; and the Anglo-Turkish Convention filled her with alarm and jealousy. Her intrigues at Cabul are simply an attempt to pay us back for the humiliation she forced us to inflict upon her. Prince Gortchakoff apparently hopes to turn away from himself in this way the wrath of Moscow, and perhaps even to regain a little of his former popularity. That he will advise his master to support Afghanistan by arms is incredible, for Russia has rarely been less able to carry on war with a great Power than at the present moment; but it is certain that his agents will continue to stir up mischief between the Ameer and this country. The Russians do not appear to realise that they are amusing themselves with edged tools. England is probably the most pacific country in the world; peace is of such enormous importance to her that she is always willing to make great sacrifices to maintain it. But her history proves that if she becomes convinced of the steady hostility of another Power she is capable of departing wholly from her ordinary calculations, and defending herself with pertinacious vigour. And she now regards Russia with constantly increasing suspicion. What have the Russians to do in Cabul at all? They have repeatedly given us the most solemn pledges that they would never seek to interfere with Afghanistan, and for a long time we did our best to believe them sincere. The meaning of their present proceedings can only be that they wish to push forward to our frontier, and afterwards to dispute with us our supremacy in Southern Asia. Let Englishmen become thoroughly convinced of this, and, whether the Russians desire it or not, war with them will be inevitable. We shall certainly not, if we can help it, allow them to decide the conditions under which the struggle will take place; nor, if they compel us to enter upon it, shall we do so with any doubt as to the result. A Power which found it hard work to defeat Turkey, which is on the verge of bankruptcy, and which has alienated the sympathies of every civilised State, can hardly be a match for Great Britain; and the more intelligent class of Russians are well aware of the fact, and are angry with their rulers for recklessly exposing their country to needless danger.

Armed Merchant Steamers.——Although our own merchant fleet is unrivalled in numbers and efficiency, other nations beside ourselves possess serviceable vessels, and if (which Heaven forefend!) we should go to war with one of the Great Powers, that Power would doubtless endeavour to increase its maritime strength by purchasing all the suitable ships it could lay its hands on. Talk of privateering being abolished! The name may be changed, but the thing will flourish more than ever if another great war should break out. The American Civil War, with its Alabamas and Floridas, lifted a corner of the curtain of the future, and showed us what we may expect. It is quite possible that in such a war the monster ironclads on which we lavish such heaps of money would play but a secondary part. They would be chiefly reserved for coast defence, while the real hard fighting would take place far away at sea in the shape of desperate gunwale-to-gunwale conflicts between "converted" Cunarders, China tea clippers, and such-like craft. It is absurd to suppose that if we turn our commercial steamers into men-of-war other nations will neglect to follow the example.

Protection in the Colonies.——The Marquis of Lorne will find the conditions of political life in Canada wholly different from those amid which Lord Dufferin has lately had to govern. In the electoral struggle which has just come to a close the so-called Liberals have been completly defeated by the so-called Conservatives. If the parties bearing these names in this country were to go through a similar experience at the present moment, the fact would mean the triumph of the Imperial policy of Lord Beaconsfield. But an issue of such magnitude is not raised in Colonial politics. The meaning of the Conservative triumph in Canada is that a policy of Protection is about to be entered upon with the hearty goodwill of the vast majority of the population. The Canadians are being severely lectured by some English politicians for what are called their retrogressive tendencies; and in this respect they receive the same treatment as the Australians and various other members of our Colonial Empire who have also displayed hostility to the doctrine of Free Trade. England, even, is being blamed for having conceded to her colonies the right of imposing duties upon British commodities. This appears to us a very one-sided way of looking at the question. It so happened, when the Corn Laws were abolished, that everything was in favour of the system we then adopted; and our insular position will always make it easier for us than for any other country to carry out Free Trade principles. Even we, however, have of late had some reason to doubt whether we have not been a little misled by the formula that we should buy in the cheapest market and sell in th dearest. Other nations so obstinately refuse to follow our example– most of them are so systematically moving in exactly the opposite direction—that it may be questioned whether we do not often buy in the dearest market and sell in the cheapest. But whatever may be our own fortunes, it is certain that young communities cannot stand the strain which we are able to endure. Many of their manufactures, if not protected, must simply die, since it is impossible for them to compete on equal terms with the trade of old and highly organised States. This was recognised by so determined an upholder of free trade as the late John Stuart Mill; and the Canadians and Australians may surely be excused for acting upon his admissions. The Canadians have a particularly good case, since their neighbours are almost fanatical believers in the virtues of protection. Were the European markets more open than they are, the Dominion would find it necessary in some measure to defend itself against the exclusiveness of the United States.

Her Majesty's Tower.——Artemus Ward once, in his grotesque fashion, described the Tower of London as "a sweet boon," but the epithet is scarcely likely to be applied to it by those who go thither on the so-called "free days." Visitors are kept waiting for hours, they are jostled and hustled about—no light matter when we remember that many of them are young children—and some of them are compelled to retire in sheer weariness, leaving "the sweet boon" unentered. Now who is responsible for this disgraceful state of affairs? We say deliberately, "disgraceful," for it is a mere mockery to profess to open the Tower free, and make no provision to enable visitors to see it in comfort. If the crowds who come are really so numerous as to be unmanageable, it would be far better to lessen their numbers by charging a small fee, but we are inclined to think that the mischief arises from taking the sightseers round the old fortress in squads under the charge of a succession of beefeaters. Why not allow the public to circulate freely all over the building instead of "rushing" them through in gangs, like sheep going into a butcher's yard? Such a plan would, of course, involve a larger staff of attendants to protect the public property, but the cost would not be great, as the extra staff would only be needed during the summer months and on holidays, and we feel sure the nation would not grudge the expense.

Indian and African Elephants.——In Asia the value of the elephant has been fully recognised from time immemorial. His strength and sagacity have caused him to be the favourite of priests and kings, the chief actor in royal pageants, the indispensable attendant in the battle field and at the tiger hunt, the faithful and willing servant of the engineer and the agriculturist. Far other has been the fate of his flap-eared cousin of "the Dark Continent." Savages have hunted him for his flesh, civilised men (as he has the misfortune to own big tusks) have hunted him for his ivory. As arms of precision have gradually superseded the bow and arrow and the lance, his numbers have been reduced, he has been driven into the far interior, and it is quite possible that, if matters go on much longer as they now are, this noble quadruped, the majestic living reminder of the old days when frogs were as big as bullocks, and elks towered like giraffes, will become as extinct as his hairy-coated brother, the mammoth. Just now, however, there is a faint ray of light in the gloom which enshrouds his future prospects. Why, it has been proposed, should he not be tamed, and used, as in Asia, for human service? That the African elephant can be tamed is proved by the docility shown by those exhibited at the Alexandra Palace under the charge of the Nubians, whose kindliness and skill in the management of their four-footed comrades puts to shame a good many of our countrymen's behaviour towards the animals placed in their charge.

THE MINISTERIAL WHITEBAIT DINNER AT GREENWICH

There is a pleasant touch of old-fashioned simplicity in the spectacle of the Ministers celebrating the close of the Session by a fish dinner at Greenwich. It recalls the doings of our school-days, when boys were really boys, and not as they now often are—premature men, and when the night previous to breaking-up day was devoted to a general "tuck-out" in the bedrooms. After such a Session as that which has lately closed, during which it appeared to be the principal duty of the Opposition to ask questions, often inconvenient and difficult to answer, Ministers must naturally have anticipated with some delight the arrival of a time when the voice of Parliament—at all events at Westminster—would be hushed, and when they could be only bullied for their alleged misdeeds either in the columns of newspapers or in members' local addresses to their constituents. As Lord Beaconsfield is generally the life and soul of the assembled guests, it was unfortunate that he was absent from the late whitebait banquet. We remember seeing him about ten years ago (when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer) standing in the bow-window of the "Ship" Tavern making those of his colleagues who had already assembled smile at his witticisms, and anon raising his eye-glass, and glancing up the river for the steamboat which had been chartered to bring down the remainder of Her Majesty's political advisers.

Our artist thus describes his sketches:—

"(1) An old sailor had a still older cannon, from which he loyally fired salutes every few minutes. (2) A band and procession came in front of the hotel and played 'See the Conquering Hero,' until, being told Lord Beaconsfield wasn't present, they changed the tune to "By Jingo, if We do." (3) When the Ministers arrived, a crowd had collected in and about the hotel, which cheered enthusiastically on the appearance of Salisbury. Having always heard of the Ministerial Whitebait Dinner coupled somehow with 'the Balcony,' (and evidently everybody else had the same tradition as myself), I waited, expecting them to appear at some time on the balcony. As they didn't, and feeling sure that they ought to have done so, I made the sketch to show that I hadn't neglected my duty. The last sketch shows the Telegraph reporter anxiously trying to make out who the 36th man is (I think the number was 36); as he had been told there were 36, and could only count 35. The dinner being strictly a private one, the only privileged persons allowed inside the room were the waiters. The reporter, therefore, found it difficult to do his work in the conscientious manner he evidently prided himself on. He at last found the 36th man at the foot of the table, concealed by some obstruction from where he had tried to count the party."

THE EVICTION ON THE LEITRIM ESTATE

The house and farm shown in this sketch are interesting as being the scene of a summary re-ejectment which has created much local excitement. The house, which is situated near the spot where the late Lord Leitrim was assassinated in April last, was formerly occupied by a widow named Algoe, and it seems that she was evicted from it about two years ago by the late Lord Leitrim, after having been paid the full amount of compensation and costs awarded to her by Judge Battersby, before whom her land-claim was heard. On the 5th inst. she and her two sons took forcible possession of the place, from whence they were again evicted last week by the agent for the Leitrim estate, and a number of bailiffs. The brothers Algoe, however, made a determined resistance, and were subsequently fined by the magistrates for having assaulted the agent and his men.

VESUVIUS IN ERUPTION—INTERIOR OF THE CRATER

Vesuvius has within the last few days shown indications of an impending eruption on a grand scale—so much so, indeed, that anxiety is felt for the safety of the villages which surround its base. The view of the interior of the crater which we engrave is from a sketch made by Mr. Chares Royle four weeks ago, when the eruption began to assume a more than usually active form. It will be seen that the lava is thrown up from the cone in the centre of the hollow forming the crater, and this being gradually filled up in this manner, the burning ashes threaten to overflow into the country below. Subsequent accounts state that Vesuvius is in a state of partial and intermittent eruption; at the base of the cone are immense fissures, from which flames and lava are issuing. The crater is almost full. The volcanic activity is on the increase, and a cone is forming.

WASHING THE FEET

The ceremony of washing the feet takes place on the Thursday in Greek Easter week. A high scaffolding is erected in the courtyard of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is neatly decorated with the emblems of the Greek Church. Twelve Bishops represent the Apostles. The Greek Patriarch, who is remarkably fat, has a towel tied round his loins, and with difficulty stoops and kneels to wash the feet of his Bishops from a golden ewer and basin. After this ceremony they enact the Agony on the Mount of Olives, the disciples lying asleep on the stairs of the scaffold, while the Patriarch prays under a real branch of an olive tree from Olivet, which is eventually distributed to the noisy crowd of Christian devotees below.

SACRED ALLIGATORS AT MUGGUR TALAO

Eight miles north of Kurrachee, in Scinde, there is a collection of hot springs which swarm with alligators. Hence the place is called Muggur Talao, or the Alligators' Pool. These creatures are very tame, and never seek to injure human beings. They are genuine alligators, and are totally distinct from the guryal, or long-snouted crocodile, which abounds in the Indus, a short distance to the east. These hot springs belong to several fakirs, who have attached themselves to the tomb of a Mahomedan saint. They are situated among rocky hills, and spring out of the bottom of a small fertile valley, thickly wooded with date-trees and acacias, over which the white dome of the shrine is visible. It is a favourite place for picnics, and one of the chief parts of the entertainment is to see the muggurs fed. The scaly monsters know what is coming, and lie with their heads half out of the water, and their eyes and mouths open with anxious expectation. The goat which is thrown in is speedily torn to pieces. There is one muggur, a very old fellow, who is too lazy or too weak to scramble with the others, and who is fed by a man calling himself the padre, or priest. He opens the "Rajah's" mouth with one hand, and throws the food down his throat with the other.—Our engravings are from sketches by Mr. G. D. Giles, 19th Regiment N.I.

"BEAUTY AND THE BEAST"

Here we have a new version of the delightful old fairy tale, only that in this case the sexes are reversed; Beauty belongs to the masculine gender, and Beast is a lady. It is remarkable that while among men—especially where civilisation, as we are pleased to call it, is advancing—plainness of dress is the rule, and indulgence in finery is the privilege of the softer sex, Nature does not thus treat her feathered children, for she almost invariably bestows all her bravery of plumage on the cock, leaving the hen, by comparison, plain, and almost dowdy. We fancy that in Mr. Barber's picture the feelings of Mrs. Hereafter Bacon somewhat resemble those of a hard-working cottager's wife, who has much ado to find her numerous family a sufficiency of bread and shoe leather, and by whose door sweeps a fine lady looking as if she had just stepped out of a fashion-plate.

WHITE ISLAND, NEW ZEALAND

This remarkable island is situated in the Bay of Plenty (Province of Auckland), about fifty miles north-east of Tauranga, where a famous fight with the Maories formerly took place. The island derives its name from the clouds of white steam in which it appears, to passing mariners, to be continually enveloped. Its area is only about 600 acres, while its height is about 880 feet above the level of the sea. It resembles in form and colour a reposing camel, while the interior, with its grey weather-beaten almost perpendicular cliffs, recalls the Coliseum at Rome. Deep water exists close into the beaches, which are studded with large water-worn boulders, as shown in one of our engravings. Overhanging the southern landing-place stands a column of rock, closely resembling a sentinel, which the owners of the island, Messrs. Wilson and Troup, have dedicated to the immortal memory of Captain Cook. Proceeding inland, across the flat, which is principally composed of gypsum impregnated with sublimed sulphur, and everywhere perceptibly warm even through the thickest boots, the traveller reaches Lake Hope. Here the fumes of sulphur are plainly perceptible by nose, palate, and eyes; while the ear is treated to a sound like the roar of Niagara Falls. The water is of a pale green hue, and is strongly impregnated with muriatic acid. In fact, when boats are placed upon this lake for the purpose of approaching the active geysers at the opposite side, the nails in their bottoms are carefully examined to make sure that they are of copper, and not of iron; and wearing apparel, when dipped in this water, at once turns a brick-red colour, and shortly after parts company with the rest of the garment. The depth of the water is about 12 feet, and the temperature 110°. The mouth of the biggest geyser is about 12 feet across. The lake is surrounded by black liquid mud, dangerous to walk upon. Four feet below the surface a temperature of 200° was attained. The steam from the various craters rises over the highest point of the island, and the particles of sulphur ejected from these craters along with it fall again, like yellow soot, into the lake itself. Near one of the geysers are found immense blocks of pure sulphur, honeycombed and blistered, and still warm when chipped off and hauled into the boat. These exactly resemble lumps of yellow coal, and fetch the same price as the "roll" sulphur of commerce, being pronounced equal to the finest Sicilian or Spanish product. On a fine moonlight night an awe-inspiring spectacle is afforded to the visitor who sits in a boat in the middle of this placid, but treacherous lake. Around him for fifty acres extends an immense cauldron, hissing and snorting, and belching forth volumes of poisonous steam, while all chances of egress appear to be denied by the steep, silent, and gloomy cliffs which encircle these enchanted waters.—Our engravings are from photographs by Mr. Collie, of Napier, N.Z., who, accompanied by a youth, camped out on the island for twenty-five days; and they were forwarded to us by Mr. Edward Wayte, stationer, Queen Street, Auckland, N.Z.

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS

In our first engraving, which is taken from a sketch by Captain McCalmont, we have a view of Sir Garnet Wolseley's encampment, situate about a mile from Nicosia, the capital of the island. The building on the right is the ancient Monastery of Kiko, and in the distance are seen some of the mountains of the Karpas range, whose northern sides descend abruptly to the sea. The large marquees are the quarters and mess tents of His Excellency and Staff; and as the temperature in these at noon is usually 110° Fahrenheit, some idea may be formed of the sufferings of the troops from heat in the comparatively thin bell tents, which afford little or no protection from the penetrating rays of the sun. The latest official account of the condition of the troops is very unsatisfactory. Fever had again broken out at Dali, and 400 men out of 2,622 were either in hospital or at light duty, or convalescent. Twenty-one deaths had occurred since landing. However, two shiploads of huts arrived on Tuesday, and, in view of the increased unhealthiness which might possibly result from the approaching wet season, orders had been given to withdraw the 101st Regiment from the island. The view of the façade of St. Mark's Church, Famagusta, is from a photograph kindly lent us by Dr. L. Sabunjie. The church which is a fine specimen of Mediæval architecture, was partially destroyed when the Turks conquered the island, and has since been converted into a mosque by the addition of minarets and other alterations.

RETURN OF THE FINNISH GUARD TO ST. PETERSBURG

These troops returned to St. Petersburg September 15; they left the city 4,000 strong; only one-half returned. They were received with enthusiastic applause and hurrahs, wreaths and nosegays were thrown to them by the public. For the arrival of the troops a triumphal arch was erected in one of the chief streets bearing the following inscription:—"To the Russian brave and victorious army." At the top, on the chief flag, was inscribed: "To the brave heroes," while from each side in the small arches two shields, one from each side, with the year 1877 and 1878, are visible. At the top, in the middle of the arch, the St. George's Order, with striped ribbon, is to be seen. They were received by the clergy of the chief churches, who after a short ceremony congratulated them with their return.

THE NEW LIGHTSHIP AT KING'S LYNN

The new lightship, Bar Flat, which has just been placed in position, is likely to prove of great utility to all vessels frequenting the North Sea. It was built for the Corporation, at a cost of over 2,000*l.*, by Messrs. Schlesinger, Davis, and Co., of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The hull is of iron, and is divided into three water-tight compartments, and all her rigging and fittings are of the best possible kind. Upon her one mast, at a height of forty feet water-level, is the usual spherical cage which acts as a signal by day, and immediately below this is the lighting apparatus, consisting of dioptric lanterns on a triangular frame, the three lights apparently blending into one at a distance, and being visible at all points of the compass within a radius of seven nautical miles. The intention is to throw a strong yellow light up to and through the red stripe thrown by Hunstanton Light upon the northern end of the Roaring Middle Shoal. Vessels will therefore be guided from the Lynn Well (lightship) to the Roaring Middle by the Hunstanton Light, at which position they will sight the new light, which is moored about five nautical miles above the Roaring Middle, and northward of the Westmark Knock Sand, which divides the Lynn and Wisbeach Channels. The Bar Flat was launched on the 16th of July, and towed round to Lynn, where she remained in dock until the 12th inst, when she was towed out and successfully anchored in the position above described. Several members of the Corporation, and Port and Harbour Committee were on board the tug, on board of which a luncheon was given by the Mayor in celebration of the event.

CAPE CONVICTS AT WORK

"The first sight on arriving at Cape Town," says our artist, "is a number of men with large figures on their clothing, working under the eyes of armed men. These are convicts of 'Cape manufacture,' to use the expression made to me by a Cape man, and are employed to a great extent on the harbour and in a quarry which supplies the stone for the same. There is a sprinkling of whites among the large mass of coloured men who form the main body, and who take good care not to overwork themselves when the eye of the overseer is not upon them."

THE RECENT FLOODS IN THE TYROL

Consequent upon the continued warm damp currents of air which prevailed during the summer, followed by heavy rain, the glaciers of the Zillerthaler mountain chain were much affected, and on the 16th and 17th of August, between Prettau and Taufers, nine mountain streams rushed down into the valley, carrying with them huge boulders, rubbish, sand, and timber. The wildest of these mountain torrents was the Rohrbach, between Arzbach and St. Martin; it brought such masses of earth, wood, &c., with it, that the Ahr was impeded in its course, and formed a lake towards St. Martin. On Saturday, the 17th of August, after an anxious, watchful night, during which the storm bells of the neighbouring churches pealed, and the inhabitants of Sand worked at strengthening the dam, the Ahr broke into the village. In the Ahrn as well as in the Taufers valley, the destruction was immense. Many of the houses were completely buried, and in Luttach the Ahr left its bed entirely, and rushed over the low-lying houses, devastating everything in its course. St. Martin was also inundated, and towards Schloss Taufers the waters wrought fearfully, completely swamping the road from behind the castle to Sand. This village suffered severely, hardly fifty square yards remaining over which the water had not passed, leaving a settlement of sand, stones, &c., five and six feet deep. In some places the water heaped up sand, huge stones, remains of buildings, and uprooted trees, in others it ploughed up the land into deep furrows. Such was the rapidity with which the flood spread itself that the inhabitants had barely time to escape with their lives; while in the Zillerthal and other places to which the flood extended several lives were lost. The damage is reckoned to be about a million and a half guldens. Help is greatly needed, and the devastation of the harvest threatens serious things for the coming winter. The Emperor Franz Josef has granted 2,000 guldens from his private purse, and the State 6,000 guldens for the Alvres and Taufers Valley, and another 6,000 for the Ziller Valley. Subscriptions are also being started, and will most probably take a national character.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Mr. C. P. Weeks.

DIVERS OFF FUNCHAL, MADEIRA

On the arrival of the mail steamer off Funchal, Madeira, the vessel, which stops a few hours to land passengers, &c., and to take in a supply of fresh vegetables and fruit for the rest of the voyage, is immediately surrounded by a number of boats to take off passengers, and with various articles for sale. The first, however, to arrive are full of boys and young men, who dive after pieces of silver money thrown overboard by passengers who wish to see their dexterity. As the piece of money, owing to its shape, offers considerable resistance to the water, it revolves and sinks but slowly, and, as the water is very transparent, it is usually caught three or four feet below the surface. When it sinks lower, there are only one or two men good enough to fetch it up. When the sixpences begin to get few and far between, it is amusing to see how the divers all tumble into the water after them, and as they are all over-eager, it is frequently clutched by some one wary enough to go to a good depth at once.

HOME.

Political Affairs.—The Lord Chancellor has been gazetted a Viscount and Earl of the United Kingdom, his new titles being Viscount Garmoile and Earl Cairns.—The Marquis of Lorne, who has been made a Knight Grand Cross of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, on Tuesday bade farewell to his constituents at Inverary in a very sensible speech, in which he thanked them for never having sought to place him in the extraordinary position, now so common, of a trusted man who is always asking to be trusted, congratulated them on having chosen so able a man to succeed him in Parliament, and cautioned them to be careful in the future to avoid the "swirl of party passions." Alluding to his approaching departure for Canada, he said that there were many men who would do well, if they could hold the plough, to follow the gallant example of their countrymen who have done glory to the old land in forming another great British nation, and instead of an unhealthy city life, take to the life-giving work of a settler in the agricultural regions of West Canada, where they were likely to live longer and to be happier than is the lot of the great majority of mankind here.—Lord Carnarvon gave a dinner to his Nottingham tenantry on Saturday, and, in replying to the toast of his health, he said he wished that the predictions he had made at the end of the Session had been falsified by events. Every hour that had gone by had justified his fear that what had been misnamed a Treaty of Peace did not contain the elements of permanence; and with regard to the acquisition of Cyprus, he apprehended that the more the case was examined the worse it would prove for England. Our responsibilities were constantly growing; and it was becoming a serious question whether they were not already too much for us. Fireworks were very convenient, and sometimes desirable; but they should be displayed only occasionally, not become the stock-in-trade of Government policy. This was a very questionable time for our interference in Afghanistan, when on all sides there were rumours of possible war in that State. Much more than war, however, he dreaded the conquest or occupation of Afghanistan. As to Turkey, it was crumbling to pieces as fast as possible.—Sir Michael Hicks Beach, the Secretary for the Colonies, speaking at Winchcombe on Friday, said that the Government would be the last to claim for themselves that, in as difficult and lengthened a crisis as any country had passed through, they had been free from mistakes, but if their conduct was viewed irrespectively of party politics, the majority of their countrymen would say that in the harassing, difficult, and trying times they had experienced, the Government had tried to do their duty. He did not hold forth the Treaty of Berlin as the particular work of the English Government, or as the particular arrangement that England would liked to have. In another speech delivered on Wednesday at Moreton-in-the-Marsh, he eulogised the conduct of the colonies for the loyal spirit they had shown in the late crisis, coming forward with volunteers in numbers sufficient to form whole brigades for European service. When the peril was past, and the honour of the country had been maintained, congratulations poured in upon Her Majesty's Government from Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. As to a dissolution of Parliament, he felt that if the country was satisfied, as he believed it was, with its representatives, the Government itself had no reason to complain.—Mr. Childers, M.P., in addressing the members of the Barrow-in-Furness Liberal Club, said that the party should not be impatient, but take advantage of this period of minority to prepare for the time when, as they had for the last forty or fifty years, they might be able to direct the affairs of the country.—The recent Liberal victory at Newcastle-under-Lyme was celebrated on Monday by a demonstration in which the members for the borough and several other members of Parliament took part, a resolution was passed declaring that the return to Parliament of Mr. Edge for Newcastle-under-Lyme, and Lord Colin Campbell for Argyleshire, plainly indicated that the policy pursued by Lord Beaconsfield did not meet with the approval of the country.

A New Temperance Campaign.——On Tuesday, at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, the famous American orator, Mr. J. B. Gough, delivered the first of a series of lectures under the auspices of the National Temperance League. Sir Charles Reed, who presided, made an introductory speech, in which he said that the public conscience had been greatly awakened upon the subject, and that there was a decided improvement in the drinking customs of the nation. He also congratulated his hearers on the medical testimony which had recently been given as to the effect of alcohol, and on the changed demeanour of ministers of religion in reference to the subject. Mr. Gough, who was most enthusiastically received by the crowded audience, said that he had nothing new to urge in favour of the cause which he came to advocate, and which he had advocated twenty-five years ago. He was sixty-one years old, and had travelled 420,000 miles, and delivered thousands of speeches, without having a single day's illness since 1846. He had done all this on cold water and unaided by stimulants. Some doctors prescribed alcohol because they liked to take a little with their patients, others because they knew nothing about it, but if any dared to prescribe it for him his wife would quickly show him the door. Some people contended that the Bible permitted and sanctioned the use of wine. It was mean, sneaking, cowardly, and contemptible, to search the Bible for permission to gratify a propensity, and then reject all God's requirements. Others taught that if a man became a Christian it took away from him the appetite for drink. He disavowed such teaching, and did not believe in it. You could poison a Christian as soon as a Hottentot. If an unbeliever and a man brimming over with the grace of God took prussic acid together it would knock them both over. Total abstinence was their only safety. Many a man with the grace of God in his heart had been ruined by drink in spite of it. The lecture was preceded by the singing of a number of Temperance songs by the choir of the League; and at its conclusion a vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Spurgeon and the deacons, for the use of the Tabernacle.

Miscellaneous Items.——H.M.S. Alert, Captain Sir G. Nares, K.C.B., sailed from Portsmouth on Tuesday for a two-years' surveying cruise in the South Pacific Ocean.—On Saturday last Lord Rosebery opened a new School of Science and Art at Falkirk, and, to use his own expression, "wagged his pow" in the pulpit of a neighbouring church, the School itself not being large enough to accommodate his auditory. He said that the anxiety now shown for information in science and art was a distinct landmark in the intellectual advancement of the country, and that he should like to see every town of 40,000 inhabitants with its public library and museum. Though that day might not be near at hand, yet they would not have done much as regarded the work of civilisation until that object was nearly accomplished.—Principal Shairp, in his retiring address as President of the Educational Institute of Scotland, at Edinburgh on Saturday, spoke with considerable acerbity of his compatriots, whose special characteristics he declared to be sectarianism and the love of money. In Scotch education the social side had been almost entirely neglected, the result of which was to be seen in the High Street of Glasgow, which was "the nether pit of social barbarism."—The Eisteddfod at Birkenhead was brought to a close on Friday, when Lord Aberdare presided, and delivered an address on "Welsh Education." He deprecated disparaging comparisons between English and Welsh people. He was much pleased to see that such a spirit was dying out, and that in none of the subjects treated of during that meeting had he observed one single reference to Caractacus or Sir Thomas Picton.—On Friday last the Duke of St. Albans was installed as Grand Master of the Nottingham Province of Freemasons in the room of the Duke of Newcastle, who resigned in 1876. The ceremony was held in the picture gallery of the Castle Museum, the Earl of Carnarvon as Pro-Grand Master presiding.—The work of clearing the Abercarne Pit of Water is expected to take several days longer, and will probably cost about 25,000*l.* On Sunday the divers, after spending five hours below water, stated that they could not descend the shaft low enough to reach the pumping tank. The engineers consequently decided to employ winding engines, which will raise 1,500,000 gallons per day. On Wednesday the Mansion House Fund stood at 16,000*l.* The Queen has replied to the memorial sent to her by Mr. Lever, a coal merchant of Manchester and London, suggesting the inauguration of a permanent fund for the relief of sufferers by such accidents as those on the Thames and at Abercarne. Her Majesty expresses her appreciation of Mr. Lever's benevolent intentions, but returns his donation of 100*l.*, as she sees considerable difficulty in the administration of such a fund, should sufficient capital be subscribed to form it. Differences of opinion might probably arise as to the nature of the accidents which would entitle sufferers to participate, and a very considerable capital would be required to meet the requirements of even one extensive colliery explosion.—The Board of Trade inquiry into the wreck of the Princess Alice has been postponed until the close of the coroner's inquest, which is still going on. The Mansion House Fund on Wednesday amounted to 29,000*l.*—Last week a French schooner, the Perseverante, put into Belfast in distress, after a most disastrous voyage from Iceland. When off the entrance to the North Channel on Sunday, the weather was very severe. The bulwarks were smashed, and the foremast, jibboom, &c., carried away. While trying to secure the moveables on deck, five of the hands were washed overboard and drowned, the captain had several ribs broken, and six of the crew sustained fractures of legs and arms.—The colliery riots at Sheffield have been renewed. About 100 non-unionist men are now employed by the Nunnery Colliery Company, and are housed in the barracks. On Thursday they were attacked in the streets by the men on strike, and the police had much difficulty in protecting them.—The death is announced of Mr. George Bidder, the eminent railway engineer, who in early life was celebrated as the "Calculating Boy." He was seventy-eight years of age.—Another eminent engineer, Mr. John Penn, of Greenwich, has also died. He was seventy-three years old.

SPORTING

The Turf.——The Newmarket First October Meeting, so called, by a kind of Hibernicism, because it comes off in September, has been an unusually good one. Generally speaking, it is somewhat tame, but some interesting racing and very active operations on the coming Cesarewitch during the week have redeemed its average dulness. There are not a few Turfites who more or less decline the sport after Ascot, and do not recur to it 'till the first of the three Autumnal Meetings at head quarters; and many have an idea that the Autumn is the only fit time and Newmarket the only fit place for racing. However this may be, certain it is that a mild autumn day on a Newmarket Heath with its grand broad courses and first class cattle contending for the various stakes is almost as enjoyable a day as one can spend after its kind, and if racing is to be seen anywhere in perfection it is on the famous Heath. The old school of sportsmen, and not a few of the modern, were heartily glad to see the veteran General Peel score his Hopeful Stakes for two-year-olds with Peter, a very promising youngster, who ran second at Goodwood to Lord Falmouth's flying filly, Wheel of Fortune, on the Richmond Stakes. The Great Eastern Handicap, which does not attract so much attention now as it did a few years ago, saw a fair field of competitors, sixteen being taken in charge by Mr. McGeorge. The talent made a very hot favourite of Hackthorpe, who it may be remembered at Doncaster was strongly fancied in the Portland Plate, but being kicked by another horse at the post was practically out of the race. Since he won at Lewes it has been a general impression that he had a good race in him, and so it proved for he justified the 5 to 2 taken about him by winning pretty easily by two lengths from Warrior, who was next in demand. This was a good example of the way in which the public shows itself at times more clever than the handicapper. Lord Clive won the Grand Duke Michael Stakes from Clementine and four others, and his style of going seemed to confirm the impression held by many that had he been entered for the Derby and Leger he would have made it hot for the winners of those events. Lady Golightly, with slight odds on her, beat the French Balagnay at a difference of 3lb. in the Twenty-Ninth Biennial, and consequently advanced in the Cesarewitch market, in which she is now first favourite at about 5 to 1. Attalus showed fair form in the Thirtieth Triennial, though he had nothing very grand to beat; and Massena took the First Nursery in a field of ten. At the time of writing Harbinger and Master Kildare are next in demand after Lady Golightly for the Cesarewitch, and as the meeting at Newmarket has not hitherto supplied any fresh favourite worth notice, it seems not at all unlikely that the two above-mentioned will not only hold their place in the betting, but supply the winner between them.—The sale of the Middle Park Stud has caused something like a feeling of sadness, especially as some of the best brood mares will leave this country.

CRICKET.——The Australians have left us, leaving many pleasant memories behind, and taking many with them. They have played thirty-seven genuine matches, of which they have won eighteen, many of them in a most decisive manner. Twelve were drawn, several very much in their favour, while only seven were lost. They have defeated some of our best county teams, and crack elevens of amateurs and professionals. Their cricket in every department, batting, bowling, and fielding, has been excellent. Though easily defeated by the Cambridge Eleven, one of unusual strength, it may be questioned whether within a fortnight of their departure our visitors could not have turned the tables. Considering the way they have had to fly about by rail from one part of the kingdom to another in order to fulfil their various engagements, the physique of the Antipodeans must be something marvellous. Charles Bannerman shows the best batting average, while the bowling honours are divided between Messrs. Spofforth and Garrett. On their return home they will at once be confronted by an Eleven of Gentlemen, assisted by a professional or two (Ulyett and Emmett probably), whom Lord Harris, as Captain, takes out. The visit of the Australians will certainly have the effect of giving a still further impetus to cricket both at home and in the Australian and other colonies.—Nottinghamshire has beaten Leicestershire by an innings and 186 runs, and this concludes the season as far as county cricket is concerned. —The last grand match between crack elevens has also been played, the North meeting the South in friendly rivalry at the Oval on behalf of the Mansion House Fund for the benefit of the families of those who went down in the Princess Alice. The match was a very one-sided affair, the North having all its own way from the first, beating the South in one innings and 123 runs to spare. For the North some big scores were made—e.g., Ulyett (who has finished the season in fine form) 71, Shrewsbury 41, and Selby 76. But few of the South made double figures in either innings, but Mr. G. F. Grace performed the very uncommon feat of carrying his bat out in both, with 22 and 54 attached to his name.

AQUATICS.——Neither the results of the Thames International Regatta nor of the more recent contest for the Sportsman's Challenge Cup and Championship, seem to have satisfied the losing scullers. Hence Higgins has challenged his conqueror, Elliott, to another trial, and there is little doubt but that the match will come off in about three months' time. Boyd again offers to row any man in the world on the Tyne in three months' time; and there is a proposal afloat for a sweepstakes of 500*l.* each between Higgins, Elliott, and Boyd. Further, it is not unlikely, from the preliminary negotiations which have taken place, that there will be a match between Boyd and Elliott. Thus there is likely to be no lack of interest, such as it is, in professional sculling.

COURSING.——The annual campaign has opened with several good meetings, among which may be mentioned the Avebury, Tamworth, and Plumpton gatherings. The prospects of the 1878-9 season give promise that it will be one of the busiest and most successful ever recorded. The number of meetings advertised has increased, the stakes are more valuable, and reports from all quarters speak of the puppies which will make their first appearance in contested fields as above the average. The supply of hares in some districts seems hardly up to the mark, but there is not likely to be a lack of fur on the historic coursing grounds.

THEATRES

THE reopening of the FOLLY Theatre, with Miss Lydia Thompson and Mr. Lionel Brough in a new comedy and a new extravaganza, has unfortunately not been attended with the success which might be expected, both from the reputation of this bright and elegant little theatre and from the talents of the company under the direction of Mr. Henderson. Mr. Charles Wyndham's adaptation of La Veuve, which he has called The Idol, is a rather pointless version of a piece which it would, perhaps, be difficult even for a skilful dramatist to render acceptable to English audiences. Its story turns upon the efforts of certain persons to persuade a young and pretty widow lady that her late husband, whose loss she deplores with unceasing regret, was not the model of perfection which she has fondly imagined, but a profligate and a monster of conjugal infidelity. This amiable purpose is at last attained by the rather coarse device of presenting the lady with a jeweller's bill, comprising numerous articles which can only have been purchased by the deceased for the purpose of making presents to other ladies; and this disagreeable circumstance having been duly established, the lady is represented as convinced, and ready at last to marry the suitor whom, out of respect for the memory of her faithless spouse, she has hitherto rejected. The piece is not well acted, with the exception of a scene in which Mr. Paulton, in the character of the jeweller, enumerates and explains the items of his account to the widow lady. The humour of this scene, however, did not wholly suffice to conceal the disagreeable nature of the incident, and tokens of disapprobation accompanied the fall of the curtain. Unhappily the performance of the new extravaganza, which its authors, Mr. Reece and Mr. Farnie, have called Stars and Garters, did not suffice to put the audience, on Saturday evening, in good humour. Miss Lydia Thompson is always welcome, nor did the piece fail to amuse from any lack of exertion on her part. Mr. Lionel Brough, Mr. Paulton, Mr. Alfred Bishop, and Miss Annie Poole may also be credited with doing their best. But the music of the piece is poor, and the dialogue wanting in the cleverness which distinguishes other productions of the same writers. In spite of pretty scenery and brilliant costumes, the spectators were finally roused to an unusually energetic expression of disapprobation. Stars and Garters, however, may still be destined to be popular; for it is the custom of Mr. Henderson to take a hint from audiences; and it has happened more than once that a burlesque at the Folly, condemned on its first representation, has, by judicious improvements, achieved a remarkable success.

The OLYMPIC Theatre has reopened for the season with a revival of The Two Orphans. Mr. Neville—who has been succeeded at the ADELPHI, in the part of Pierre Lorance, in Proof, by Mr. Hermann Vezin—returns to his accustomed place as the deformed hero in the former piece; while Miss Marion Terry, replacing Miss Fowler, performs very prettily the part of Louise. The Two Orphans is an interesting play of the romantic class, and its revival promises to be attended by renewed vitality.

A new farcical comedy, in three acts, by Mr. Byron, is in preparation at the GAIETY, where Mr. Gilbert's burlesque of Robert the Devil—originally produced here on the first opening of this theatre nearly ten years ago—is about to be revived.—Marie, the Pearl of Savoy, is to be withdrawn at the COURT Theatre on Saturday next. Its place will be taken by a new comedy, entitled A False Step, by Mr. Arthur Matthison.—Mr. G. Manville Fenn has prepared a dramatic version of his popular story, "Land Ahead," which will be produced by Miss Virginia Blackwood, at ASTLEY'S Theatre, on Monday next.—Geneviève de Brabant has been revived at the ALHAMBRA, supported by Miss Emily Soldene and other popular performers.—DRURY LANE reopens this evening with The Winter's Tale, preceded by an operetta by Lecocq.—Messrs. Crauford announce their benefit at the BRITANNIA on Wednesday next, when Mrs. Lane will appear.

At the PARK Theatre on Saturday, Sept. 28th, will commence a series of Shakespearian performances, in which Messrs. T. Swinbourne, H. Forrester, and Miss Leighton will appear.

THE POLYTECHNIC.——Several novelties have been placed upon the programme of this deservedly popular place of entertainment. The most important is the series of lectures on Practical Science Teaching, which Dr. E. B. Aveling of University College is giving with the object of assisting students who are preparing to compete for University degrees. Dr. Aveling ridicules the old method of instruction, and demonstrates by means of a few common flowers how much may be gained by cultivating the powers of observation without the use of technicalities. Mr. J. L. King gives an interesting lecture on China, illustrated with dissolving views; and a new semi-dramatic version of the story of Cinderella, under the title of Zitella, is capitally rendered by Mr. Seymour Smith. The current programme also includes lectures on "The Microphone and the Telephone," "Cyprus," "The Paris Exhibition," "The Kaffir War," "The Wreck of the Eurydice," "Guns and Projectiles," "Cleopatra's Needle," "Memory," and a "Scientific Variety Entertainment." It is announced that the new arrangement in the Science Department will not in any way affect the Polytechnic College, where classes are carried on as usual.

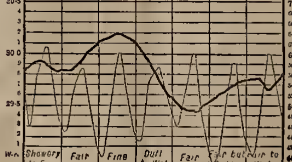
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

SEPTEMBER 19TH TO SEPTEMBER 25TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The weather during the past week has been very changeable. The first two or three days were tolerably fine, although slight showers fell both on Thursday, the 19th, and Friday, the 20th, and the barometer changed little or rose decidedly; but on Saturday evening, the 21st instant, the mercury began to fall rather quickly, and this movement in the barometer was soon followed by an important change in the weather. Sunday, the 22nd instant, opened very dull, and a slight shower fell in the morning, while in the evening rain fell more decidedly. The barometer continued to fall until Monday afternoon, the 23rd instant, when it once more rose, and the weather again improved. Tuesday, the 24th inst., was fair though foggy in the early morning and evening; but on Wednesday, the 25th instant, the barometer again fell, and the weather became wet. Temperature has been rather low during the whole week, but no frosts are yet reported. The barometer was highest (30·19 inches) on Saturday, the 21st instant; lowest (29·45 inches) on Monday, the 23rd instant; range, 0·74 inches. Temperature was highest (61°) on Thursday, the 19th instant; lowest (39°) on Tuesday, the 24th instant; range, 22°. Rain fell on five days; total, 0·27 inches; greatest fall on any one day, 0·10 inches, on Sunday, the 22nd instant.

THE LARGE CLOCK FOR THE NEW LAW COURTS will shortly be placed in the main tower facing the Strand. It will be larger than any metropolitan clock, except Big Ben, and will have two dials of gun metal, each nine feet in diameter, with gilt figures and hands, and adorned by ornamental framework terminating with gables. The distance from the ground to the roof of the case will be 114 feet, and the dials will therefore be visible at a great distance.

Scraps

M. VICTOR HUGO will bring out this winter two new volumes of poems, entitled Toute la Lyre.

A WOVEN BOOK has been manufactured at Lyons, the whole of the letterpress being executed in silken thread. Portraits, verses, and brief addresses have often been reproduced by the loom, but an entire volume from the weaver's hand is a novelty.

TWO LARGE OCTOPI, measuring over 5 ft. apiece, have been caught in Mount's Bay. One of the creatures had tentacles as thick as a child's arm, while the other, when hooked, clasped the boat so vigorously with its feelers that the fishermen had considerable difficulty in getting it on board.

PITCHERINE, a new stimulant, has been discovered by the Australian aborigines. Smoked and chewed, or applied as a plaster behind the ears, pitcherine produces pleasant exhilaration, while it keeps up the strength during exertion, and is also declared to supply Dutch courage in battle.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.——The Winter Session of the Evening Classes of the Institute in connection with this institution at 165, Aldersgate Street, will be reopened on Thursday next, Oct. 3, when J. D. Allcroft, Esq., M.P., will distribute the prizes to the successful students during the last session.

A LARGE PORTION OF THE ANCIENT CITY OF ITHACA has just been unearthed by Dr. Schliemann, who has discovered 190 enormous houses on the south-eastern shores of the island at a considerable distance beneath the surface. The result of the excavations, however, will in no way rival the finds at Troy and Mycenæ, for Dr. Schliemann writes that all the treasures of the city have been washed into the sea by the winter rains.

THE LATE JUGGERNAUT FESTIVAL at Puri proved a decided failure. The devotees refused their usual large contributions, and there was even great difficulty in obtaining wood to construct the great car on which the idol takes his annual airing. The Rajah of Puri, Juggernaut's hereditary protector, is in the Andamans, undergoing a life sentence for the murder of a Brahmin, and it has been discovered that the Rajah had so mismanaged the affairs of the Temple as to leave the revenues in a pitiable condition.

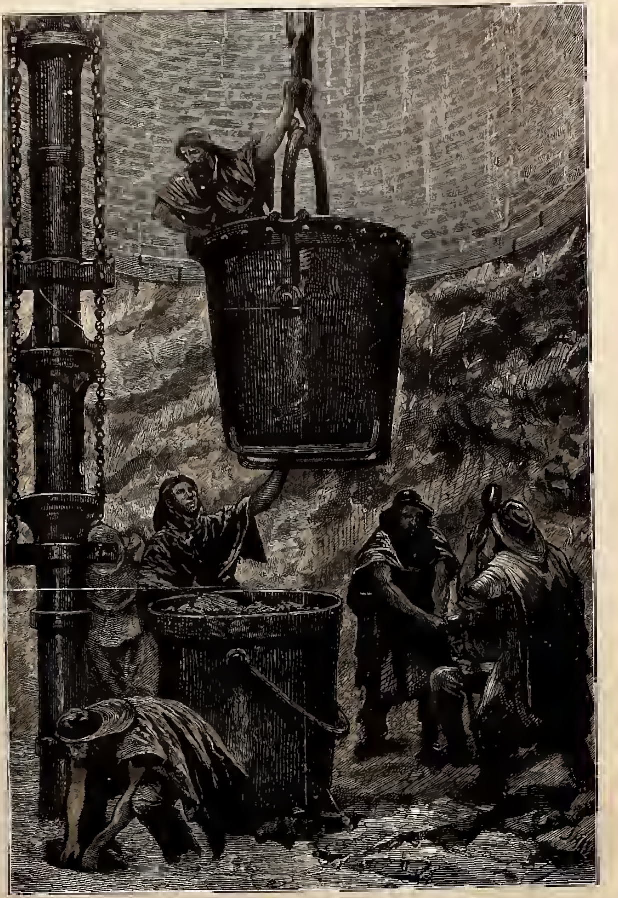
THE MIGRATORY BIRDS are leaving England this year much sooner than usual, according to the Daily News. The soft, dead-ripe fruit and the insects on which these birds fatten before starting south have been destroyed so early in the season by the late gales and cold nights that the departure of many birds has been materially hastened. Indeed, insect life altogether has been specially scarce during the past summer. The northern birds which winter in England are fast arriving, while kingfishers are plentiful near London, and one was lately seen on the Serpentine.

THEATRE-GOING IN PARIS has certainly not diminished under the Republic. In the palmy days of the Empire the receipts of the theatres during the year 1868 were only 640,000*l.*, in 1874 they had risen to 920,000*l.*, and this year the incomings are estimated to reach some 1,200,000*l.* Paris now contains forty-eight principal theatres, of which the Châtelet, the Grand Opera, and the Ambigu-Comique are the largest houses, while the Théâtre Français annually presents the most varied programme. Twenty-six of these theatres employ 5,069 persons, the Opera staff alone amounting to 596. Music-loving Parisians, also, have 56 cafés-concerts, and 210 musical societies, to say nothing of other varied styles of entertainments, such as circuses, skating-rinks, &c.

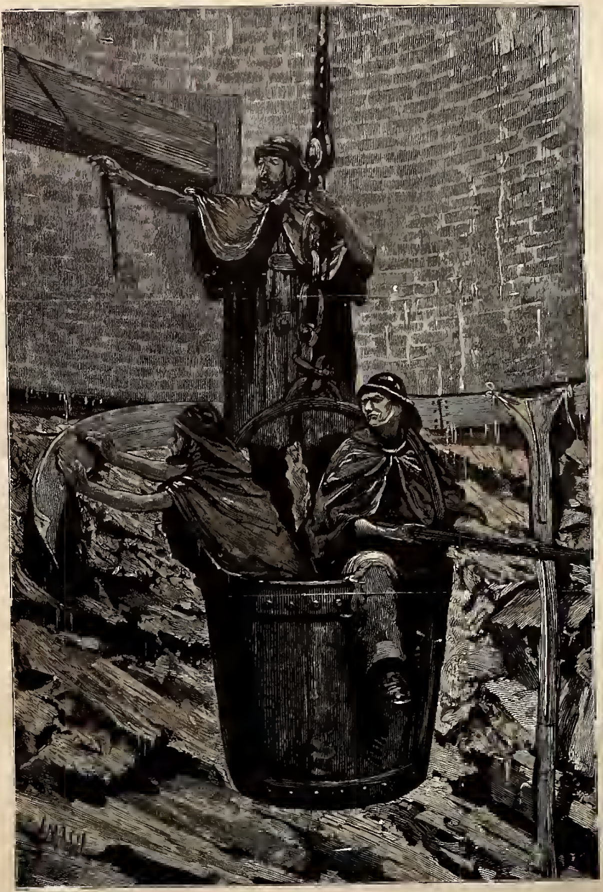
LONDON MORTALITY decreased again last week, and the deaths numbered 1,250 against 1,259 in the preceding seven days, being a decline of 9, at the rate of 18·2 per 1,000—the lowest rate registered since the corresponding week of last year—and 83 below the average. There were 80 deaths from diarrhœa (a decline of 10, and 23 below the average), 43 from whooping-cough (a rise of 6, and 14 above the average), 30 from fever (a fall of 2), 24 from scarlet fever (a decrease of 3, and 54 below the usual return), 10 from diphtheria (a decline of 3), 4 from small-pox (a fall of 3), and 2 from measles. Deaths of violence reached 58, of which 16 were due to the loss of the Princess Alice—the remainder of the deaths caused by the Thames collision, by-the-bye, being included in the returns of Essex and Kent. There were 2,491 births registered, against 2,373 in the previous week, exceeding the average by 127. The mean temperature was 54·4 deg.—1·9 deg. below the average; and there were 34·6 hours of registered sunshine out of the 86·9 hours during which the sun was above the horizon.

THE MODESTY OF BRITISH NEWSPAPERS appears to have made a considerable impression across the Atlantic, and the Transatlantic Press—seemingly somewhat ashamed of adorning their notable articles with sensational headings and interlinings—praise highly the simple manner in which English journals insert important communications. Letters from the most distinguished men in Great Britain, says the San Francisco News Letter, are printed without a word of bluster. "Peers and M.P.'s say their say without comment, while in this country enormous headings would tell the world that a great man had spoken, and an editorial would dilate upon the superiority of the sheet honoured by such correspondence. If any special journal be favourably alluded to in Parliament, that journal lays no stress on the matter next morning, and its rivals do not suppress the speech. Here we should find the particular speech reported only in the paper mentioned, while the speaker would be lucky if he escaped the enmity of the other journals. Let us shake the brass from our cheeks, and take a lesson from our English cousins."

SUNDAY ART EXHIBITIONS.——We are requested by Lord Rosebery, the President of the Sunday Society, to insert the following statement:—"During the recent opening on Sunday of the Grosvenor Gallery, nearly 6,000 persons availed themselves of the privilege of visiting the Exhibition. This success has encouraged the Committee to arrange for the exhibition of a series of water-colour drawings of Swiss life and scenery, sketched in Switzerland by Mr. William L. Thomas. The exhibition will be opened on the first three Sundays in October, from 2 to 5 P.M., at 33, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars, E.C. (the late offices of the London School Board), and the public will have free access to it by means of tickets, which will only be issued to those applying by letter, and sending stamped and addressed envelopes to the Hon. Secretary, 19, Charing Cross, S.W. In order that the utmost possible advantage may be taken of this Fine-Art Exhibition, we ask you to publish this letter. The Committee of the Sunday Society intend to continue these Sunday Art Exhibitions from time to time until the Society's object is accomplished, and the public museums, art galleries, libraries, and gardens are all opened on the people's weekly leisure day. The Society will be glad to receive pecuniary and other assistance to enable the Committee to effectively carry out these exhibitions."

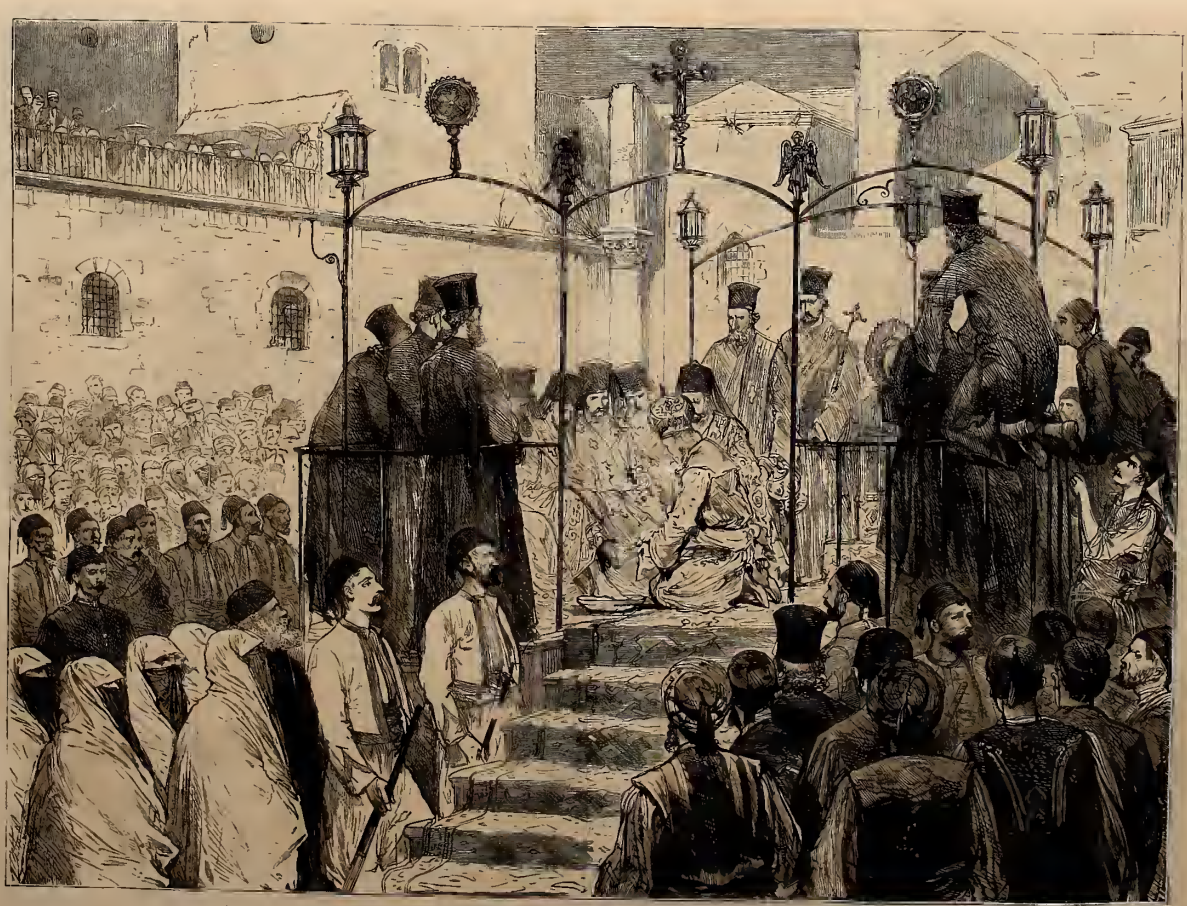


SINKING A SHAFT



REPAIRING A "GARLAND" IN THE SHAFT

WORK AT A COAL MINE, III.



AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND, VII.: THE CEREMONY OF "WASHING OF FEET" AT THE DOOR OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE, JERUSALEM

"THE LIFE OF SIR GARNET WOLSELEY," by Lieutenant Low, I.N. (2 vols.: Bentley and Son).—Whatever question may be raised as to the good taste or propriety of this publication there can be no doubt that it is in many respects interesting. The distinguished officer whose biography has been thus written out of due time has seen war under the British flag in so many parts of the world that the mere backward glance over the fields on which he has served is a pleasurable excitement to the peaceful reader. The records of individual prowess as the boy ensign of raw recruits in the attack on Donabew, as Assistant-Engineer in the trenches before Sebastopol, in the storming of Lucknow and the defence under Outram of the Alumbagh, and in the brief but brilliant Chinese campaign of Sir Hope Grant, are all so many picturesque chapters out of a military history which is everywhere picturesque. Lieutenant Low is thus at his best where his hero comes only to the front as one brave man where there were many brave, an officer of special promise among the many promising officers who served under Outram, Campbell, or Hope Grant. He is at his worst (with one conspicuous exception) where he gives way to eulogy which even in the case of a living Wellington or Marlborough would be somewhat in disaccord with the modest simplicity of military memoir, and when applied to one officer who, for all his indisputable merits, has yet to prove his right to be classed with names like these, jars positively on the reader's nerves. The one exception is the account of the Red River Expedition—a most ably conducted though bloodless enterprise on which, partly, we suspect, because it was so bloodless, partly by reason of the greater attractions of the contemporaneous Franco-German War, far less attention than it really deserved was bestowed either at the time or subsequently. The chapter devoted to this rarely-mentioned episode in the military history of the Canadian Dominion may be heartily commended as at once interesting and new. The biography as a whole, though containing much, as we have said, to amuse the multitude and not a few particulars not generally known—e.g., the story of Wolseley's plucky and successful battle with the War Office officials when they attempted to cancel his promotion to a Captaincy on the plea that he was too young—is hardly in general design and plan a work we should desire to see often imitated.

Time flies so fast that memories of Miss Cushman and her famous personations—her Romeo, Meg Merrilies, Lady Macbeth,—are fading rapidly from the minds of modern playgoers. The more welcome should be the little volume "Charlotte Cushman: Her Letters and Memoirs of Her Life, edited by Her Friend, Emma Stebbins" (Houghton, Osborne, and Co., Boston), to all on either side of the Atlantic who can appreciate a graceful portrait of one not greater as an actress than amiable and admirable in private life. It is a memoir that should interest the members of the profession to whom it is dedicated hardly less than the plain admirers of a gentle life; for in Miss Cushman we have the actress who can advise others as well as act herself, and who, as an almost typical representative of the "natural and spontaneous," rather than the "conventional" school, is at the least an interesting study, even when she is guilty of preferring a Ristori to a Rachel, or characteristically enjoys a Porte St. Martin drama better than the perfect art (with a smack of mannerism, however, au fond) of the Comedie Française. Still though a very complete account of her theatrical career from her engagement as "general utility" actress at the Park Theatre, New York, to the (professionally) profitable association with Macready on his "starring" visit to the United States; from the time when she first arrives in London resolved to trust to herself alone, though reduced to her last sovereign when Maddox, of the Princess's, found her in her London lodgings, to those last readings—the most artistic, perhaps, of all her performances—which beguiled the closing years of an incurable disorder, it is mainly for the story of her domestic life that the volume will be valued; for the correspondence with clever people, with Miss Jewsbury, Mr. Carlyle, Henry Chorley, &c., for the delightful journals of old times in Rome, still in those days a genuine old-world city, for the pretty pictures of her simple household, her quiet "receptions," her untiring energy to the very end. Memoirs pleasanter to read we have not encountered for some little time.

Most amusing as well as most instructive, an excellent specimen in a word of the light, airy, but ever methodical French treatise on some branch of History or Science agreeably popularised, is the "Histoire du Luxe" of M. Baudrillart, Member of the Institute (Paris: Hachette et Cie., Tome I.). Such a history in French hands we need hardly say can begin with nothing less than a philosophic examination of "la théorie du Luxe"—of the instinctive love of luxury and display; the opposing teachings of the ascetic and the Epicurean, whether manifested in the old philosophies or in the religious systems of a later time; the greater or less increase of luxury according as the government is an absolute or a limited monarchy, an aristocratic or democratic republic. This duty discharged, we pass (after a hasty glance at crude developments of luxury among savage tribes) to a really interesting historic survey of the growth and progress of "le luxe" among the nations of the ancient world, as traceable in the temples, colonnades, and mural paintings of the Egyptian, in the fragmentary chronicles and scattered relics of Persian and Assyrian, in the stories handed down to after ages of the luxurious but far from enervated Republicans of Carthage and of Tyre, among the Hebrews as depicted in their own prophetic writings, or in artistic Greece from the mid-day glories of Athenian taste to the degraded art and Asiatic pomp of the successors of Alexander. M. Baudrillart has clearly studied his subject with much care, and can draw his illustrations with as much readiness from the "Book of the Dead" or the last hieroglyphic unearthed by Mariette Bey, or from the more familiar pages of Strabo or Herodotus. His work thus far may well be commended to the average student as thoroughly popular without being superficial.

Part VI. of the Messrs. Audsley-Bowes' magnificent "Keramic Art in Japan" (Liverpool, published by the Authors; London, H. Sotheran and Co.), if boasting no such glorious specimens of Hizen or Kioto ware as adorned some of the preceding numbers, is nothing inferior in general interest or in the delicacy of its autotype and chromo-lithographic plates. The wonderfully comic plate of the seven popular divinities of Japan—the Deities of Long Life, Contentment, Daily Food, &c.—with the grotesque figures that hardly need any letterpress to explain their own story, and that of the simple people who address to them their outspoken prayers, is almost worth all the money in itself.

"From Europe to Paraguay and Matto Grosso," by Mrs. M. G. Mulhall (E. Stanford), is the brief, plain story of a tour sufficiently uncommon even in these days of ubiquitous travel to merit somewhat larger space than Mrs. Mulhall has awarded to it. It was a tour, we gather, part by water, part by land, but for the greater time up the mighty stream on whose banks the Jesuits reared long ago their famous "Missions," and where Lopez in our own days held at bay for some three years the combined forces of the Plate and of Brazil—a voyage into a country now waste and desolate, amidst Indian tribes of every degree of civilisation, from the half-Europeanised Guarani to the hardly human Botocudo. Mrs. Mullhall might have made more out of her materials, but curt as it is, her journal gives a capital idea of a region little known and rarely visited.

With upwards of seventy millions—to a great extent unclaimed money—locked up in the funds of the Court of Chancery, not to speak of the large sums in the shape of "Unclaimed Dividends of the Bank of England and Army and Navy Prize Money" still awaiting their proper owners, a new edition of "Chambers' Index to Next of Kin," by Edw. Preston (Allen, Reeve, and Turner: Next of Kin Office, 1, Great College Street, S.W.), seems certainly to supply a want. We may add that 10,000 new names have been put upon the list since 1871, while on the other hand a number of notices, apparently only of value to solicitors and genealogists, have been expunged—a point of some importance when the fee for a copy of any notice is half-a-guinea.

A fourth edition, revised and enlarged, of the now historic "Life of E. A. Poe" (Widdleton: New York; Chatto and Windus: London), in which Mr. W. F. Gill so triumphantly vindicated the poet's memory from the grosser aspersions heaped upon it under the guise of friendship by Dr. Griswold, will be heartily welcomed by the countless admirers of perhaps the most original genius of the century. The publication in the appendix of the "Critique on Griswold's 'Poets and Poetry of America,'" which is believed to have been the teterrima causa of the Doctor's secret animosity against Poe, will decidedly amuse the reader, while it will go far to explain Dr. Griswold's otherwise inexplicable malice.

TOBACCO AS A REMEDY FOR SICK CHICKENS has been found highly successful according to an American journal, the Pacific Rural Press. Doses should be given of large quids of tobacco about the size of the first joint of a man's thumb.

A CURIOUS ANCIENT MEXICAN LIBRARY has been found in the ruins of a vast palace at Xayi, near Chiapas, in Southern Mexico. The writings are inscribed on terra-cotta tablets, half-an-inch thick, and are supposed to be sacred records, but the language in which they are written is not accurately known.

JURIES UNABLE TO AGREE ON A VERDICT may like to hear of the plan adopted by some Illinois jurors. As they could not make up their minds whether the prisoner deserved hanging or no they decided by pulling straws, and found the man guilty. The judge, however, fined the jurors, and gave the prisoner a new trial.

PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT is being tried in Japan, and the Mikado has opened an Assembly of Provincial Officials at Yokohama, which is intended to prepare the way for popular representation on a larger scale. Small local Parliaments to be elected by a popular vote are shortly to be established, and the formation of a national Legislature is projected, although the plan will not be carried out for some time yet.

AN ENTERPRISING NEW YORK LAUNDRY advertises its business by means of numerous negroes who parade up and down the principal streets arrayed in enormous white linen collars, glossy and spotlessly starched, and standing up some distance above their ears. The ebony skin and hair form an admirable contrast to the white collars (in fact a perfect "symphony" in black and white), and the motto is, "Go to X——'s laundry."

CELESTIALS IN SOUTH AMERICA fare much better than their brethren on the Californian Coast. In Peru the Chinese have all the rights and privileges of native citizenship, and are considered quite a "catch" by the Peruvian belles, while the Government warmly encourages their immigration. Accordingly, San Francisco journals are asking why the Chinese problem in their State cannot be solved by the Celestials moving down the Pacific Coast to a country where they are welcome.

A NATURAL THEATRE exists in the Blue Mountains, not far from Cañon City in Oregon, U.S. Passing through some rifts of rock, similar to a grand staircase, a regular stage is reached, raised some 40 feet from the floor, and having an overhanging arch with "flats" and "flies," and spaces for dressing-rooms on each side, while the back is regularly shaped for the reception of scenery. In front rise ledges suggestive of the different tiers of seats in the auditorium. There is not a solitary sign of vegetation about the "Temple," as it is called, all is bleak, bare, and towering.

A DRAMATIC SUICIDE recently took place at Capron, Illinois, where a certain lecturer, George W. Burleigh, announced to his fellow citizens that, in order to gratify an often expressed curiosity on the part of his townsmen to witness some such tragedy as the hanging of Sherry and Connolly, in Chicago, he would on the evening of the 23rd ult. deliver a lecture in Thornton Hall, and at its conclusion gratify his hearers by shooting himself through the forehead. The price of admission would be one dollar, and the amount realised should be devoted towards his funeral expenses, and the remainder invested in the works of Huxley, Tyndall, and Darwin for the town library. His idea in ending his life was to secure eternal peace by annihilation. At the appointed time the hall was crowded, and after the delivery of an infidel lecture of wonderful power, in a manner and tone which marked him as an adept, he suddenly drew a Derringer, placed it to his forehead, and, despite attempts to prevent him, fired, and fell into the arms of two friends who were on the wings of the stage for the purpose of hindering the execution of the design.

A COCOANUT FESTIVAL is celebrated annually in Bombay, when pious Hindoos offer the nuts to the sea to gain its favour towards those who trust themselves to its mercy, and after this festival the stormy part of the season is considered to be at an end. This year the festival was not so well observed as usual, and it is noted by The Times of India that young Hindoos are not nearly so devout as their predecessors. Some groups of Brahmins, however, were very ceremonious. One of the number stood up to his knees in water, holding an open round basket with bunches of flowers, and a dish of kunkoo. His fellow-worshippers twice dipped their fingers into the water, anointed their forehead and tongue, received a bunch of flowers, which they threw into the sea, and presented their cocoanuts to the Brahmin, who smeared them with kunkoo, and flung one into the water, the others being preserved as his perquisite. He then marked his companions' foreheads with kunkoo, and they in their turn placed fragments of flowers on his head. Most of those who brought cocoanuts paid a select few volunteers to throw them into the water, as the shore was so swampy that the devotees had to wade up to their waist in mud to get near the stream.

"PATTERNS," or feasts in honour of a patron saint, used to be much more frequent in Ireland than they are at present. Year by year, especially in the more civilised provinces of Leinster, they are dying out. The Roman Catholic clergy do not encourage them, the gentry and upper farming classes look upon them with something like contempt, and so, by degrees, they have become fewer and fewer. But in the remote West this is not the case; "Patterns" have gained too strong a hold on the reverential feelings of the imaginative Munster peasantry to be easily given up; and more than a dozen of these characteristic gatherings, with their strange mixture of intense devotion and merry-making, are held in different parts of Kerry during the year. The "Pattern" which takes place at Minard on the 29th of August has many surroundings which give it an additional attraction. There is blue sea and bluer mountains on every side, there is the picturesque ruined castle of the Husseys, with its moat and wall, which looks over the bay; and across a boggy field is the far-famed Well of St. John the Baptist. From early dawn side-cars, low-backed cars, and pilgrims on foot crowd down towards the valley where the Pattern is held. "It's a fine Pattern, an elegant Pattern. God bless it!" are the salutations which are exchanged as each new comer arrives. A street of booths has been made, booths of the roughest kind, consisting of coarse calico drawn over poles, and before each booth is a smoking fire of turf-sods; on these fires are placed a large covered iron pot and a kettle. These mysterious cauldrons contain hot mutton pies, swimming in a sea of greasy broth. For the modest sum of twopence a pie and a ladle full of broth are given, and the happy purchaser retires with his saucer to the booth, squats down on the grass, and enjoys his meal in comfort. Mutton pies are the specialty of Minard Pattern, just as apples and onions are of the Dingle festival; there, the correct thing is to walk about with an apple in one hand and an onion in the other, while Minard is always associated with mutton pies. But before creature comforts are attended to the "duty to the well" must be paid. Nine rounds are the orthodox number, and so great are the virtues to be derived that people have been known to come from America expressly for the purpose of "paying a round" at Minard. In the teeth of a thick Scotch mist, for which the Kerry mountains are justly celebrated, the "patterners" make their way with some difficulty across a high-banked stream, and through some boggy grass, to the desired spot. The well itself is not much to look at; a deep pool about four feet wide, with some large stones round it, and on one of these stones is a rudely sculptured cross. This is all that appears to the uninitiated, who gaze with amazement at the rapidly increasing batches of country people, who pour in full of haste and importance. The women are draped in red or grey shawls, worn in the style of the Spanish mantilla; some have yellow handkerchiefs tied round their faces, for such is their love for bright colours that they will often give two pounds for a gay dress or shawl, though at the same time they prefer keeping their feet bare. The men are even more numerous than the women, and devotion could not be more fervently expressed than in their absorbed faces, down-bent eyes, and uncovered heads. Round and round they go. Here is a father carrying his sick child in his arms, and muttering a scarcely-audible Paternoster; there is a pale-faced girl with sore eyes, whose muddy feet sink in the wet ground; there is a mother with a baby at her back, fingering her rosary as she goes; there is an old wizened creature of fourscore, hobbling painfully on the greasy track by the help of her stick, and there are ragged boys who have ceased to covet apples, and are going their rounds as devoutly as their elders. Not a smile is to be seen—the occasion is far too solemn—secret wishes are winging themselves into passionate prayers, and faith is implicit and unquestioning. Mugs and tin porringers full of the blessed water are eagerly drunk; three sips in honour of the the Trinity is the proper number, and for this the sum of one halfpenny is expected. Faces and hands are washed at the well, the cross at the top is frequently kissed, and "tokens" of all kinds are left in a heap before it. The fringes of a shawl, pins, buttons, or rags serve as offerings. For the sum of one penny a withered old beldame sitting on the bank will volubly pour forth a long prayer in Irish for the benefit of the giver, who is advised by the lookers-on to be liberal, if he regards "the good of his sowl," as the old lady is celebrated for being a "fine prayer." Sixpence, therefore, is money well laid out. Rounds are going all day, and continue till night, according as fresh arrivals come in. After the devotional part of the Pattern comes the festive part. The fiddler arrives in the afternoon, and posts himself against a wall. A circle is soon formed around him, and in spite of mizzling rain and chilling clouds, a "four-hand reel" begins. As only four performers—two men and two women—take part in it, the spectators stand round to criticise and admire. The men are the real dancers, they keep their hats on and go at it with a will; hardly a smile escapes them, the business is evidently a serious one, and their steps demand all their attention. Sometimes the dancing is performed on a table, and the proceedings end in a "big fight," but as whisky, the food for fighting, is prohibited at Minard, the fighting is now left out.

The girls look coy and demure as they go through their parts. One of the Minard dancers had magnificent golden, or, as the Munster bards call it, "amber hair," rippled in natural waves and most carefully braided. This peculiarly beautiful hair is frequently found among the Kerry girls, and is much admired. In one of the Munster ballads, no less than seventeen Irish epithets are used to describe a certain fair one's ringlet hair; it is "curve-arching, meandering, spreading, curl-quivering, fascinating, string-like, pliant, wreathing, restless, swerving, free-extending, inclining, abundant, thick-twining, mildly-bright, branchy, far-sweeping." The Minard dancer of the amber locks had evidently studied her toilette, and her purple dress and scarlet shawl were decidedly effective. If the Spanish ladies have a language of fans, the Kerry girls have a language in the way they wear their shawls. If the shawl is allowed to fall back carelessly, the girl intends to "get married" next Shrove-tide, while if the shawl is pulled round her face she intends to remain single another year. Shrove-tide is the time for Kerry marriages, and they rarely take place at any other part of the year. These marriages are arranged somewhat on the French system, and are often pure matters of business. For instance, a father has a daughter to marry, and some distance off is a farmer with a marriageable son. Accordingly the question is proposed, "I will give my daughter so and so—what will you give your son?" After a good deal of haggling about pigs and heifers, the affair is concluded, and often the people most interested have barely seen one another beforehand. A difference of ten shillings has been known to break off a match, and instead of being romantically superior to pounds, shillings, and pence, the Kerry folks are as keen after the main chance as any Belgravian matron. "Arrah! what's beauty to a one-pound note!" was naively remarked by a suitor, who was weighing the merits of two rival damsels. These marriages generally turn out happily, and the housewives have a busy time of it. They not only churn the butter, which is the main means of support, but they spin wool for their husbands' coats and waistcoats, and coarse sheets for their bedding. Every farm-house has its spinning-wheel and carder. There used to be more than 300 weavers between Dingle and Ventry, but a great many have emigrated, and there are now only five or six. It seems a pity that people naturally inclined to industry should have no manufactories to employ their skill to the best advantage, but factories are unknown in the Wild West, and no one is enterprising enough to set them up. SCIENTIFIC NOTES

The recent calamity on the Thames, whereby more than six hundred persons lost their lives, has given birth to an immense number of suggestions for the better management of vessels under steam. These suggestions are of a very varied nature. One advises the adoption of a life-belt as an article of daily attire. Another would have all the cushions of a boat stuffed with buoyant material. A third suggests a loose deck which will act as a raft even though the ship sink. Another advocates the compulsory use of the electric light on all boats. All these several suggestions are no doubt very good in their way, but would it not be better, instead of dealing with the effects of a collision, to pay more attention to its cause, with a view to prevention rather than cure?

At a time when the matter is under investigation we cannot very well speculate on the actual cause of the late collision, but we may safely affirm that if the captain of one of the boats had been by some means made aware of the course which the other intended to steer, the catastrophe would have been altogether avoided. The present arrangement of the lights on steam vessels imparts no such knowledge. A red light on the port, or left-hand side of the boat, a green light on the other side, and a white light at the mast-head, are considered sufficient to indicate the position and course of the approaching steam-ship, but they give no indication of how the helmsman intends to act should an emergency arise. We venture to put forward a plan which would quite obviate this difficulty, and which would interfere very little with existing arrangements. Let the lights remain as they are, but let the masthead lantern be so constructed and connected with the steering gear, that with every change of course the colour of the light change too.

Fig. 1. is a diagram in elevation and section to show how simple in construction such a compound lantern would be. It would differ from ordinary lanterns by being furnished with a cylindrical metal frame divided by upright bars into three spaces. One of these spaces would remain empty, and the other two would be filled up with bent glass panes, one red and the other green. This frame would be placed within the lantern, and would surround the lamp itself, so that it would not interfere in any way with the lens outside. It should be so arranged that when the course steered is straight ahead, the open division would be in front of the lantern, and a white light would then shine. But with every decided change the frame would revolve in the lamp, and the light would become red or green, according to whether the wheel was turned for the port or starboard course. The mechanism to connect the lantern with the wheel would obviously be simple in the extreme, indeed any intelligent bell-hanger would soon show how it could be done. An arrangement such as this would virtually enable the captain of a vessel to say to an approaching craft, "I have just altered my rudder to such and such a course, please act accordingly." Apropos of the importance of being able to communicate such a change of course, we quote the following from the report last week in a contemporary of a recent collision which led to the loss of a valuable vessel: "The helm was put hard to port, the other vessel, however, starboarded, and the result was a serious collision." The same misunderstanding of intentions has led to hundreds of such collisions—indeed, the words quoted seem to have quite a familiar look, they have been used so often. We put forward our crude suggestion for what it may be worth, and in the hope that it may at least pave the way for others which may be better.

A patent has been applied for by Captain Sale, R.E., for an ingenious electrical instrument for the transmission and reception of voice sounds. It consists of a base-board on which is a wooden block containing a vibrating disc, and a suitable orifice through which the sounds are spoken. In the centre of the disc A is a small platinum-covered stud B. A screw S, which works in a rigid support, terminates in a platinum point. This point all but touches the stud B, and the distance between them can be regulated by turning the screw to the smallest fraction of an inch. A drop of water or other liquid forms a connecting link between them. The disc A is connected with one of the terminals, C, while the screw S is in communication with the other. These terminals form the points of attachment for the battery and line wires. When the disc is made to vibrate by the speaker's voice, the distance between the stud and the screw is alternately lengthened and shortened, and with this action the electrical resistance offered by the drop of liquid undergoes constant variation. The sounds are reproduced by a coiled magnet, and another diaphragm or disc. This contrivance is worthy of notice as combining in a manner the principles of the Telephone and the Microphone. It does not present any very novel features, but, as it points in the direction from which the telegraph of the future will probably be derived, it is not without interest.

Military ballooning, which has during late years taken such an important place in the Army Corps of neighbouring countries, has at last met with some recognition at home, for experiments have lately been carried on at Woolwich with a view to testing the actual value of the system. Captive balloons are no doubt, under certain circumstances, useful for purposes of observation; but the difficulties in the way of gas-making in the field form a great obstacle to their employment. A plan has lately been devised for obtaining automatically bird's-eye views of an enemy's camp. This is done by means of a small balloon which is just large enough to raise the weight of the photographic camera which forms its car. The cap or cover of the lens is controlled by an electro magnet, the connecting wires of which pass to the ground. When the balloon is raised to a certain height, the depression of a key uncovers the lens for the fraction of a second, and an instantaneous view of the position is secured. The photographic process employed is that in which a sensitive tissue is used in lieu of glass plates.

The last scientific novelty hails from Melbourne. It may be that our Australian friends are rather jealous of the wonders which are recorded from this side of the world. However they seem determined not to be outdone, and the "Telegastograph" is the result of their efforts. We are not in a position to give a detailed account of the instrument, but we can offer some information as to experiments carried on with it, a full notice of which appears in the Melbourne Age. It seems to have been connected by wires with five widely separated points of observation. At these stations were placed individuals who had purposely allowed themselves to become hungry, and who held the circuit wires in their mouths. A bottle of sherry and bitters poured into the machine produced signs of incipient intoxication in most of these observers, but more particularly in two who happened to be total abstainers. Oysters were the next things offered by telegraph to these hungry beings. They all agreed that they were so fresh—the oysters we mean—that the smell of the sea was quite perceptible. Several kinds of soup and a glass of Chablis closed this wonderful repast. We can only add our regret that the exact size of the grains of salt necessary for the flavour of telegastographic viands was not included in the account from which we quote. T. C. H.

THE GLOVE

This eve my lady dropped a perfumed glove—
Ah! what a dainty perfect glove it was!—
Straightway my heart desirèd it, because
It late had sheathed the hand of my true love.
And, since exchange no robbery can prove,
Did not my lady in her chamber find
But that was naught to my rare treasure trove.
O lady, grant me leave the glove to keep—
The casket that contained a gem so rare;
And should the happy day e'er dawn for me
That I, awaking from love-laden sleep,
May say, "The gem itself to-day I wear,"
My heart for it a fair exchange may be.

HERE IS A HINT FOR PARIS TOURISTS! When you want to hail a public conveyance in some of the South American cities, you lasso the driver in order to secure his attention—at least, so says an American contemporary.

WALKING ON WATER has been successfully accomplished by a French Canadian, who, by the aid of a pair of tin shoes, 3 feet long by 1 foot wide, in which air was confined, walked or rather skated a quarter of a mile in six minutes.

AN UNAPPETIZING MEAL was recently made for a wager by a young Frenchman. He undertook to eat a sparrow with its feathers, two snails, and two live frogs for the modest sum of 4*s.*, and although he won his bet he nearly lost his life in the attempt.

THE DEVELOPMENT THEORY appears to have been current in Japan long before Dr. Darwin wrote his "Origin of Species," as an ancient temple has been discovered in the land of the Mikado, whereon are sculptured a progressive series of figures, beginning with a monkey, and ending with a man.

ARTILLERY EXPERIMENTS at Biard, in Poitou, have produced a very unpleasant effect in the neighbourhood. A large number of the projectiles burst round about the Forest of St. Hilaire, and the wolves in the forest have been so alarmed, that they have left their haunts and spread over the surrounding country, where they have caused great damage and alarm.

FOUR VALUABLE BELGIAN CARRIER PIGEONS have been picked up near the Island of Majorca by an American vessel, according to a correspondent of the Live Stock Journal, and are now at Philadelphia, waiting to be claimed by their owners. The birds' wings are covered with stamps, medals, and numbers, and bear the mark of the Brussels Society. If claimed the birds will be sent over at once to Brussels.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT, which after some score of years is still incomplete, and which constitutes a sad eyesore to all inhabitants of the "City of magnificent distances," and a source of wonderment to all visitors, is at last to be finished, a motion to that effect having been adopted by Congress. If the original plan be followed out, the obelisk will be surmounted by a statue of General Washington eighty-five feet high.

WILD ELEPHANTS IN BRITISH BURMAH are likely to become totally extinct if some measures are not speedily taken for their protection. The male elephants are shot down as soon as the tusks grow to a marketable size, and the Karens kill male and female elephants indiscriminately. A Bill restricting this wholesale slaughter will probably be brought before the Legislative Council, as the extinction of the breed in Burmah would be a serious misfortune alike to the public service and to the timber trade.

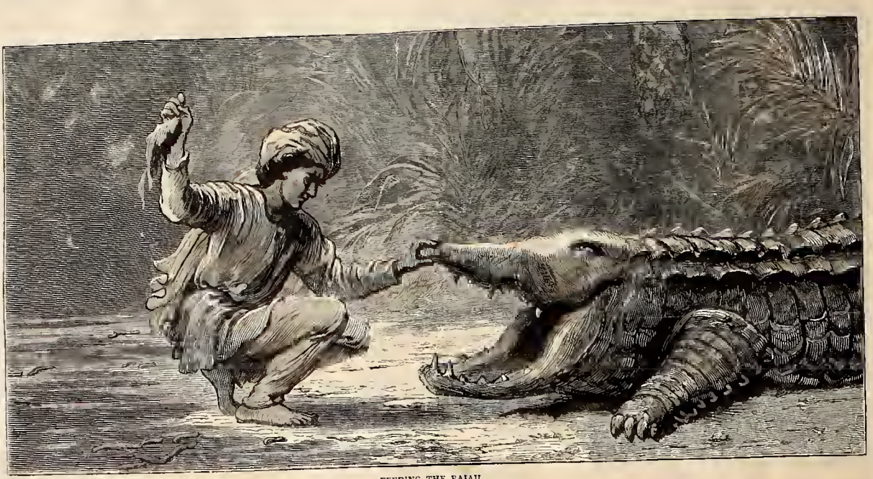
SHORTHORNS AND SHOWS.——Where the crops have been gathered into the stackyard and barn, and they are mostly secured now, except in the far North, the interest of farmers generally has been absorbed in shorthorn sales and in shows. The sales of shorthorns during the past fortnight have been on the whole wonderfully satisfactory, although no such high prices were realised as at some of the sales in the Lake District last year. It is four years ago since the Duke of Devonshire, who is the most famous breeder of shorthorns in the kingdom, held a sale of a selection of animals from his herd, until Wednesday, the 18th, and it was attended by shorthorn breeders and their agents from all parts of the world. It is remarkable to note from the record of the Duke's sales how the value of certain shorthorns has been growing in the market. In 1851, when the entire herd of shorthorns at Holker was sold, the average did not rise above "butchers' prices," 25*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* per head. New purchases were made for Holker, and in 1864, when another sale took place, an average of 66*l.* 3*s.* was made. Seven years afterwards, when forty-three of the herd were exposed, the average value was 383*l.* 13*s.*, and at the sale on Wednesday week the average of thirty animals was no less than 664*l.*, the total sum realised being 19,922*l.* The highest prices made was for one of the Oxford strain, which was sold to Mr. McIntosh, Havering Park, Essex, after keen competition with an Australian bidder, for 2,660 guineas. Another of the Oxford Duchesses fell to the Australian buyer for 2,100 guineas. Six of this tribe made the high average of 1,702 guineas. The Agricultural Gazette is pleased and displeased with the sale at Holker; it thinks that the Oxfords are run upon too much, that the high figures obtained for them are not for their genuine merit, but owing to the fact that a certain "narrow set" are exclusive owners of the blood, and bid recklessly for their possession, keeping down the legitimate value of other strains quite as good. It points out that the Barrington bulls are quite or nearly equal in every respect to the Oxfords. "Yet the Barrington bulls were looked askance at" at Holker. "The Oxfords are certainly not of nobler extraction, nor have finer recent crosses, yet in 1878 the highest price was 168*l.*, not a sixth of the Oxford average. This restriction upon the sources whence sires may be drawn without prejudicing sales is a most pernicious measure. Then note the enormous drop on each lot, which those 'within the swim' do not recognise. This, too, is of serious import. There is much truth in these suggestive observations of our contemporary; but fashion is not so easily altered, especially when those who originated it have the means of carrying out their hobby. The shows like the sales have been well attended within the interval of our last "Rural Notes;" and several of the after-dinner speeches have taken a proper practical turn. Not among the least interesting of the speeches made was that by Mr. John Algernon Clarke, of the Central Chamber of Agriculture at Long Sutton. Mr. Clarke is well known as a practical farmer, and as Agricultural Correspondent to The Times. His view is that the milk trade has pretty nearly reached its limits of profitableness, and that the future of farming must depend to a great extent upon butter, as only about one-fourth of the butter consumed in this country is made in British dairies. A great butter factory after the fashion of the American style is suggested by Mr. Clarke, to which farmers should send milk enough to produce butter "on the most approved principles." There is throughout the agricultural world a tendency at the present time to pay more attention to cattle than to corn. Our own view is that such is a prudent course if not carried too far. For the last thirty years, at least, there has been the cry of "Up corn, down horn," and vice versa, but those who are cautious in changing their system of cultivation are generally best off in the end. To throw a lot of land into permanent pasture because corn is cheap and cattle happen to be dear, is not always a considerate proceeding, as was proved in many parts of the country about a dozen years ago under circumstances like the present.

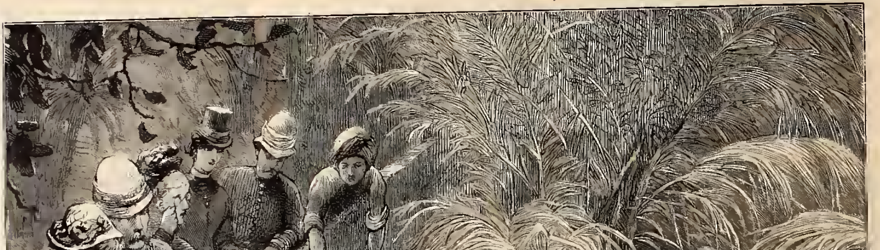
CO-OPERATIVE FARMING.——When the Speaker first wished to be the head of the firm of agricultural labourers, and they, with great obeisance, no doubt, politely refused the honourable co-partnership, we said that they had acted discreetly, that their judgment was a little more discerning than the Speaker's. The Speaker has been forced to admit this. A series of unfortunate years has proved to him that with every assistance that he could magnanimously have given, the labourers are much better off with their weekly wages than they could have been sharing profits with the owner of the Glynde estate. Co-operation in farming, after such a fashion as the Speaker proposed, was one of the silliest chimeras of the "Silly season."

THE WEATHER, &C.—— The changes in the weather have been rapid, and at times unexpected, within the last fortnight, but on the whole favourable for the harvesting of the late crops and for hopping, which is now practically finished. Wheat is yielding fairly on the threshing-floor and barley better than expected. Mangold and turnips will prove quite an average crop. Potatoes lift well, but in numerous instances are sadly tainted with disease; but increased prices will remunerate the growers.

MISCELLANEOUS.——Flock masters are in great glee. Everywhere within the last month the prices of the "woolly people" have been rising—in the north for lambs from 2*s.* to 10*s.* per head over the value of last year, and the supply at many auctions and markets was not equal to the demand. Store cattle are also selling well.—A poor little hop-picker's child five years old was, at the instance of a farmer at Rainham, taken before the magistrates and, after having been locked up two hours in a barn, fined 6*d.* for throwing a stone at an apple-tree, the "puir bairn," as the Scotch would call him, has been ill ever since. It is a good job that there are few farmers like this one in Kent, and few judges anywhere who would have convicted.—There have been in the course of the last few weeks an unusual number of fires in farm stables, which are due to a considerable extent to the carelessness with which ploughmen carry unprotected lamps or candles about with them. Messrs. Rowartt and Sons have invented a stable-lamp which is in its way is quite as safe as "the Davy." Many accidents would be prevented by its use.—According to statistics published in a French paper, the number of horses in Russia is about ten times as many as that we possess in Great Britain—21,570,000 against 2,225,000.—The authorities of Carlisle have resolved to invite the Royal Agricultural Society of England in 1880.—A great dairy show is to be held in New York in November, and English farmers are solicited to compete.—A memorial fund in recognition of the late Mr. T. C. Booth's great agricultural services has been instituted, and will no doubt command every success its promoters desire.



FEEDING THE RAJAH



A PUBLIC BREAKFAST PARTY

"BEAUTY AND THE BEAST"

A SCOTCH HARVEST FIELD

As I sit now on a golden sheaf, one of the first fruits of the reaper's hook, I have a field rustling in the sunshine before me, the countless millions of drooping ears being in the aggregate not unlike a gently rippling sea of gold. It is a field of oats, Scottice corn, "a grain with which" (according to Dr. Samuel Johnson) "they feed men in Scotland and horses in England;" a statement corroborated by Burns in the "Cottar's Saturday Night:"—

> But now the supper crowns their simple board,
> The halesome parritch, chief o' Scotia's food.

Pioneer reapers, Scottice shearers, entered the field yesterday, four women to shear and gather into sheaves, and a man to bind and set up the sheaves in stooks, and they have now cut a great roadway round the field, and, in one or two directions, through it, in preparation for the reaping machine. These roadways are beautifully carpeted with delicate light green grass and young clover, and among the growing corn appear at intervals stalks of field-mint, geranium molle, purple-podded mustard, and other wild flowers. The field is bounded by dykes and hedge-rows, in the latter of which are some fine ash, elm, and plane trees, which look most picturesque in the background of white barley that occupies the field beyond. If you take a quiet walk along these dykes and hedge-rows, you will find wild fruit in profusion: bramble berries, black and red, the scarlet fruit of the dog-rose, called in Scotland hips, the vermillion-coloured fruit of the thorn, Scottice haws, the blood-red berries of the honeysuckle, which, though beautiful to look at, are poisonous to eat; and the great and later fruit of the elder-berry, renowned in the "Laird of Cockpen:"—

Over these trees, again, is a glorious valley stretching down to the sea, scooped out in primeval times by the ice-ploughs of the Glacial period, when the glaciers dropped those great granite boulders that dot the hill-sides. The valley is rich in the varied colours of harvest, being filled with yellow corn-fields, white fields of barley, reddish fields of wheat, grey fields of pasture, and green fields of turnips; beyond which great woods slope away till they seem to touch the sea, on the dim, hazy surface of which loom vessels of various sizes, outward and inward bound. Over the shoulder of the hill that terminates the northern barrier of the valley is seen the Ailsa Craig, covered with a cap of mist.

I have an especial affection for this harvest field, for I had seen it in all its previous phases: in spring-time when it was turned up by the plough, and when it seemed, in the glimmering light of the winter afternoons, its furrows and ridges all clearly marked and defined, like a sea whose waves had been transfixed by a magic wand. I had seen it again covered with a table-cloth of snow—snow that brought the dark woods and grey plantations into stronger relief. I had seen it sown with fertile seed and harrowed over in the bracing winds of March, when the crocus and daffodil were blooming. I had watched its bare brown surface become gently overspread, first with the faintest tinge of green verdure, indescribable in its purity and delicacy. I had watched this verdure grow deeper in hue, the blades grow taller and thicker, till not a spot of brown bare earth could be seen. I had watched it shoot up, week by week, in illustration of the language of the Scripture, "first the blade, and then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear." I had seen it grow taller and taller, sometimes laughing in the sunshine, sometimes dripping with rain, and at other times tumbled and tossed about like the waves of the sea on wild stormy days, when the wind made angry havoc among it, and left traces of its fury in the odd patches and hollows which it laid level with the ground. I had observed it changing colour till the green verdure became literally and truly the golden grain; and now it is ready for the sickle, bending its head willingly for the sacrifice, its life of promise and of growth completed.

If I were asked in which phase it had appeared most beautiful, or in which I had loved it most, I should hesitate some moments. Each phase had a beauty of its own; but I like it best as it is now. Then it had the soft tender beauty of immaturity; now it has the richer, fuller, more fertile beauty of age and of ripened usefulness. And it is at this stage that the poet and painter like it best, the latter, especially, loving to depict it in the language of colour when the reapers are at their work, as they are now, for while I have been making jottings, the reaping machine has begun its work, and the scene is most lively and picturesque, the coo-coo of the wood-pigeons in the elm tree being drowned by the click-clicking of the machine, the wo-oo of the driver, and the merry voices of the shearers.

> Not rural sights alone but rural sounds
> Exhilarate the spirit, and restore
> The tone of languid nature.

Let us look at them as they ply their busy work. The chief object is the reaping machine, which fully engages the attention of two men, one walking, holding the reins and guiding the horses, another sitting in the machine with a large hay-rake in his hand, with which he tilts off the grain in sufficient quantity to make a sheaf. All along the line traversed by the machine are seen men, women, boys, and girls, whose dresses of hodden gray, blue and red stockings, white sun-caps, striped short gowns, and drugget petticoats, look quite picturesque among the yellow corn. All are busy gathering, binding, and lifting the sheaves; chatting gaily or merrily laughing in the intervals of work; some young and blithe, others middle-aged and staid, a few old and stiff, all hot and thirsty, and drinking water, or oatmeal and water, and cracking jokes over the drink, old Gib Paterson saying, in his quaint way, "Whate'er we drink, boys, we come to water at the last." The boys and girls gather straws and make straps, and for this work they are paid fifteen-pence a day; the women, who gather the sheaves and place them on the straps, ready for tying up, are known as lifters and get half-a-crown, the bandsters, men who bind the sheaves, and collect them into stooks, get three-and-sixpence, and the pioneers, who make the roadways, get three shillings, wages which vary, more or less, according to locality. No straws are left in the field; when they are, it is an evidence of bad workmanship; hence gleaning, a practice famous in the literature of the cornfield since the days of Ruth, who "gleaned in the field after the reapers," and for whom some handfuls were left on purpose, is now quite unknown. The in horse, the one going next to the grain, is muzzled; but the other, you observe, always contrives to snatch a mouthful as it turns round.

Before the invention of machines reaping was all done by hand. But as an old farmer said to me the other day, "There are twa things that hae gaen out o' fashion i' ma time, that's the shearin' o' corn and the smearin' o' sheep." Then the number of harvesters employed would be three or four to one at present, and shoals of reapers, with "heuks in their oxters," came over to Scotland from the Emerald Isle, and returned with a harvest of good Scotch notes in their tattered coats, but whether from the engrossing nature of Home Rule associations, or that there is no demand for their services, they are no longer seen, or very rarely, in the harvest field. The field in those days presented even a livelier sight, the shearers working in pairs, each pair keeping its own hairst rig, the leading shearer being known as the fore or stibble-rig, as in Burns' "Hallowe'en"—

> Our stibble-rig was Rab McGraen,
> A clever, sturdy fallow.

Burns, Scotland's national poet, to whom a new monument has just been erected at Kilmarnock, is pre-eminently the poet of the harvest field. He himself wrought on the hairst rig, and it was there that his poetic aspirations found expression:—

> E'en then a wish, I mind its power,
> A wish that to my latest hour
> Shall strongly heave my breast:
> That I, for puir auld Scotland's sake,
> Some usefu' plan or book could make,
> Or sing a sang at least;

or, to quote other words of his own in prose, "The poetic genius of his country found him at the plough, and bade him sing the loves and joys, the rural scenes and rural pleasures of his native country in his native tongue." His sweetest themes are associated with the fields, the 'wee, modest, crimson-tipped flow'r" that

> Adorns the histie stibble-field
> Unseen, alone.

And the "wee, sleekit, cow'rin', tim'rous beastie," that he turned up with the plough in her nest,

> The wee bit heap o' leaves an' stibble,
> That cost thee mony a weary nibble.

Many of the Scotch words used in Burns' time are now only understood by the older people, and of this I will quote one illustration, as it will enable me to explain the process of stooking. In the "Address to a Mouse," he says,

> I doubt na, whyles, but thou may thieve.
> What then? Poor beastie, thou maun lieve!
> A daimen icker in a thrave

How many Scotchmen of the present day can explain what is meant by a daimen icker in a thrave? Icker is an ear of grain; daimen means rare, now and then, and a thrave is twenty-four sheaves. In the Scotch field the grain is usually made up into half-stooks, each consisting of six sheaves, and it takes four of these to make a thrave. A harvester, with whom I had a conversation on the meaning of this same passage, quoted another from memory, to be found in Burns' imaginary "Address to the Prince of Wales" in 1786.

> Yet oft a ragged cowte's been known

the word aiver being now disused in Ayrshire Scotch.

The harvest field is seen to most advantage on a calm, clear September day, when the sun pours upon it a soft, unbroken light, when the sky is blue and flecked with fleecy clouds which, as they sail over the green hill-sides, give them a most picturesque effect. The farmer prefers a rougher day, however, one on which a tirling, whirling, winnowing wind knocks the sheaves about. The harvest field by moonlight is a lovely sight,—

> When Cynthia lights in silver ray
> The weary shearer's homeward way.

The golden yellow of the grain and the green of the growing pasture have become chastened and faint; other colours have been obliterated, such as the tints of the leaves and the autumn hues of the trees and bushes; but white-washed farm-houses, barns, and cottages, shine out more vividly and clearly, the landscape presenting a wondrous, almost indescribable effect.

The flora and fauna of the harvest field, its Botany and Natural History, its flowers and fruit, whirring partridges and pheasants running out and in among the stooks, wood-pigeons, crows, starlings, chaffinches, sparrows, et hoc genus omne, which give it so much life and interest, can only be adequately sketched in a separate paper.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

It is seldom that a collection of poems by an unknown author contains so much that deserves serious consideration as is the case with "On the Seaboard, and other Poems," by Susan K. Phillips (Macmillan); it may honestly be averred that all are worth reading, whilst some, notably those which deal in a narrative form with seafaring life, are almost exceptionally good. No doubt the habitual readers of current periodical literature will recognise many of the pieces, which have appeared in different magazines, and will be glad to meet with them in a collected form; others may be assured that the verses are well worth reading. Undoubtedly the best of the more subjective poems is "The Cyclamen," a pretty and fanciful legend with an admirable lesson contained in it; amongst the narratives may be mentioned "A True Story of the Yorkshire Coast," "Give Me a Chance," and "I'll Die at Home;" it would be impossible to express in more simple and pathetic words the horror of the workhouse which our respectable poor, not unnaturally, feel than is done in the last named. Mrs. Phillips writes plainly and forcibly, with a true sense of melody, and we shall hope to meet with her again in the same mood.

If Henry James Snell, the author of "The Iceni: a Tragedy," intended his play for representation, he must have gauged modern taste to very little purpose; as a poetical effort it hardly calls for notice. As will be guessed, the story is founded upon the death of Boadicea, who is so extremely prosy a lady that her death in the general massacre of the dramatis personæ is a decided relief. The play suggests a bad nightmare after too faithful a study of "Titus Andronicus," or "Locrine," and the author may be advised in future efforts to consider his ideas, so as not to produce so mixed a fancy as "An eager ear may luckily lap (sic) up!"—The best that can be said for "Through Death to Life," by George Barlow (Samuel Tinsley), is that, judging from such a piece as "The Crown," the author knows better than would seem from the silly lines called "A New Love," which are not blasphemous, only because the writer probably did not quite understand what he was saying. The manner of these sonnets is about on a par with their matter, the whole being suggestive of a very young author.—"The New Irish Melodies," by Charles P. O'Conor (Abel Heywood and Son), is announced as being the production of "The Irish Peasant Poet." Irregular as many of the verses are, they have a certain wild music of their own, which makes one wish sometimes to hear the tunes which suggested them; one or two have appeared, with an appropriate setting, in the University Magazine, whilst "The Spade" has extraneous interest from its dedication.

The newest number of Mr. Allan Park Paton's so-called "Hamnet Edition" of Shakespeare is "The Tragedy of Hamlet" (Edinburgh: Edmonston and Co.). It is handsomely produced; but it may be doubted whether the editor will find many adherents to his singular theory respecting the emphasis-capitals of the First Folio. If he be right, some of the speeches must have had a most singular effect as originally spoken.—"Selections from the Poetical Works of Heinrich Heine" (Macmillan) contains some good renderings of the German poet, about the best being "The Pilgrimage to Kevlaar" and the ballad of "Lord Olaf." But it is questionable whether modern English can ever fittingly give the spirit of Heine's verse.

FROM CHINON TO ANGERS

Of all countries in Europe France has most to show which ought to be interesting to Englishmen. There is Angers, for instance, the old capital of the Plantagenets. It belongs to us almost as much as it does to the kingdom of Paris. It is not hard to get at; and a trip from Tours through Chinon and Fontevrault and Saumur would give you a good idea of two most characteristic parts of France, the forest land which belts in the rich garden of Touraine and the sandy, shifting Loire valley. It would also bring you face to face with scenes about which you have read in every history from Mrs. Markham to Mr. Green. Chinon, your first stage, is a delightfully pleasant town, full of old memories—full, too, of tourelles and pignons; beyond it stretches the rich Vienne valley, and you can trace in the distance the road along which the repentant Richard followed his father's corpse (the corpse bled as he drew near it) to Fontevrault. Fontevrault every Englishman ought to see. What a huge length of nave, now turned into five storeys of prison-dormitories; and how uncared for the Plantagenet tombs look in their grim vault. Why should not we restore them? The French would gladly give us leave; and they do belong to our history. If you miss Candes, whither pilgrims flock every year because St. Martin died there, you will miss one of the finest even of the fine Touraine churches. You can hardly miss Montsoreau, a big château by the water's edge, now turned into tenements for poor folk. Its owner, in the days of the St. Bartholomew, was a cruel persecutor of Huguenots. The staircase tower will remind you of that of Blois. Here Loire and Vienne meet, and, for an evening walk, few roads could be better than that to Saumur, with the sun setting up stream, the woods dark, except the golden oaks on the bank close by, the broad, quiet river with its islands, and a Claudesque light glorifying the whole. Wherever, as at Souzé, the low hills get near the road, you see that they are burrowed out to form human habitations; in more than one part of Touraine cave-men are by no means extinct.

Saumur is beautiful at all times. From the bridge the view is perfect; the old castle towers grandly above all; and even the dome of Notre Dame des Ardilliers, which the Jesuits built to commemorate the extirpation of heresy, looks well in the distance. We are tired and turn into the nearest inn—a big house, well outside the town, where rouliers and farm-people stay: just now it is quiet enough—a few blouses supping, among whom we eat ambrosia in the shape of soup, and half a roast fowl, followed by an omelette (our regular fare at these roadside inns), and washed down with veritable nectar, for this was our first taste of "Sparkling Saumur." Next morning our coffee in the large garden behind is so delicious that we regret the necessity of moving on. In the garden is a bowling-green and a machine for throwing sous. If you can throw down the wolf's throat which is stuck in the middle of the board, you score 1,000; between that and zero you have any number of opportunities. Sous-throwing is popular in Saumur; near the theatre we saw a dozen soldiers amusing themselves; they had set a sou on a cork, and were flinging sous at it. If they carried lighter knapsacks, perhaps French soldiers would play more muscular games. When we get to the railway station we can scarcely believe we are in France. They let us walk about as we like; no inquisitive sergens, no penning up in waiting-rooms. Has the old connection with England anything to do with the marked difference between the Angevin official and the average Frenchman?

I won't describe Saumur; you ought to see it. It is full of memories of King René (see the curious picture in the Museum, which represents him painting a Crowned Death), of the Huguenots who once numbered three-fourths of the population, of the Vendéans who took it by storm, charging uphill in pursuit of De Larochejaquelin's white-plumed hat. Its wine is glorious; that famous mediæval wine-taster would have marked it with a triple est. Its hôtel de ville is as good outside as a Flemish town hall; inside it is "restored" after the fashion of the Second Empire; and, as there was nothing old to destroy, I suppose so gorgeous a "restoration" was praiseworthy. How is it, by the way, that we English so seldom spent our money on town halls? Coventry was as rich a town as Saumur; yet St. Mary's Hall is but a poor place. Bristol, so great in the old time, has nothing but Canynge's Hall, whose louvre and open roof are now hidden by the brick front of a modern shop. Has industrial improvement been more unsparing than periodical revolutions? or were our guilds never (except in London) important enough to build much during the centuries of building activity?

At Saumur don't forget to go over the very curious church of Notre Dame de Nantilly; and drive out to Bagneux to see the big pierre couverte and its lesser sister. Two huge cromlechs in a garden, with a lodge and a regular curator! such things seem more natural amid wild Cornish moors, or out on Breton promontories.

At Angers the most striking object is the huge gloomy castle—like Millbank Prison with its towers much magnified, and a black hue thrown over it. Such a contrast to white Chinon and yellow Fontevrault and bright, cheery Saumur. Eight years ago it was richer in old wooden houses, quaintly carved and coloured, even than old Rouen was when we were boys. But old Rouen is gone, swept away to make room for the street of the Empress and other "improvements;" and Haussmannism has made even sadder work with Angers. I saw them pulling down, in the Rue du Cornet, a corner house, which was not carved only, but covered with statuettes right up to the gable. Others almost as good were being destroyed in the Rue St. Lo and the Rue de l'Espine. Of Rouen as it was I have a few etchings by a Frenchman who literally died broken-hearted when he saw it all being improved away; but of these glories of old Angers I could not get even a photograph. However, the improvement-makers had left, and seemed likely to leave, the impasse St. Eloi, a wilderness of tourelles and lucarnes, picturesque but not fragrant. People fancy that when they have cleared a few great open spaces they've made a town healthy; forgetting that they've only forced more people into already overcrowded courts, where there is probably neither drainage nor water. Angers, English in the free manners of its people, belongs almost wholly to the Plantagenets. In the suburb of La Doutre, across the river, building after building tells of Fulks and Geoffrys, the grand Hospice St. Jean, somewhat later than the rest, is the work of our Henry II.—one of his acts of atonement for Becket's murder. The Paris suzerains have failed to leave their mark anywhere on the city of Fulk Nerra; no wonder his statue is the only one the citizens have cared to set up. There is even an Angevin style of church, low and English-looking, owing to the absence of the triforium. St. Maurice, the cathedral, looks very home-like, compared with Tours Cathedral, for instance. Toussaint, long in ruins, now restored and used by the Protestants, is in pure "Early English" style; being Protestant, by the way, it is kept locked. Of course there is older and more distinctively Continental work at Angers; St. Serge, for instance, a glorious example of late Romanesque, is lofty enough; but the Angevin type, coeval with our First Pointed, is almost identical with it.

There is plenty more to see at Angers, notably a slate quarry, bigger than Penrhyn, the face of the rock being four hundred feet high. And at Angers here you are on the high road to Brittany. You can either push on to Nantes, and there begin the grand round which will bring you at last to Granville and the Channel Islands; or you can strike across to Vannes, and work out a route for yourself. This is always the pleasantest mode of travelling in France. Where there's no diligence there's almost always a mail-cart; and you learn more of both country and people in that way than by running to and fro all your life along the great lines of rail. H. S. F.

MR. T. T. COOPER, LATE BRITISH POLITICAL AGENT, BHAMO

Mr. Thomas Thornville Cooper, whose assassination was recently announced, was the youngest son of the late Mr. John Ibbetson Cooper, of Bishopwearmouth, Durham. Mr. Cooper's death, which will be sincerely regretted by his many friends, will also be a serious loss to the Government. His career, both as a traveller and as a political servant of the Government of India, has been attended with considerable distinction. He was a man whose knowledge of China and Oriental languages fitted him especially for his post on the Burman and Chinese frontier, and to geographical science he has been no mean contributor, while to those interested in ethnical studies he has afforded much information as to the manners of peoples who are almost unknown. As a traveller and writer Mr. Cooper is well known to all students of Asiatic geography. Colonel Yule speaks of him as "one of the most adventurous travellers of modern times," and it is sad that a man who escaped the perils of inland China and of Thibet, the fevers and wild tribes of the Mishmee Hills, should be murdered in the end by a Sepoy of his own guard. He started as a private traveller in 1866, and for a long while, in China and elsewhere, a death by violence was the possibility, and even more, of every moment. He carried poison about his person, believing death by his own hand would be preferable to the lingering tortures of the Chinese, a danger ever before his eyes. The "Travels of a Pioneer of Commerce, in Pigtail and Petticoats," is a spirited and interesting account of his first journey, in which he reached from Shanghai, Chingtu, Lithang, Tats-ianlu, Bathang, and Yunnan, the latitude of which he places about 29° N., and long 98·53° E., all in a region which up to his time was practically unknown, and only failed to complete the journey to Burmah by a few days' marches, owing to the rebellion and disturbed state of that part of the country. Some of Cooper's sketches of this part of Asia illustrate Colonel Yule's fine edition of "Marco Polo." Another journey of Cooper's was to penetrate Thibet from Assam, through the Mishmee country, an account of which is published in "Mishmee Hills." He was arrested on the frontiers by the Chinese and Thibetan authorities. He, however, achieved a result in another direction that has proved highly beneficial to the interests of Upper Assam. A tribe of Mishmees inhabiting the hill country had long cherished a blood feud against the Indian Government. A few years previously their chief, Kysa, had murdered two Roman Catholic missionaries, and an expedition being sent againt him, he was taken prisoner and incarcerated in the gaol at Debrughur. He murdered his gaoler, and was hanged in consequence. The whole tribe constituted themselves his avengers, and had given considerable trouble to the peaceful inhabitants of the frontier. Mr. Cooper managed in an able manner to settle the quarrel, and brought back with him to Assam a deputation of chiefs, who there concluded a peace which they have maintained inviolate ever since. For this service Mr. Cooper received the personal thanks of Lord Mayo, then Viceroy of India. He returned from this journey terribly ill, and left Calcutta for the cooler climate of England. Presently he was sent by the India Office to accompany the Panthay Embassy from Yunnan, and escort them to the frontiers of their territory. Before, however, he could accomplish this the news reached Rangoon, early in 1873, of the complete destruction of the Panthay power by the Chinese, and the members of the embassy elected to remain under British protection. Shortly afterwards he was appointed by Lord Northbrook to the British Political Agency at Bhamo, but was unfortunately compelled through ill-health to resign this post in the March following, and return to England. He was attached to the Political Department of the India Office until November, 1876, when he was again sent to India with despatches and presents from the Queen for the Viceroy in connection with the Imperial Durbar of Delhi, and was foreign attaché until his re-appointment as British Political Agent at Bhamo, where he was shot by Kissen Sing, a Naick of the Agency Guard, a native of Lucknow, on the 24th of April, about half-past eight o'clock in the evening, together with the Jemadar and another Sepoy of his guard. Mr. Cooper was a man in the prime of life, his physical powers, enterprise, and courage made him a splendid traveller and sportsman, his gifts and a singular gentleness won him many friends, both among his fellow-countrymen and among the half-civilised Orientals, Indians, Chinese, Thibetans, Burmese, and Shans with whom so much of his life was passed; and, as a writer in the Civil and Military Gazette says, "Those who knew him well, as he did, will mourn the loss of a genial, brave, and kind-hearted friend."

II., III.

"Low Travelling." In some mines the vein of coal is only some twenty or twenty-four inches in thickness, and in these confined workings locomotion is facilitated by the use of small trollies, called "jack trams," upon which the collier rests his body, whilst he pushes himself along by his toes. The sketch shows a fireman proceeding in this manner, using his hammer as an additional means of propulsion. The workings here are on the method called "wide work" or "long wall," to distinguish it from "straight work" or "narrow." By the first plan all the coal is got as the work proceeds, whilst in the latter, "drifts" or levels, are driven in various directions, and pillars of coal are left standing as supports for the superincumbent earth.

"Holing the Bottom Coal." Here the miner is shown at work in what is called a "drift." After the coal has been cut away to a depth of about five feet for the whole width of the working, which is about nine feet, the collier will drill holes in a horizontal direction in the coal as close to the roof as possible, and then by the aid of "shots," or charges of powder, the whole mass will be broken and brought down ready for removal. The lamp is kept fully two feet from the swing of the pick, and in some collieries the use of "stands" is enforced.

"Against the Collar." This is an "up-brow," or full "tub," on its way to the shaft. The men who push these "tubs" sometimes hurry along their loads with wonderful rapidity, with back and arms outstretched in a perfectly horizontal direction, the back narrowly escaping contact with the low roof. In the sketch the bar under which the man is passing is shown as nearly broken through by the weight above; but such bars often remain so for a long time without actually giving way, and they are frequently met with wherever there is a "tender" roof. In the more roomy passages, especially where there are steep inclines, ponies are employed to draw the "tubs" of coal.

"On the Spinney Top." A "spinney" is one of the main roads of the pit, the "drawer" is here shown about to descend the incline, having first skidded the wheel of his trolly, so that its impetus may not be more than he can overcome as he slides down after it with one foot on each rail of the tramway. In some cases wire ropes and pulleys are so arranged, that the weight of the full tubs descending one incline is utilised to draw the empty trucks up another passage.

"Vegetation Below." In those parts of wet mines where the air currents do not travel, the growth of fungus is often very remarkable. In this instance the timber supports of the roof are almost completely covered with a substance of most delicate whiteness resembling nothing so much as a quantity of finely carded wool. It is, however, of such frailty that at the merest touch it collapses.

"A Difference of Opinion." The collier is here disputing with the underlooker of the mine regarding the amount of work which he has done in the past fortnight, the officer having visited his working in order to take the measurement. On the left of the sketch is seen the "brattice cloth," by means of which the ventilation of the working is effected, the air travelling inwards along one side of it, and returning along the other, where the rails are seen.

"Sinking a Shaft." We are now at the bottom of a partially constructed shaft, the upper portion of which has already been walled in, whilst the men are engaged in widening out the lower part to make room for a similar lining of brickwork. The wall already constructed rests upon a "curb" of iron or elm, up to which the next tier of brickwork will be carried, the work being done in segments, so that at no time is the "curb" entirely without support. The three men on the right are drilling a shot hole, two of them striking with hammers whilst the other holds and turns the drill, one man is steadying the "hoppet" in which a mate is about to ascend, and another is clearing the fragments of rock from the "sump" (the lowest part of the shaft where the water collects for the pump) which is also seen in the sketch. The men wear oilskin capes and caps to protect them from the water which is constantly pouring off the sides of the shaft, and putting them into the "hoppet."

"Repairing a 'Garland.'" Sometimes, when there is much water running down the sides of a shaft, the "curbs" are fixed so as to project beyond the surface of the well, and on the ledges thus formed zinc or leaden gutters are placed, communicating with the bottom by means of canvas hose, so that the water is carried off, and the splashing which would otherwise be caused is obviated. These gutters are called "garlands," or "water-rings," and in our sketch the men are shown repairing one which has become damaged by some means. The hopper is kept against the side of the shaft by means of a pole, and a rope thrown around a beam. These beams are variously called "buntons" or "hiats," and are placed at intervals down the whole depth of the shaft to receive the upright guide rods of wood or metal upon which the "cage" will travel.

New Music

William Czerny.——The invigorating effects of holiday-tide is perceptible in our latest batch of "New Music," vocal and instrumental. A prettily-written narrative song for a mezzo-soprano is "I Sorrow No More," the words by Mrs. Noble, music by J. G. Eyken.—The same may be said of "Cradle Song," written and composed by G. Withers and Max Schroeter. —"Moments de Loisir" (from 43 to 50), morceaux classiques et populaires, for violin and pianoforte, are all more or less excellent and interesting. The four best are: "Les Marguerites," a graceful song, without words, by J. B. Wekerlin (No. 45); "Gavotte," from orchestral suite by J. S. Bach (No. 46); "The Knight's Song," a spirited melody by Volkmann (No. 47), and a "Mazurka in A," by Chopin (No. 48). Next best of the group are: "Mazurka in A minor," by Chopin (No. 43); "Song Without Words," Mendelssohn (No. 44), and "A Merry Ditty," a droll little tune by Volkmann (No. 49). Least satisfactory of this collection is Bach's Gavotte in B minor (No. 50).—A series of "Six Pièces Intimes" for the pianoforte, by Edouard Marlois, very pleasing and moderately easy, are worthy of the attention of music teachers. "Barcarolle" (No. 1) has a taking melody in 12-8 time; "Legende" (No. 2), the most original of the set; "Un Matin à la Ferme" (No. 3), a feeble air, indifferently set; "Prière" (No. 4), a very graceful piece; Nos. 5 and 6, "Capriccietto" and "Rondolet, are two quaint little studies.—Somewhat more difficult than the above, but fairly well written, are "Sérénade Bohemienne," pour le pianoforte, by G. J. Van Eyken, and "Holiday Time," a sketch for the pianoforte, by H. T. Pringuer.—From J. W. Gritton, F.C.D., comes a remarkably pleasing "Berceuse," a voluntary for the organ of so soothing a character that it should always be played after the sermon.

Messrs. Reid Brothers.——From hence come two charming songs, of medium compass, the one, "Down into Wonderland," a "Fairy Lullaby," the quaint words and catching melody of which, by A. Geibel, a child might learn to sing; and "Baby Mine," words by Charles Mackay, music by Harrison Millard, well adapted for young mothers to sing to their little ones, especially when the fathers are on the sea.—A very cheerful and vigorous sea-song, specially adapted for a penny reading on the coast or inland, is "Jack's Come Home To-day," written and composed by W. J. Deyers.—It is some time since we have met with a prettier or more melodious pianoforte piece than "Les Cloches du Soir," a reverie, by A. Geibel.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.——Every day the ladder of learning, whether for music or other studies, is made easier, and still more easy, so that young students of the present day have scarcely half the labour of their predecessors of say half a century ago. For example, "The Bouquet of Flowers," a set of clever and interesting sketches for the pianoforte in the 24 minor and major keys, is so progressive in difficulty that the executant, when he or she arrives at No. XII., "Myrtle," in G flat major, and "Rose" (No. XIV.), in E flat minor, feels quite at home with any amount of flats and sharps. No. I., "Rose Pink," although in the easy key of C, is one of the prettiest of the series. Nos. II. to VII., named respectively after wild and cultivated flowers, are equally good in their way. Nos. IX. to XVIII. are excellent studies. Nos. XIX. to XXIV. fall off in merit.—True to Nature are the pathetic words by F. E. Weatherly, M.A., and the music, by W. W. Meadows, of "Cathedral Days."

Messrs. Witt and Co.——A showy song for a soprano or tenor is "Mai Lied" (May Song), music by Carl Reinecke, the words translated by Lewis Novra from the German poetry of Emanuel Geibel; this song is also published in a lower key for baritone or contralto.—H. Hofmann has, with his usual ability, transcribed "Silhouettes from Hungary," seven pianoforte pieces on original Hungarian melodies, for violin and pianoforte; they are good studies for students of both instruments.—The same composer has also published, under the title of "Italian Love Tale," six duets for the pianoforte, which, although far from easy, are arranged in so masterly a manner that they will fully repay the trouble of learning them.—More within the range of ordinary players are two books of pianoforte duets, entitled "Albion," which contain eight of our national airs, ably and tastefully transcribed by H. Hofmann.—Four ably-written pieces for the pianoforte of moderate difficulty, and of the same type, are "Idylle" (Vielliebchen), by H. Fliege; "Eglogue," by R. Fuchs; "Aubade," by J. H. Sprange; and "Alpen-Roschen," by J. Löw. They are all useful for school teaching.

Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co.——The very best galap of the season is "Cyprus Galop," by H. de Vaux, a bright and tuneful melody, which at once catches the ear, and will win public favour for it. The frontispiece is a really excellent map of Cyprus, which will be found most useful for a reference in the drawing-room, as well as the schoolroom.—W. Meyer Lutz has arranged the most popular airs in his operetta Little Doctor Faust, as a set of quadrilles bearing that name; they are simply but well done.—The same may be said of "Soldaten Leben Waltz," by Albert Hartmann, and "Lucette," a valse by Charles Coote, jun., introducing a number of popular melodies, more or less hackneyed.

Miscellaneous.——We have come across fewer tales of the sea than usual this autumn; "Watching," a ballad written and composed by Edward Oxenford and T. W. Davidson, is but a poor specimen of their respective abilities (Messrs. Lyon and Hall, Brighton).—Quite worthy of its designation is "Le Réveil du Rossignol," a "valse elegante," by Lillie Albrecht; this clever young composer writes carefully and with taste (Messrs. Duncan Davison and Co.)—Appropriate for the present season is "Harvest Home," a "Service of Song for a Harvest Thanksgiving." It consists of selections from Scripture to be read by the clergyman or school teacher, together with anthems, chants, and popular hymns, judiciously chosen. The anthems selected for this little work are "Sing, O Heavens," by Kent, and "Thou Visitest the Earth," by Green. Besides some well known hymns by Haydn and other ancient composers there are some by the editress, Mary Palmer, who has arranged the whole work. In country churches, where the members of the choir and the school children are fairly well instructed, this service will prove both useful and interesting (Church of England Sunday School Institute).—"Hymns and Songs," with accompanying tunes, to be used at meetings of the Church of England Temperance Society, are very good in their way, and will no doubt meet the wants of those for whom they are selected and compiled by Mr. G. J. Chapple. Some of the hymn tunes are original, but the greater part are well known. The songs are for the most part appropriate to the temperance subject; for example, "The Drunkard's Wife," "Water for Me," "I Want no Wine Cup Flowing," &c. (W. Wells Gardner, Paternoster Buildings).

A GIFT FOR MY BRIDE

A gift for my dear little Janet!
What, what shall the souvenir be?
Will anything found on this planet
Remind her of me?

A ring for her delicate finger,
To press it and squeeze it all day?
A song in her heart that will linger
When I am away?

A book that her mind will engage,
And will easily enter her pocket?
A bird in a cage?

A volume of manuscript verses?
A flower in porcelain that blows?
A phial of scent that disperses
The attar of rose?

The frond of a fern, or a feather
Among her fair tresses to twine?
A sprig, for her bosom, of heather,
Or pale jessamine?

A pencil? a portrait of me?
A bracelet, with "Janet" upon it?
A "crooked bawbee?"

She's true, and she's kind, and she's clever,
And pensive, and not very tall;
As high as my heart is, however—
And modest withal.—J. L. R.

Our Sailors.——Mr. W. Evan Franks, the Secretary of the St. Andrew's Waterside Church Mission, writes to us:—"As we have large quantities of The Graphic, with other books and papers, sent for distribution amongst sailors, fishermen, and emigrants, will you allow me, through your columns, to thank the numerous friends who thus supply us, and to assure them that they are most thoroughly and gratefully appreciated. During the past year more than six hundred ships' libraries were supplied by the Mission for crews of ships leaving the Port of London alone; besides bags of illustrated papers, periodicals, tracts, &c., sent to the large fishing fleets in the North Sea and at Grimsby. We are now making a special effort to complete our work in the Port of London, in which we have eight Mission Clergy constantly employed visiting the ships in all the principal docks, north and south, below London Bridge. This appeal has been so far liberally responded to by donations of one hundred guineas from the Corporation of London, and grants from the Thames Conservancy and many of the large City Companies. We hope to raise 600*l*., in addition to our present income, the amount needed for London, in which the greater part of the Society's income is expended. Any books, magazines, papers, &c., will be thankfully acknowledged, if sent to the Depôt, 36, City Chambers, Railway Place, Fenchurch Street."

THE BOULDER BEACH

THE PLOUGHMAN'S WHISPER

LONG before Mr. Rarey came across the Atlantic to practice patience, and command docility in the most vicious of horses, such as Cruiser—that dark savage—a secret similar, or, better gaining the obedience of wicked animals, had been existent among unlettered ploughmen in the "far North" of Scotland. Some of these so-called unlettered ploughmen rose to higher positions than holding the "stilts." These ploughmen accomplished the end of making their team walk quietly in the plough without strapping the fore near limb down after the fashion of Rarey—a fashion, by the way, which few but grooms, and those accustomed to vicious horses, would be inclined to follow. So far as I am aware, few of the ladies and gentlemen to whom only Mr. Rarey condescended to cater ever cared long to attempt the feat after the ephemeral furore was over. In the north of Scotland the guidance of farm horses has been practised as an art. The ploughmen are as much interested in being able to have a pair of horses entirely under their control as they are to ensure that the plough in their hands must make a neat and straight furrow with a level "sole." This secret is one after the Masonic fashion. It is strange and mystical, in truth; but very often sham ceremonies are got up for the "humbugging" of novices, who are not supposed to have nerve or sense enough to keep the whisper from being too much pronounced. The influential secret is imparted at meetings called "brotherings," where not fewer than three brothers must be present at the initiation, the new brother of course being bound by "a rigid oath" not to reveal anything he has heard. "These 'brotherings,'" said an old correspondent of the writer's, "are not often choice affairs." Neither are the mock ones. The bona fide ones are different. The sham ones are often wound up with a ball, where the ploughmen and their sweethearts have a general spree. And through this spreeing or boozing the horseman's word has been brought into ridicule and contempt by the well informed who have not been "brothered," masters as well as servants.

There is a powerful influence in that whisper over cart-horses—as great as that which the presence of a cat in the stable has upon the temper of certain racehorses. My old friend, who in his early days was one of the most proficient in the art of whispering, has told me that he has known a lad entrusted with a pair of three-year-old fillies just taken from the grass, and which had never been in harness, high spirited, and one of them vicious, manage them thoroughly with this Abracadabra. He yoked them without assistance. He ploughed all day, and came back in the evening without injury to horses, implement, or man. Without the talismanic whisper it would have been impossible to have accomplished such a feat. The secret does not belong to the North of Scotland alone. Its influence can be seen in the City Road every morning, where men and little boys direct horses—powerful ones—without touching them, and who follow the lads through the streets like lambs. The foundation of the secret, it is no breach of brotherhood to say, is kindliness.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The end of the Bosnian insurrection seems at last in view. Marshal Jovanovics has formally announced the pacification of the Herzegovina, and the Austrian advance in Bosnia proper has been this week unreservedly successful. Two of the chief insurgent strongholds in the Posavina, Dolni Tuzla and Bjelina, where formidable resistance was anticipated, have submitted without a struggle, and although the Austrians were vigorously opposed at Dokani, they managed effectually to press back the Bosnians on Zwornik. The taking of Zwornik itself is reported, but the news as not yet been officially confirmed. Part of the Serajevo forces are working upwards to effect a junction, and have occupied Olova, between Serajevo and Zwornik, finding the town perfectly deserted, as even the women and children had fled to the woods. Another column after a severe contest has taken Senkovics—a strongly fortified position on the road to Visegrad—and has subsequently entered Rogatica. Thus the rebels round Zwornik are fairly hemmed in to the Posavina, for the Servian frontier prevents any retreat eastward, and it is asserted that the rebel chiefs have offered to surrender to the Servians if their property be respected. Refugees are already crossing into Servia, where they are hospitably received, but all combatants entering the province are at once disarmed and interned. In the north-west General Zachs has at length captured Bihacs on the Unna, which had given him so much trouble, while further down on the Dalmatian frontier the Imperialists have been generally well received, and the only place of consequence still holding out is Livno. Marshal Jovanovics in the Herzegovina is also advancing on the last important position to be taken—Klobuk. Thus the Austrian occupation may reasonably be completed during October, Novi Bazar being left for a spring campaign, and the reorganisation of the provinces will be begun at once. Mussulmans will be admitted into the administration, and Austria intends to act as though she had been peaceably received. Austrian reports state that the Christian—and in some cases the Mahomedan—population have been flocking to claim the protection of the Imperialist army, and that the resistance proceeds solely from the Mussulmans, incited by fanatical priests and supported by Turkish authorities. The Porte, notwithstanding, in a fresh Circular indignantly disclaims all responsibility for recent events in Bosnia.

The Austrian occupation, however, seems likely to furnish the Russians with a plausible pretext for enlarging their garrisons in Bulgaria and Roumelia. Russian generals consider the number of troops fixed by the Congress altogether inadequate, and the army of occupation will probably be increased to 120,000 men. Nevertheless, the Russians are now withdrawing in earnest, and their headquarters are fixed at Adrianople. San Stefano has been completely vacated, and in consequence the British fleet leaves Prinkipo to-day (Saturday) for Artaki, on the southern shore of the Sea of Marmora. Russia and the Porte are now considering a supplementary agreement to decide sundry clauses mentioned in the Preliminary Treaty of San Stefano, and left untouched by the Berlin Treaty. These points include the war indemnity, compensation to Russian subjects, liberty of emigration from the occupied provinces, and the regulation of commercial relations, but present nothing new. Even the amount of the war indemnity is not yet fixed, and the Porte finds its financial difficulties worse than ever, as the local bankers will do nothing towards raising a new loan without English co-operation. Turkey therefore declares that all reforms are impracticable for want of funds, and that she relies upon England to exert moral influence on the subject. The Porte also states that such efforts would be furthered by the introduction of British elements in the administration of the Ottoman finances. The Greek question remains unaltered, although Safvet Pasha proposes to cede several islands of the Archipelago to Greece instead of any portion of the mainland. Montenegro has now demanded an immediate settlement of the frontier line, and Prince Nikita's demand is warmly supported by Russia, who has suggested that the Powers should make a collective request for the cession of territory. Turkey promises to send troops to Albania in order to further the cession, and Osman Pasha is reported to be Mehemet Ali's successor in the mission. The threatened troubles in ASIA have been temporarily averted, for Erzeroum has been occupied by the Turkish troops with but little disturbance. The Armenians, however, continue very discontented. Numbers have emigrated, and several thousands are in arms.

FRANCE.——Home affairs are very quiet just now, and the only subject of interest is the sweeping programme of reforms put forth by M. Gambetta at Romans. Enthusiastically received by his more advanced adherents, the speech has caused considerable uneasiness in moderate minds. In particular, the suggestion to make clerical students liable to military service is peculiarly distasteful to French sentiment, and has aroused general opposition. Further, M. Gambetta's remarks on Marshal MacMahon are said to have greatly annoyed the President, and it is asserted that owing to this fact M. Gambetta's hoarseness at Grenoble was put forth as a convenient excuse to avoid another speech. M. Gambetta is now holiday-making in Switzerland, and was accordingly unable to attend any of the numerous banquets given throughout France on Sunday to commemorate the centenary of the first Republic. The delegates for the Senatorial elections will probably be chosen in October, and the election of the Senators will follow on January 5th.

Paris is delighted that the Exhibition is to be kept open until Nov. 20th in order that French exhibitors may profit by their awards, which will not be formally announced until Oct. 21st. During the additional fortnight exhibitors will be allowed to sell off their goods. The Exhibition has given a valuable impetus to French trade, as the revenue for the first eight months of the present year shows an increase of 1,750,000*l.* on that of the corresponding period in 1877.—There has been a serious accident on the Eastern Railway at Liverdun, two persons being killed and nine injured.

ITALY.——Rome celebrated on the 20th inst. the anniversary of the entry of the Italian troops, and the city was gaily decorated in honour of the event, the Syndic and Municipality going in state to place crowns on Victor Emmanuel's grave at the Pantheon, and on the monument to the soldiers who fell at the Porta Pia. While these rejoicings at the overthrow of Papal dominion have been going on outside the Vatican, the Pope has been uttering fresh complaints against the Italian Government. The Protestant schools and institutions which have lately grown up in Rome cause great alarm to Leo XIII., and His Holiness has threatened excommunication to all engaged in such works, from the architects and artists to the very printers and compositors, who are employed in printing notices of Protestant services. The Papal Nuncios at Foreign Courts have accordingly been informed that the Vatican will be compelled to take steps against the hostility of the Italian Government, and have been requested to sound the different Powers on the subject. Meanwhile the Pope has received the first band of pilgrims of the season, and has written again to the Emperor of Germany, congratulating him on his restoration to health.

INDIA.——The British Mission to Cabul has been rebuffed at the very outset, Shere Ali having refused to permit the Envoy to enter Afghan territory. The Mission left Peshawur on Saturday, and on reaching Jumrood at the frontier, Major Cavagnari, one of the prominent members of the Mission, was sent forward to the mouth of the Khyber Pass to request formally a safe passage. His way was barred, however, at Ali Musjid, where the officer in command refused to allow any advance, positively threatened Major Cavagnari with violence, and placed forces on the surrounding heights ready to dispute the passage. After three hours' useless reasoning, and an emphatic warning that the British Government would hold Shere Ali responsible for his subordinate's actions, Major Cavagnari rejoined the Mission, which forthwith returned to Peshawur. Here it has been broken up for the present, and Sir Neville Chamberlain has gone back to his command at Madras. Shere Ali will be promptly summoned to atone for the insult offered to the British Government, and every preparation is being made to support the demands by military force. The Khyberees, an independent tribe, whose territory lies between the Indian frontier and Afghanistan, are being persuaded to support England, and their adherence is all the more likely as they have hitherto been friendly to British Power, and have thereby incurred Shere Ali's displeasure. Indeed, the Hill-tribes altogether are expected to favour the British, for they were forcibly impressed by the recent blockade and subjugation of the Jowakis. The command of the Khyber Pass is highly important for the British forces, as the Khyberees' territory is 180 miles long, and presents the easiest approach to Cabul. Should, however, this avenue be closed, there is another important route by Thall, which is situated at the entrance of the Koorum Valley, midway between Kohat and Bannu, and where 4,000 men are being concentrated. General Roberts was to start for Khelat yesterday (Friday) with a brigade of all arms, there being thus three separate columns ready to enter Afghan territory. Fresh forces also have been sent to Quetta, at the end of the Bolan Pass.

It is generally assumed that the refusal was prompted by Muscovite influence, for the Russian Embassy continues hospitably entertained at Cabul, and a further proof of Russia's participation is afforded by the despatch of an Afghan Envoy to Constantinople to recommend a treaty of alliance with Russia. Shere Ali has a long list of complaints against the British Government—the non-recognition of Abdulla Jan as his heir, the occupation of Quetta, the recognition of his brothers when they usurped the throne, and the award of Seistan to Persia being among the foremost grievances.

Great dissatisfaction is now expressed at the large number of field officers in the Indian army, the subalterns in many corps being completely out-numbered. The prospects of promotion are thus very small, as under the present system of pensions voluntary retirement is almost impossible.—There is some talk of annexing Scinde to the Punjaub.

UNITED STATES.——Yellow fever in the Southern States continues to decrease; but at Memphis—which has suffered more than any other city, there being hardly enough living left to bury the dead—the decline appears partly due to the lack of victims. Superstitious people are noting the recent prophecy of an old negro that a plague should come upon New Orleans this summer fatal, alike to whites and blacks, and increase until the daily number of deaths equalled the degrees of the thermometer, when it would decline. Curiously enough the decrease of the epidemic has exactly fulfilled this prophecy. The fever has mainly attacked strong healthy persons, neglecting sickly people. Along the Mississippi the epidemic has caused total stagnation of trade; not a creature is visible at the usually busy steamboat landings, no freights are received, or boats allowed to land, and the houses are totally deserted. In Vicksburg, also, the population spared by the fever have to live on charity, as every factory and workshop has been closed.

A second opponent to General Butler in the Massachusetts Governorship has appeared, the Democrats hostile to Butler having nominated Mr. J. G. Abbott.—In Washington 400 strikers have made a formidable demonstration, and troops have been sent from Baltimore to preserve order.—Sitting Bull wishes to bring back his followers into the States, and has sent six Sioux to treat with the authorities in Montana.

AUSTRALIA.——The Victorian Parliament is still discussing the Reform Bill brought forward by the Premier, in order to prevent any repetition of the deadlock of last Session. Mr. Berry is trying hard to pare down the authority of the Upper House; and threatens that, if his Bill be rejected, he will ask the British Parliament to force the measure on the colony. There has been a large meeting at the Melbourne Town Hall, to express formal approval of Lord Beaconsfield's policy, similar congratulations being forwarded by New South Wales. Victoria and New South Wales are competing eagerly to attract trade by the extension of their railway systems, and Victoria is lowering her railway rates to cut out her rival. New Zealand intends shortly to bring forward a proposal for direct steam communication with England.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In GERMANY the Parliamentary Committee are busily amending the Anti-Socialist Bill, and it is probable that the debates will result in a compromise.—Leprosy has broken out in SPAIN.—Sir J. Macdonald, the leader of the Opposition and Conservative party in CANADA, has been returned in the recent elections by a large majority.—At the CAPE the Zulus continue hostile, while fighting is still going on in the Transvaal, where the Korrannas have retreated into the mountains beyond the Orange River.

THE COURT

THE principal members of the Royal Family are now gathered together in the Highlands. The Duke of Connaught joined the Queen at Balmoral last week, and Prince William of Prussia also arrived on Monday afternoon on a visit to Her Majesty. On Saturday, Viscount Cranbrook dined with the Queen, and next morning Her Majesty, with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, attended Divine Service at Crathie Church, the Rev. A. K. H. Boyd officiating. After the service the Prince of Wales lunched with the Queen, and in the afternoon Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice called upon Lady Biddulph at Abergeldie Mains. On Monday the Duke of Connaught went out deerstalking, and in the evening Viscount Cranbrook and Major Von Liebenau joined the Royal party at dinner. Next day the Duke of Connaught and Prince William again went deerstalking, and the Prince of Wales dined with the Queen. On Wednesday the Duke of Connaught left Balmoral.

The Prince of Wales has been staying with Colonel Farquharson at Invercauld, where there was a grand dinner party on his arrival on Sunday evening. A deer-drive was held in the forest on Monday, and on Tuesday the party went out grouse-shooting. The Prince returned to Abergeldie on Tuesday evening, and on Thursday was joined by the Princess and her three daughters. The Princess and her children returned to England on Tuesday afternoon from staying with the Danish Royal family at Rumpenheim, crossing from Dover to Calais in the Maid of Kent, and resting a day at Marlborough House before starting for Scotland. Next week the Prince will visit the Earl of Fife at Mar Lodge, and will spend two or three days deer-stalking in the forest.—The Prince of Wales has taken for the season the shooting over the Maesllwych Castle estate near Hereford.

The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne will travel to Canada in the armour-plated vessel Northampton, which is now being fitted up at Chatham for their accommodation. The Northampton is to be commissioned on the 1st prox., and will be accompanied by the despatch vessel Iris. The Princess and her husband remain at Inverary with the Duke of Argyll.—The infant daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh is to be baptized into the Greek faith at Coburg, and the ceremony will take place in the Ducal Palace as soon Duke Ernest returns to the capital.—Prince and Princess Christian have been staying with the Imperial Prince and Princess of Germany at Potsdam, and have now gone to Primkenau.—The Duke of Cambridge returned to London from Paris at the end of last week.—Prince William of Prussia has been staying at Ilfracombe, and spent two days in London before leaving for the Highlands.

CHURCH NEWS

THE ANNUAL CHURCH CONGRESS will commence at Sheffield on the 1st prox. There is the usual division of opinion amongst the representatives of the various sections of the Establishment as to the utility of the gathering, and the advisability of attending it. The Rev. Mr. Douglas of Sheffield regards Congresses as "a great advertising medium for Ritualistic opinions," and thinks that they "go to cause the downfall of England's Church." He furthermore declares that "nothing is more foreign to the Congress than robust, healthy, and purifying discussion," and that its aim seems to be "union based on concession and compromise, even of what we regard as vital and essential truth." The Record rejoices over the fact that out of eighty-nine readers and speakers announced forty-one are Evangelical; but the Rock says that the Evangelicals are only encouraged to attend in order that they may be entrapped and seduced, whilst the Church Review boldly proclaims that there has been a nefarious plot to pack the Congress with Low Churchmen. The Nonconformist regards this exhibition of rancorous hostility as a lamentable spectacle to be presented before the un-Christian masses; and the Church Times very sensibly asks how it can be worse to meet High Church clergymen at a Congress, than at a Visitation where they are on the same official footing, and how an Evangelical clergyman "can consent to minister in a Church which forces him to style himself a priest, to give thanks for the regeneration of all children in baptism, to administer the Holy Communion to none but such as kneel, to refuse a dear Dissenting brother permission to officiate in his church, and to tolerate the existence of auricular confession, nay, which bids him urge its use on certain occasions. If he can swallow all this even with a wry face, it is not very much to rub shoulders once a year with people who like it."

VARIOUS.——The Bishop of Durham, commencing his Diocesan Visitation on Friday, said that he had never been an advocate for the increase of the Episcopate generally, and they must not forget that a regiment might be injured as much by being over-officered as under-officered. His diocese was, however, exceptionally large, and a new see at Newcastle was contemplated so long ago as the time of Edward VI., but he thought there was little use in moving in the matter until trade revived. Turning to the burials question, he admitted that the churchyard was vested in the incumbent for the benefit of all the parishioners, including Dissenters, and that though the grievance was a sentimental one, it was none the less real; but it was frankly admitted that the agitation was but a first step to the disestablishment of the Church, and so long as it was presented in that form it must be met with determined opposition. They must and would take that course, not from any want of charity to Nonconformists, but from the necessity of self-defence. Reviewing the state of religious thought, he said there were many alarming indications, such as the lowered tone of morals in the higher ranks of society, the mistrust of those above them amongst the lowest classes, a bitter and unscrupulous spirit of partisanship, rationalism, sacerdotalism, and, above all, intemperance, which seemed to indicate that the conflict of the powers of good and evil which was predicted for the last days was near at hand. He concluded with a vigorous denunciation of the re-introduction of the corruptions of the Church of Rome by the lawless efforts of the Ritualists, especially condemning the adoration of the Real Presence in the Holy Communion, and the virtual enforcement of the duty of Private Confession and Absolution.—The Archbishop of Canterbury, replying to the memorial of the Church of England Young Men's Society on the subject of the marriage of divorced persons, says their proper course would be to petition Parliament for a repeal of the law.—The Rev. Brooke Lambert has written to the Guardian explaining that his letter (from which we gave an extract a fortnight ago), was not intended for the general public, inasmuch as it was his monthly letter to his parishioners printed on the cover of the Tamworth Parish Magazine. He goes on to say: "But the fact to which I call attention wants stating. Those who preach the Gospel cannot live of the Gospel. The extensive machinery of a parish nowadays requires a man to be a Crœsus or a Lazarus. I don't know which is the worst. To beg demoralises oneself; to spend freely demoralises those who ought to share the burden. Of the two I think that an avoidance of begging is, for the time, the best."

NOTE.—— The Rev. Hawtrey Browne writes to correct an error which occurred in our report of the recent election of a successor to Dr. Gregg. The name of one of the candidates, which was given as Archdeacon Wynne, should have been Dean Gwynne.

MUSIC

Wagner's "Parsifal."——The libretto of Parsifal (as usual, by the composer of the music himself) being printed and published, a controversy has already arisen with regard to its inner significance. Everything that Richard Wagner produces is credited with some hidden meaning, which his most enthusiastic disciples endeavour, for the most part vainly, to unravel for the benefit of ordinary people. An Iamblichus at least is required to explain these Eleusinian Mysteries to the ignorant and stiff-necked uninitiated. The too-easily vexed prophet and "tone-poet" leaves to his many and furious disciples what in former times he was wont to perform on his own account. It is they, not he, who must now discourse and expound. Hence the absolute flood of more or less obscure literature of which his strange works have constituted the origin; hence the vast number of books, good, bad, and indifferent—in not a few of which, amid clouds of verbiage, the Das Wort ("The Word") becomes more and more far-fetched and unintelligible, so that it is at times impossible to reconcile many things with anything whatever. This comes of a too lively endeavour to imitate the style of the master whose secret aim they desire to elucidate. Imaginary believers in his music fall into the same trap; and we are overrun with feeble Wagnerites in music, just as we are overrun with feeble Wagnerites in prose. Wagner himself, if not invariably as clear as might be wished, expresses himself in both with wonderful earnestness and vigour, accompanied by an enormous amount of erudition, in all of which qualifications his most sanguine followers are to a great extent deficient. The music for Parsifal, we understand, is completely finished, and its publication will be the signal for as much incoherent and rhapsodical criticism as was engendered by the libretto. The chief topic of discussion, hitherto, has been that singular personage, Kundry, a sort of mixture of devil, angel, and woman, the appreciation of whose character and attributes from opposite points of view (Professor Edouard Hanslick, Wagner's most unsparing adversary, being again to the fore), are suggestive of much interesting speculation. About Kundry, however, a great deal more will be heard hereafter. Our immediate object is simply to remind such among our musical readers (and they are probably many) as care to inquire into the matter that such a controversy has commenced, and will doubtless be carried on, with ever-increasing zeal on both sides, until (and after) Parsifal shall have been heard, with all pomp and circumstance, as, in Wagner's own theatre at Bayreuth, two years ago, when the Ring des Nibelungen, the famous "Tetralogy," gave "an art" to Germany which, despite Mozart, Weber, and Beethoven, Germany had never possessed till then (!) Next year will mark another step—forward or backward, we do not presume to guess—in the career of one who is without question one of the most original poets and extraordinary musicians of his day, one who conscientiously believes he has a mission to present art under a wholly new phase. One of the necessary conditions of this wholly new phase is to set aside all that appeared before Wagner's time—that is, so far as the musical drama is concerned—and all that has been vouchsafed to the world during the Wagnerian epoch, as forecast by the "First Bayreuthiad" (Hanslick), and the Ring. Wagner, by the way, does wisely in publishing his libretto (Das Wort) first, and his music afterwards; for by this means two controversies are started in succession, and thus his name is perpetually on men's lips.

Covent Garden Promenade Concerts.——About these excellent entertainments, which virtually come to an end this evening, we shall have a few retrospective comments to offer in our next. Meanwhile, it may be premised that all the most important pledges of Messrs. Gatti have been fulfilled, one only excepted. The exception was the non-appearance of Mdlle. Marie Krebs, the well-known pianist. This, however, was not the fault of the directors, Mdlle. Krebs having been ordered by her medical advisers to take six months' repose, which her state of health imperatively demanded. Messrs. Gatti, moreover, were lucky in being able to engage the services of Madame Montigny-Rémaury, a more thoroughly competent and acceptable substitute than whom could not have been found. Further on, Mr. Charles Hallé, whose name alone signifies efficiency, played on several occasions, with the applause that never fails to greet him. As Beethoven's Symphony in F was performed at the beginning of the week, it will be seen that Mr. Arthur Sullivan, to whose skilful conducting and judicious arrangement of the programmes so much of the almost unprecedented success of these concerts is due, has kept his promise of presenting the first eight grand orchestral works of the mighty master, Monday after Monday, in chronological order. This was unquestionably a "happy thought." But (unexpected good news!) at the concert on Monday, for the benefit of the directors, the colossal "No. 9," the "Choral," in consequence of so many applications, is to be included in the programme. This reflects credit on the Messrs. Gatti, and, moreover, shows that the public generally—thanks to our esteemed compatriot, Mr. Sullivan—have taken a liking for such great things. It is difficult, nevertheless, to picture to ourselves the "Ninth Symphony" at a promenade concert. What will disbelievers in the possibility of educating a mixed crowd up to higher musical aspirations than those to which they have been accustomed say to this?

Waifs.——At the Trocadéro, the Russian concerts, under the direction of M. Nicolas Rubinstein, have greatly interested Parisian amateurs. The specimens of Glinka, Seroff, Dargomijsky, Tchaïkowsky, &c., have afforded genuine satisfaction, and among the singers most appreciated was the charming Mdlle. Anna di Belocca, a Russian born, and one intimate with the national music of her country. To the great Polish violinist, M. Henri Wieniawski, who played his own second concerto, fell the chief honours at the second concert. The third and last of the series was held on Saturday last—Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg has accepted an engagement for a series of concerts in the principal towns in Holland.—The Grand Opera in Paris is still ringing the changes on the Prophète, Faust, and Hamlet. So small a repertory in so big an institution is without precedent, a forcible interpretation of the mountain in labour giving birth to a ridiculus mus.

A Free Library and Reading-Room for South London is to be opened on the 1st prox. at the Working Men's College, 143, Upper Kennington Lane. The hours will be from twelve till two, and from seven till ten; the time to be extended, if found necessary; while the expenses will be provided by local contributions. The Working Men's College, which was opened in 1868, has been removed from Blackfriars Road, and the new premises are to be formally inaugurated next month by Professor Huxley. Night-schools for men and women, and classes to provide working-men and their families with a cheap and thorough education, are included in this institution.

A MALAYAN MEAL

Many years ago Punch had a very laughable picture of a young husband who, standing up at the dinner table, repeats the homely old grace, gets to "make us truly thankful, Amen," and concludes with, "Humph! cold mutton again!" His last words certainly do not express true thankfulness, but with "cold mutton again," especially if it is with the fat of that crystalline, splintery nature, which snaps at the touch of the knife, and flies off, the effort to feel content is difficult. Man is not an ox, to browse contentedly on grass throughout his career, with no desire for change; and one can even find a kind of sympathy for the Lincolnshire serving-maid, who left her situation on account of want of variety, declaring that she had had "beef, and mutton, and pigeon-pie," till she was "sick to dead." All the same, Mary Ann must have been of a discontented turn, for the pigeon-pie did form variety, and pasty of doves always has a savoury, seasoned, toothsome sound, in spite of the hollow deceit of its interior, and the peculiar organic changes that take place on the pasty being exposed to heat—changes which entirely alter the tissue of the pigeons, dissolve their bones, and make them come out in lumps or pads, wondrously resembling in fibre and sinew the kind of steak known as hard. But that continuity of beef and mutton does become oppressive when the eager, keen appetite of youth has passed away; and the least epicurean of mortals feels at times a longing for something fresh.

We were to have had eland to supplement our stores, so the Acclimatisation Society said, but all we get is a peep at the great mild, ox-like antelope at the Zoo, and we wonder how sportsman or butcher could slay a beast with such soft, amiable, appealing eyes. Failing change here in England, for our bodily appetite, then, let us have a feast in spirit; so let the reader come with me in imagination to the land of the much-maligned Malay, and partake with him of his morning meal.

It is getting intensely hot, and we have been toiling along a muddy path through the jungle, with the moist, steamy heat, which is answerable for the dense vegetation, setting a very bad example to our pores. It is terrible work walking, for the path is a series of pits of liquid mud formed by the elephants, who, like nervous old gentlemen on carpet patterns, always plant their great soft feet in the same places, so that if an elephant passes the same way a hundred times, he always steps where his predecessors have gone before. Why not turn into the jungle to right or left, and walk beneath the trees? Nature forbids: she has built a wall on the right hand, and on the left—a wall of vegetation—a green kind of basket-work, matted and woven together with rattans which creep, and crawl, and run in and out, trailing and twining everywhere, the simple cane of commerce and correction, often a hundred yards long, and the same diameter throughout. At times the eyes gladdened in an opening with groups of orchids; and the silver arrows of the sun flash down here and there like a sheaf; but nearly always the path has been in a dim, green twilight, till at last we reach the little village on the river's bank. There is not much beauty in the scene, but yet it is pleasing: the sight of the attap or palm-thatched roofs suggests rest and shade, and there are fruit-trees growing—feathery cocoa palms, broad-leaved plantains, a tall solid-looking durian or two, and the mangosteen. Welcome sights these, and more welcome the act of the Malay who advances to meet us with calm gentlemanly courtesy, and leads the way into his house up a short ladder, for the place is built on bamboo piles, and the floor is of split bamboo or palm, the walls of woven matting.

Our host is a rajah, and he has adopted European costume as far as trousers are concerned, but over this he has the silken sarong, a plaid scarf of bright colours, arranged round him like a kilt, and above this a baju, or cotton chintz jacket. His first act has been to give orders, and a man climbs a cocoa-nut tree by the notches that have been made for the purpose, and to which his big brown toes seem quite accustomed. Fear or giddiness is not thought of, and he soon lets fall a great nut, which is opened, and we partake of the sub-acid, refreshing juice with gusto indeed. As we are the rajah's guests, we are asked to partake of his meal; and soon we learn by the powers of scent that this is being prepared with no doubt extra care, in our honour. Naturally, a squeamish feeling sets in, and we wonder of what we shall be asked to eat; but hunger conquers such dread, and at last we feel impatient to begin. And no wonder, for the cookery is good, the Malay being a chef in his way; and, with rice for foundation, we have tasty dishes that are most gratifying. Mutton and beef there are none, no buffalo having lately been slain; but there is fish to-day—well cooked, little perch-like fellows, taken by rod and line; there is rice, cooked to a turn, all the pearly grains soft, separate, and dry; and as we imitate our host, and sit cross-legged on the palm lath floor, we are bidden to begin.

The fish is delicious, and is succeeded by a curry. No, no, good reader, not the curry you wot of—a peculiar kind of hash or fricassee made by mixing a sort of yellow tooth powder in sauce—but real curry, real East Indian curry, made to perfection, with green and red peppers fresh from the plants, and with that principal ingredient that you in England can never get—freshly-picked cocoa-nut shredded fine. The staple of the curry is a chicken. He is black of bone and joint, but no ancient cock, being a toothsome, gamey bird of a good fighting breed, and suggests pheasant in his flavour. What does it matter that plates and dishes are scarce, and that our rice is served on the great, green succulent plantain leaf? all looks clean, and the cookery is delicious. We are in a hot climate where the appetite requires stimulating at times, so we find that the Malay is awake to what is necessary for this purpose, and in place of salad, sauce, or pickles, we have the regular adjuncts of the simplest dinners—sambals—little saucers of various preparations. In one saucer is blachang and—well, yes, it is good; and it has an indescribable provocative flavour of its own; and surely we who prefer high game, and Stilton in its most decayed form, cannot afford to abuse the Malay for loving his blachang, even though it be made of putrefied shrimps, beaten into a mass beneath the rays of the sun. Blachang is good, and the dried prawns from another saucer, delicious. Another sambal is composed of green ginger shred small in vinegar; another is a chutney; another is composed of cooked yam; another of mangoes. Little varieties these, of which we take our choice, or act by the suggestion of our host, who evidently knows well which goes best with the curry. Sweets follow, mostly of rice and sugar cleverly made into cakes, some of which are rolled in plantain leaf skewered with a bamboo pin. There are pieces of peeled sugar-cane, too, and for wines we have sparkling water from the river, and that from the unripe cocoa-nuts growing above our heads.

As to dessert, we are in luck, for we are in a famous fruit-growing village, small though it be. Plantains or bananas of two kinds are set before us, far more delicious than any we have eaten before, and as unlike the banana of Covent Garden Market—that strange combination of sleepy pear and tallow candle—as can be. While, lastly, with a grave smile, our host honours us with the greatest of all fruit delicacies, a durian, which is opened by a follower in our presence. For it is as large as a small frame melon, and wooden and thorny; but it is dexterously divided, and we gaze at the novelty and its strange carpels, like the so-called quarters of an orange. And what of this durian—the fruit which the poorest Malay will give his day's wages to obtain? At first repulsion, for its odour is villainous—its scent is equal to any in proverbial Cologne, and its look non-enticing. Each carpel has within it a kind of custard, and in this custard are chestnut-like seeds. Faugh! the odour is frightful; but, out of respect for our host, we taste. Humph! Like olives. No, there is a touch of almond in it, with a flavour of cheese. Then that strange twang? Why that is Madeira stay, no—oldest and driest of sherry. Garlic too, or, no, more like chives, or rather that wonderful savoury flavour of the shalot, but only the faintest suspicion.

"Thank you, I'll take a little more."

Our host smiles blandly, even as he has smiled while watching the effect of the durian on our palate at the first taste, and our look of disgust. And so we eat and eat, and cry "Wonderful!" as we own that the durian is a fruit to be fostered, and exactly like—nothing we ever tasted before: it is a new sensation in this blasé, used-up world.

The dinner is done; but, though a strict Mahomedan, and abstainer, our host does not limit his guests, but sets before us to-day, from the palm, a very good drink when you cannot get a better, and presents us with cigars very roughly made from leaf of his own growing, while, for his own part, he rolls up a little of the tobacco in the roko, or outer sheath of the palm leaf, which forms a coarse cigarette paper, and smokes, content, while we enjoy our rough cigars, gazing out through a lace-work of palms at the sleepy river running by onward to where it will meet the tide with salt or brackish water and loathsome saurians.

Here all is dreamy peace, and we have no fear of the kris or wavy blade stuck in our host's sarong, for the handle is covered with the silk out of reverence to the guests, in sign of peace. It is a picture of repose and content, where man lives with his little wants supplied almost for stretching out his hand. Civilisation, with hurry and steam, and the press, and modern troubles, all are far away, while nothing breaks the silence but a minah, a captive bird in a bamboo cage, which little prisoner chatters away in the Malay tongue. Yes, all is very peaceful, and a strange feeling of repose and content steals over us, the result of good digestion, and—a Malay meal.

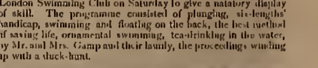
Robinson Crusoe's Island—Juan Fernandez in the Pacific—has been leased from the Chilian Government by a Swiss, who is rearing cattle there to supply passing ships with beef. Wild goats and fish are plentiful, and the goats are killed freely by the natives, who give up the skins to the proprietor in return for the privilege.—Talking of islands, a small colony of twenty-five persons inhabits Lord Howe Island, a mountainous wooded tract, some five miles in length and two miles in breadth, about 400 miles east of Sydney. These settlers were lately visited by a British steamer, and were found to be contented, hospitable people, with only two causes of complaint—the want of a schoolmaster and of clothing. The island rarely hears anything of the outside world, whalers having lately ceased to call in for provisions.

A Good Example.——At a time when public feeling is being greatly exercised on the subject of swimming, it may be worth while to direct attention to what can be done to further the movement by way of private enterprise. Many large firms, for instance, could, with the exceptional opportunities at their command, erect grounds upon their baths at a very small outlay for the benefit of their employés, and which would in a very little time, by judicious management, become self-supporting. An excellent example in this way has been set by Mr. Valentine Lovibond, the brewer, North End, Fulham, who at the small cost of 450*l*. has erected a bath in his grounds, for the benefit of his employés, 40 feet by 18 feet wide; the water is heated by surplus steam, of which there is a plentiful supply from the brewery. Started in June, the club numbers forty or fifty of the workpeople; and although few could swim at first, most have now acquired the art, Mr. Lovibond, an enthusiast in the movement, having instructed many of the men himself. The bath will be self-supporting, and a pro rata subscription is charged according to each one's earnings, the payment extending over a term, the charge being merely nominal. Members are allowed to bathe twice a day, before and after business hours. It should be mentioned that the bath is not exclusively confined to the employés; their friends from outside have joined the club, and on certain days ladies are allowed to bathe—a boon we are sure the fair sex will appreciate. With the view to incite his workmen to become good swimmers, Mr. Lovibond invited the London Swimming Club on Saturday to give a natatory display of skill. The programme consisted of plunging, six-lengths' handicap, swimming and floating on the back, the best method of saving life, ornamental swimming, tea-drinking in the water, by Mr. and Mrs. Camp and their family, the proceedings winding up with a duck-hunt.



LEGAL

The Public and the Administration of Justice.——Mr. Edlin, the Assistant-judge at the Middlesex Sessions, has felt it necessary to deny publicly the adverse statements which have appeared in some of the papers regarding certain of his recent decisions. One case he denies ever having tried at all, and in two others, in which it was inferred that he had sentenced two young lads to penal servitude for such minor offences as stealing a tobacco pouch, a bowl of money, and cakes from a stall, the statements representing both as first offences, he justified his sentence by stating that each had been convicted several times previously. As Mr. Edlin said, misstatements of this nature should not continue to circulate without contradiction. But who is to blame? it is rather curious that they should have appeared in letters "to the editor;" though perhaps the writers have been misled by garbled or incomplete reports in the first instance.—It is not easy to see the justice of a sentence passed by Mr. Barstow at Clerkenwell, in a recent case of assault. The accused, Thos. C. Mill, a milkman, was charged with having joined in a violent assault upon a constable. The charge appears to have been entirely unsupported by any evidence save that of the person assaulted, whilst on behalf of the accused three respectable persons voluntarily came forward to testify that he had no complicity in the matter, one of these witnesses being severely cross-examined by Mr. Barstow with the view of shaking her evidence, but unsuccessfully. Mr. Barstow then summed up the case thus: "If the accused was an innocent man, he was a very unfortunate man, as he would be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for six months." Surely this

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS—FAÇADE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. MARK must be a mistake, perhaps another case of inaccurate reporting; but, if not, in the interests of public justice the sentence should be annulled. —Apropos of police reports, there seems to be a considerable divergence from the facts in the accounts which have appeared of the trial of C. Spillane in Ireland for the murder of his wife; and, as the judge's decision is also the subject of criticism, we should like to know what really took place. The reports at present in circulation are of a very contradictory character.

PRISON DIETARY.——It is an unjust state of things that unconvicted prisoners should be worse treated in the matter of food than those whose crimes have been brought home to them. An inquiry into the death of Mary Stokes, who was found dead in her cell, shows the food arrangements at the House of Detention to be most incomplete. The brother of the deceased said he had paid a person for four dinners. Only one was sent in, however, but no notice was taken of the circumstance. It was stated by several warders that if expected dinners did not come the prisoner got no corresponding prison meal. The coroner remarked that it was infinitely worse than that of the convicted persons in the House of Correction. The immediate cause of death was apoplexy, but the jury added to the verdict their opinion that death was accelerated from insufficient diet during the time of her detention in the prison.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The capital sentence passed on Isabel Grant has been commuted to penal servitude for life.—The mess-man to the London Rifle Volunteers has been fined 5*l.* for retailing beer to strangers at the Wimbledon Camp without a license; but the magistrate recommended the Board of Inland Revenue to reduce the penalty to 10s., as he only appeared to have served the Excise officer.—The new Police Order, instituting a third class of inspectors, has not pleased the original officers of that rank. They have addressed a letter to the Chief Commissioner, complaining of the unfitness of many of the men to hold the positions thus given to them, and pointing out, as one of the anomalies of the innovation, that in the Woodford sub-division there are thirteen inspectors, two of the stations having four inspectors to one day duty beat.—Another swindler, this time a man, has been caught fraudulently obtaining money by the fraudulent pretence that it was for the Princess Alice Relief Fund. He was remanded.—Two young incorrigibles have been sentenced to ten and five days' imprisonment respectively for sleeping in, and damaging, a railway carriage.

HOMŒOPATHIC DOMESTIC MEDICINE. By J. LAURIE, M.D. Completely rearranged, revised, re-written, annotated, and brought down to the present time, with a copious introduction, by R. S. GUTTERIDGE, M.D. The present edition contains many important new chapters and sections, with new features and matter pertaining thereto, including the specific characteristic effects of all the new American remedies, the symptoms and treatment of all general diseases, including those of women and children, with plain directions for the treatment of accidents (including railway accidents), and numerous physiological notes, deductions, explanations, and illustrations delineating the minor operations in surgery. The new chapters comprise Nursing, Change of Air and Scene, Mineral Baths and Waters, Hydropathic Appliances, and External Remedies, Affections of the Digestive Organs, Cancer, Bright's Disease, Diabetes, Affections of the Lungs, Consumption and Diseases of the Respiratory Organs, Asthma and Hay Asthma, Affection of the Eyes (with a description of the Eyes and their appendages, and Illustrations showing the various parts of the Eye), Insanity, Delirium Tremens, Hysteria, Locomotive Ataxy, Scurvy, Softening of the Brain, Alcoholism, Dipsomania, Diseases of the Spinal Cord, while Paralysis has been specially considered, and the section on Stammering is quite new. This edition possess a New and Concise Dictionary of Medical Terms and Treatment, with leading indications of Treatment, prefixed to the various chapters and divisions, and a most comprehensive and intelligible Index. The whole book is lucidly expressed, the diction being carefully divested of technicalities, and definite expression studied from first to last. Diseases of Tropical Climates are fully considered, and the volume may be pronounced of the greatest value to families, emigrants, and missionaries. An Epitome of the above, 29th edition, price 5s. A Case of Medicines adapted to the former work, in Tincture or Pilules, price £4 4s.; in Globules, 60s. To the latter, Pilules or Tinctures, price £2 2s.; in Globules, £1 10s.

Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 4s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett. "While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.

ALL THE WORLD AT PARIS, VII.

Now or Six Months Hence?——There is some doubt whether the Indian Government mean to attack the Ameer of Afghanistan at once, or to delay operations until spring. If the most trustworthy experts are of opinion that the climate would render prompt action hazardous, of course Lord Lytton will be justified in postponing the blow which he must sooner or later strike; but the English people would unquestionably prefer that it should be struck forthwith. Notwithstanding the bland explanations of Russia, all the world knows that she is virtually responsible for the perplexities by which we are now confronted; and if nothing is done for six months she will take good care to aid the Afghans in organising their troops and to supply them with arms. The difficulty of the enterprise may thus become ten times greater than it is now. Meanwhile our prestige will have suffered immensely. Neither in India nor in any other part of Asia will allowance be made for the state of the weather; it will only be seen that a gross outrage has been inflicted upon us, and that we have taken no steps to resent it. An immediate assertion of our rights is almost equally desirable because of the impression it would produce upon Russia. She has still, apparently, some lingering doubts whether we are in earnest in our opposition to her grasping ambition. A short and decisive conflict in Afghanistan, following without the unnecessary loss of a day upon the incident occasioning it, would allay her doubts for ever. She would see once for all that although we have not hitherto interfered with her progress in Asia we do not intend to let her come much nearer to our frontier, and that if she insists on pushing forward she must be prepared for a tremendous struggle. Should there be delay notwithstanding these grave considerations, it is to be hoped that it will be in no way due to differences of opinion in the Cabinet. While the war between Russia and Turkey was in progress, there was some excuse for occasional hesitation; for then there were really two parties in the country, and the pro-Russian party was so loud in its demonstrations that its strength was naturally overrated. But now the nation is virtually unanimous. A few politicians may think that we have blundered into the present mess, and that we should still humour Afghanistan; and unfortunately this minority includes Lord Lawrence, whose opinion is entitled to careful consideration. It is noteworthy, however, that in the letter expounding his views he omitted all reference to the intrigues of Russia, while these, in the opinion of the vast majority of Englishmen, form the only important element in the problem. What the country is chiefly afraid of is that delay is unavoidable because Lord Lytton has allowed himself to be taken by surprise. We can hardly believe that there is any ground for this dread. To assert that adequate preparations were not made for so probable a contingency as an exhibition of malice by the Ameer would be to accuse the Governor-General and his advisers of the grossest carelessness and incompetence.

Our Revenue Returns.——The fiscal prospect is not cheering. The sluggish condition of trade still continues, and therefore the (so-called) industrial classes—who, by the way, are not a whit more industrial than other classes usually ranked above them—have less money to spend on taxable commodities. Thus it comes to pass that the revenue derivable from Customs and Excise is at a standstill, or is even declining. As most of the money thus obtained is got from the drinking of spirits and beer, or from the smoking and chewing of tobacco, a philanthropist might rather rejoice that the working people were compelled to stint themselves of luxuries which are decidedly pernicious if taken in excess. So long, however, as our revenue is obtained from its present sources, the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot afford to be a philanthropist. On the contrary, he must look with complacency on the man who swallows two pots of beer where one would be enough, and must regard him whose pipe is never out of his mouth as a true patriot. For these are the gentlemen—far beyond any amateur financiers—who are likely to help him to pay the Afghan bill which he sees looming in the future. O si sint omnes, he must feel inclined to murmur. But as, fortunately, the majority of the nation are not likely to become heavy drinkers and smokers to please the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the deficit which seems almost inevitable must be made up in some other way. Now that hard times are coming upon us wise people lament the reckless liberality with which so many sources of revenue have been abandoned. The result is that we have all our taxable eggs in a very few baskets. It is a very unpopular proceeding, as Mr. Lowe is aware, to try and impose a fresh tax; and so, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wants more money, he is driven to put a higher duty on something upon which a tax is already payable, such as tobacco or incomes. It is not likely that in the coming emergency the Government will display any startling financial originality. They will either raise the cash they need by way of loan—that cunning device for making posterity help us—or else they will screw up the income-tax again, thereby, as heretofore, making the patient, toiling middle-class feel keenly how costly, as well as how glorious, a thing it is to have an Empire on which the sun never sets.

The Church Congress.——It might have been expected that after eighteen years' experience there would not be much difficulty in deciding whether Church Congresses are or are not beneficial. As a matter of fact, however, considerable doubt seems to exist, and the Archbishop of York, as President of the present Congress, was obliged to devote a large part of his opening address to an argument in favour of the institution. The objections come chiefly from the Evangelical party, which complains that the Ritualist clergy obtain far too much prominence in these assemblies. And it must be admitted that the gentlemen who try hard to make believe that they are Roman Catholic priests are not given to modest retirement. They believe in pushing themselves forward, and in calling upon all the world to admit their claims. But if the Evangelicals are quite sure of their own position, they ought to be rather pleased than otherwise at this not very amiable tendency. For it gives them an opportunity of meeting their opponents in clear daylight. So long as the Ritualists are compelled to defend themselves before the whole Church, they can make converts in only a fair and open manner; and of course the true Evangelical believes that the number of upholders they can secure in that way is extremely limited. To the outside world it seems that the Congress should be of still greater advantage by fostering a charitable feeling among the different factions. A clergyman usually lives so much alone, and is so accustomed to lay down the law to his neighbours, that he is apt unconsciously to overrate the importance of his distinctive beliefs and sympathies. He finds it hard to understand that other clergymen may differ from him, and yet have a right to their position in the Church. When several hundreds of the clergy come together and talk over their various disputes, most of them are probably astonished to find how much they have in common, and at least some must go away with softened feelings towards those with whom they do not happen to agree. Nothing could be more desirable from the standpoint of the clergy themselves; for, after all, if the Church is to be really national, it must include as many shades of conviction and sentiment as are compatible with belief in the central doctrines of Christianity.

Bank Shareholders.——The best-known joint stock banks usually pay high dividends, and consequently their shares are quoted at a considerable premium. The great drawback to the holding of this sort of property is, first, that, where the liability is unlimited, the holder of a single share may, if the bank should fail, find himself called upon to pay up every penny that he possesses in the world; and, secondly, that bank shareholders, more than any other kind of investors, are almost completely at the mercy of their Board of Management. Shareholders are, as a rule, a confiding race, and so long as they receive liberal dividends, regularly paid, they trouble themselves very little as to how their Directors make the money for them. We wonder how many of the unlucky shareholders in the City of Glasgow Bank were aware of the real condition of that establishment, as stated in The Times' City Article of Thursday. "The bank has been losing credit gradually for ten years past. Rumours of the bank being in difficulties have been often circulated. The business of the bank has been conducted for years past on very unsound principles." The shareholders, we presume, a few knowing ones excepted, who took care to sell out before the crash came, knew nothing of these ugly reports, and in consequence many of them will be utterly ruined. The smaller shareholders in such concerns cannot be expected to understand the mysteries of banking transactions, but, for that very reason, they would be wise, if, in future, they were to spend a small percentage of their high dividends in collectively employing one or more trustworthy persons to ascertain whether their Directors were carrying on their business upon sound commercial principles, and, if not, to pull them up in their reckless career before it was too late.

Who Will Pay for the Afghan War?——We hope there is no real doubt as to the answer to this question. Yet rumours have been going about to the effect that we are to throw the whole burden of the war on India. A more unfair proceeding, as Mr. Fawcett well showed in his excellent letter to the Daily News, could hardly be conceived. No doubt the population of India will, as England believes, profit in the end by the war, but it is undertaken solely for our own benefit—to resent an insult, and to protect ourselves against a powerful rival by whom the insult was prompted. Even, therefore, if India were a rich country, it would be unjust to saddle her with the expense of a conflict respecting which she is in no way consulted. The case in her favour becomes a thousand times stronger when we remember that she is as far as possible from being a rich country. Complaints reach us every year that, while the expenditure of our Administration steadily increases, it becomes more and more difficult to maintain the existing revenue. We are compelled to tax heavily so necessary a commodity as salt, and not an article can be named on which we should be able to raise the smallest sum without causing genuine distress among the class affected by the impost. So thoroughly have we exhausted all sources of revenue that in the opinion of the wisest statesmen retrenchment in nearly every branch of the public service has become absolutely necessary. Englishmen who have studied the condition of India do not deceive themselves respecting the feeling which this severe pressure has excited. The natives cannot but respect their energetic rulers, but they do not like us, and many of them have a vague and mistaken hope that if our yoke were thrown off they would find life much more tolerable. To add largely to their burdens would, in these circumstances, be not only unfair, but in the last degree foolish. We should be warding off an external danger, only to run the risk of creating a far more serious internal peril. Of course the nation would grumble a good deal at the size of the bill; but it is too sensible to suppose that it can maintain an Imperial position without sacrifices. And, after all, the increased taxation would not, probably, cause a solitary taxpayer to cut off a single glass of spirits or one pipe of tobacco from his daily supply of these luxuries.

A Sunday Art Exhibition.——Is there no via media between the typical British Sunday as it now exists—undeniably a day of dulness and weariness to many, especially among the poor of large cities—and the Parisian Sunday, with its open shops, crowded theatres, and restless work-a-day toil? The Sunday Society thinks that there is such a middle path to be found, and that the severity of our Sunday might be profitably relaxed, without danger of our running into the anti-Sabbatarian excesses of the French capital—excesses, be it remembered, in a large measure due to the virtual proscription of Christianity which obtained for several years after the the establishment of the First Republic. The Sunday Society can scarcely be regarded as a very revolutionary body, seeing that it numbers among its Vice-Presidents the Dean of Westminster, and several other well-known clergymen of the Church of England. The aim and object of the Society is to obtain official sanction for the opening of Museums, Art Galleries, Libraries, and Gardens on Sundays; and as an experiment in this direction they intend to open to-morrow, at 33, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars, a very charming collection of water-colour drawings (chiefly of Swiss scenery), lent them by an artist for this purpose. We will not here enter into any discussion of the Sunday Question, which is, we admit, fraught with difficulties, except to remark that there is something illogical in a system which rigorously closes picture galleries—places of confessedly innocent recreation—upon the only day when a working man can conveniently visit them; and yet at the same time throws open thousands of alcohol-shops where—often through sheer dulness and ennui—he fuddles away his senses. The man who visits a picture gallery on a Sunday is far more likely also to go to a church or a chapel than he who spends his Sunday afternoons boozing in public-houses.

Missionary Training.——The inaugural addresses at the opening of the medical schools were nearly all of genuine interest this year; but we should be inclined to give the palm to that of Miss Edith Pechey, who delivered the introductory lecture at the London School of Medicine for Women in Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square. It was calm and scientific in tone, and at the same time thoroughly practical. No part of her lecture was more interesting than that which she addressed to medical missionary students. She expressed a hope that, "although Christian England was renowned in every land for her adulterated goods, it would not be said that the medical missionary was also an inferior article;" and Mrs. Garrett-Anderson enforced Miss Pechey's remarks on this subject by pointing out the need of medical missionaries for unusually good training, inasmuch as they must labour among people with different habits of life from their own, and speaking a different language. All this is perfectly true, but it is to be hoped that missionary societies will not suppose, because medical missionaries ought to be specially well equipped, that ordinary missionaries should receive no sort of medical education whatever. Some knowledge of the structure and functions of the organs of the body, and some skill in applying remedies for common diseases, would be of the greatest service to missionaries; and missionary students and the ladies who are to be their wives might do worse than attend for a session or two the lectures of some such teacher as Miss Pechey. It would, we believe, be a very good thing if men intending to be missionaries, especially if they are destined to live among savages, would also acquire considerable acquaintance with useful crafts. A missionary who can plan a house, construct something that will pass for a bridge, give hints as to the making of shoes, and cure a cold or a fever, is likely to do infinitely more good than the man who can only distinguish himself by preaching eloquent sermons.

Indian Factory Legislation.——Experience in this country has clearly proved that in the matter of factory labour—indeed, we may say of all labour—neither employers nor parents can be safely permitted to have unlimited control over the children committed to their charge. They may not begin by being intentionally brutal, but the greed for money overcomes other considerations, and the end is that the children are invariably overworked. Overwork, too, always produces harsh treatment, because the poor little tired creatures have to be driven to their labour like slaves. Forty years ago Parliament listened to much horrifying evidence bearing on this subject, and the result was the various Acts since passed for restricting the hours of female and juvenile labour. Now we want to see like protection afforded to the children of India. Cotton factories have lately been established there, and, as there is no protective legislation, the same abuses flourish as flourished here before the days of Richard Oastler. Attempts have been made to deny these abuses, but in such a case we think the eye-witness of Mr. Arthur Arnold outweighs in value the statements of various gentlemen in Bombay, all pecuniarily interested in the cotton mills there. And, be it remembered, three circumstances tend to aggravate the suffering of overworked children in India. They are more submissive than our children, and, therefore, more likely to bear ill-usage uncomplainingly. Factory work is far more trying in the climate of Bombay than in that of Lancashire. Lastly, there is no Sunday for these poor little heathens. It is the solemn duty of the Government of India to put a stop to these enormities, which tend to render the British raj a curse rather than a blessing, and they must not make their squabble with Shere Ali an excuse for neglecting that duty.

Sea-Captains and their Wives.——Few skippers probably in real life are as desirous of the comfort of their hands as the immortal Captain Reece, "commanding of the Mantelpiece," who not only gave his daughters in marriage to his crew, but self-denyingly united himself to the elderly lady who did his washing. But a captain whose wife sails with him does to some extent approximate to this ideal, because, if she is at all a nice woman—and we imagine the skipper would easily find an excuse for leaving her on shore if she were not—she can scarcely help exercising a softening influence on the sailors. We quite agree with Mr. Raffles, the Liverpool magistrate, that there are emergencies where the presence of a wife may act as a clog on the captain's energies, but this argument, if logically carried out, would result in the absurdity of all women being forbidden to go to sea, and the case cited by Mr. Raffles of the captain's wife being transferred from a leaky vessel to a steamer would apply as forcibly to a female passenger as to a wife. With regard to the effect of a female companion on the captain himself, no one but those who have sailed on board passengerless merchant vessels knows how lonely a life the captain usually leads. He is an absolute monarch—and by reason of this absolute monarchy he usually has little intercourse, otherwise than official, with his officers and crew, or his authority would run risk of collapse. To such a man a pleasant lively wife must be a real godsend, and we verily believe that if there were more captains' wives aboard merchant ships there would be fewer captains who ruin their prospects, and sometimes wreck their ships, through devotion to the grog-bottle. One of the steadiest and most capable captains we ever knew carried both wife and children on every voyage.

Volunteers' Ball Practice.——England is such a small country, and so thickly-peopled, and, on the other hand, modern guns carry so far, that it is not easy to find places where Volunteers may practise at the butts with perfect safety to the general public. The other day a young lady on Brighton Downs had her horse shot dead under her, and it was only through what is ordinarily termed chance that she was not herself the victim. Another Volunteer incident which might have been of a far more tragical character is reported from Lincolnshire. Ten thousand people had assembled to see a sham fight, when the Louth men, who were about to load, discovered that they had been served with ball cartridge! Not long since an Oxford undergraduate was shot dead in a railway carriage by the accidental explosion of a Volunteer's rifle in an adjoining compartment; so that altogether, bearing these facts in mind, we beg our gallant friends to be more careful, otherwise we shall begin to think that the time-honoured motto of the old Volunteers of Bonaparte's time, "Defence, not Defiance," is scarcely applicable to their modern representatives.

SKETCHES FROM SOUTH AFRICA

THE WATER CART

"One of the greatest hardships of campaigning in South Africa," writes our artist, "is the thirst created by the intense heat and dryness of the air, often aggravated by the clouds of sand raised by the tramp of many feet and the difficulty of obtaining water. The drought, also, has made this latter evil even greater than is usual during the periodical dry season, and many stories are told by those who have taken part in the recent Kaffir campaign of the suffering of the troops, both volunteers and regulars, while moving over ground where the various watering-places are situated at long distances from each other. Thus all who see the accompanying sketch will readily understand the eagerness with which our brave fellows make for the water cart on its arrival."

BOWKER'S ROVERS

"Bowker's Rovers were the first body of volunteers which went to the front at the outbreak of the hostilities with the Kaffirs, and were composed for the most part of young men of education and position in King William's Town. They were enrolled one night at the Town Hall immediately on receipt of the news that Ibeka was threatened by a large body of Kaffirs, and cantered out of the city less than twelve hours afterwards. Each man had to make a hurried search for a rifle, horse, and saddle, and the other necessary field-equipments, so that uniformity was, of course, out of the question. Consequently the Rovers suffered considerable hardships in the field, as they possessed no tents, were frequently unable to procure forage for their horses or food for themselves, constantly rode for many miles under a blazing sun, when man and horse were tired, in order to reach a watering-place, while at nights they were half frozen with lying out in the open. My sketch represents a halt of a detachment of these brave fellows by a drift close to the Perie Bush."

CANADA—THE VICEREGAL "TOBOGGANING" PARTY

So much has been written of late years concerning British North America, that most home-staying Englishmen are aware by this time that the Canadian winter, far from being a period of isolation and desolation, is the chief season of the year for amusement and conviviality. During the brief but scorching summer, the people are too busy with farm work, and all the other industries dependent thereon, to think of pleasuring, and, in the short intervals (they can scarcely be called spring and autumn) which lie between summer and winter, locomotion is often rendered difficult by the muddy state of the roads. But, as soon as winter sets fairly in, frost and snow improvise, as it were, new roads of their own, admirably adapted for the smooth-gliding sleigh, whose merry bells re-echo through the land. The severe frost, too, though it nips off noses and ears if they are not carefully protected, is the cause of many enjoyable pastimes. Skating and curling, for instance, can be had in a perfection unknown in this land of drizzle and mist, and tobogganing, which in Europe is scarcely practised except in Russia, is a favourite winter sport. It is pronounced to be the most fascinating of Canadian winter amusements. Our engraving is from a photograph taken at Rideau Hall, Ottawa, the residence of the Governor-General. In the foreground we see the toboggan of their Excellencies, Lord and Lady Dufferin, closely pursued by the rest of the viceregal party. The expression of the faces suggests enjoyment, no matter who wins; while the whirling snow and the wild speed at which they are descending proclaim the sport to be a most enjoyable one.—We are indebted to Mr. F. L. Jones, of the department of Militia and Defence, Ottawa, for sending us this and two other photographs which, perhaps, we may engrave hereafter. They all represent Canadian winter scenes, and are by W. J. Topley, who deserves especial credit for the cleverness with which he has managed the grouping of the figures.

THE AUSTRIAN OCCUPATION OF BOSNIA—STREET FIGHTING IN SERAJEVO

One of the most important events of the present Austrian campaign in Bosnia was the capture of Serajevo on August 19. A desperate resistance had been expected, as Hadji Loja, the fanatical leader of the insurgents, was known to be there in command. However, in the early morning Marshal Tegethoff, aided by a thick fog, was enabled to place several siege guns in position, and opened fire upon the Castle, and, being subsequently joined by General Kaiffel, succeeded in silencing the enemy's fire. The troops then advanced upon the town; and to quote the Austrian official report: "Fighting of a most horrible kind ensued. Our troops were fired upon from every house, doorway, and window. Even women and the sick and wounded insurgents in the Military Hospital took part in the fighting, which lasted until 1·30 P.M. Incredible scenes of the wildest fanaticism were enacted, and it was only owing to the good behaviour and discipline of our troops that the town was not more seriously plundered than was the case. Nevertheless a few houses were plundered and set on fire. Our losses unfortunately were not inconsiderable." The town, however, was ultimately occupied and order restored; and in the evening the Imperial flag was hoisted over the Castle, and saluted with 101 guns amid the singing of the National Anthem by the soldiers; the Christian inhabitants joining the troops in their acclamations.

Note.——The late Mr. Cooper, British Political Resident at Bhamo.—In our last week's issue we omitted to call attention to the fact that in our engraving Mr. Cooper is represented in Tibetan costume, a disguise which he assumed during one of his famous journeys. At the time of his assassination he was of course wearing European costume.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The Afghan difficulty is now the main topic at every political meeting. On Tuesday Sir Wilfrid Lawson, speaking at Alston, in Cumberland, said that if Lord Lytton sent the Cabul Mission without knowing whether the Ameer was ready to receive it, it was the most foolish and reckless act which any British statesman had ever done, and if that was the case, and the Cabinet did not recall him, they valued as lightly as a feather the integrity of the Indian Empire. According to some people there was no legitimate time for the discussion of foreign politics. While negotiations were pending they held that nothing should be said to interfere with them; if war was decided on, we must remain silent, lest we should mar the military operations; and when a war was finished, they said it was no use to say anything, as it was all over. He, however, did not intend to be hushed up, and he was afraid he would be called the naughty child of the Liberal party, who insisted on crying when others wanted to sleep. He should like to take the editor of The Times and set him down in front of one of the hottest Bosnian batteries, and say, "There, old boy, is that peace with honour?"—Mr. Adam, M.P., speaking to his constituents at Alloa, said that the Afghan business was the most serious conjunction that had come about for Great Britain for many years, and that they were in a position to receive an insult from the Ameer of Cabul was due to the dangerous policy pursued by her Majesty's Government. They had provoked Russia by that foolish Anglo-Turkish Convention to make the move she had done, as it was not to be expected that she would have done so voluntarily, after being exhausted by a long and difficult war.—The Birmingham Liberals have adopted a resolution condemning the action of Lord Lytton with regard to the Ameer as "rash, aggressive, and untimely, and likely to lead to an inglorious war."—The Fenian Press of Ireland is in ecstacies at the prospect of England getting a severe drubbing at the hands of the Ameer. One paper predicts with satisfaction "a whirlwind or consequent revolt in Hindostan." The Nation, under the heading, "The Brave Ameer," exclaims, "Long life, good health, success, prosperity, and happiness to Shere Ali! May his councils be wise and his plans perfect, his arm mighty, and his sword keen." The Flag newspaper finds in the event another of Ireland's opportunities, but does not say in what way

LIFE IN CANADA—THE EARL AND COUNTESS OF DUFFERIN AT A "TOBOGGANING" PARTY AT OTTAWA it will be taken advantage of. The Weekly News rejoices that the Afghans will not be conquered by the ditties of London drinking dens, and the Irishman predicts that "Field-Marshal Winter," if the troops go into action, will bring about the crisis of England's destiny. Another print says: "If Shere Ali should triumph, and, marching down, take Calcutta, and thence, setting sail, reach and subdue London; and, finally, crossing the Channel, occupy Ireland, the best portion of our race would be in high feather. Then, indeed, our day of freedom might dawn." The Evening Mail dubs these writers "Dublin Afghans," and say that the National game was getting so stupid and unexciting that another month would have seen the community demoralised into loyalty and sense."—Mr. Gladstone has gone on a pleasure trip to the Isle of Man. His latest literary effort is a letter expatiating on the utility of "egg-flip" to people who delight in making long speeches.—The Home Rulers intend to be active during the autumn. They are to have a series of demonstrations in the large English and Scotch towns, and Mr. Parnell, M.P., has consented to address at least twenty of the gatherings to be held in twenty different places.—Mr. O'Donnell, M.P., has been discoursing to the Southwark Radical Club on Home Rule. He said that the Irish were as proud, as independent, as desirous of retaining their own nationality, as the English themselves, and all endeavours to compel them to merge in another nationality would continue to be productive of nothing but dissension and disunion.—The City Liberal Club has started a fund for raising a memorial to the late Earl Russell.—The Tichbornites are preparing for the next general election. The Release Associations are to be amalgamated, and a "Tichborne Candidate" is to be run in every constituency in the kingdom.—On Monday at Southampton Dr. Kenealy addressed a meeting, which we are told was "not altogether disorderly." Mrs. Kenealy and young "Sir Roger" were on the platform, and Dr. Kenealy spoke for nearly an hour. There were, he said, only two independent members in the House at the present moment—the hon. member for Sheffield and himself. Every member of Parliament who did not seek to free Sir Roger from his dungeon was morally as guilty as the judges and the jury who convicted.—Mr. J. B. Gough, addressing a meeting at Gloucester on Tuesday, begged the people of Great Britain to beware of universal suffrage. It worked awfully in America. In the cities the vilest and the lowest were ruling. What did they think of a prize-fighter, a black-leg, being sent into Congress to represent one of the most intelligent districts of New York?

Opening of the Medical Schools.——On Tuesday addresses were delivered at most of the London hospitals. At University College Professor Ray Lankester, speaking on the "Relations between Universities and Medicine," complained that while in Germany 300,000*l.* a year was devoted to the support of professors of the sciences connected with the medical faculty, neither of the English Universities did anything for medicine. The destruction of the medical faculty in Oxford was due to the iniquitous legislation of the Restoration, which assigned the domination of our Universities to the clergy. The Commissioners now sitting had refused to restore it, or to interfere with these abuses; but he hoped that a medical faculty would yet be established there. In London there was an old endowment for medicine (the Gresham Professorship), which had been fraudulently disposed of more than one hundred years ago; but he hoped that it was not, even now, too late to have the money restored. At St. Thomas's Mr. Nettleship spoke on the advantages and disadvantages of specialism, recommending his hearers to avoid the study of any speciality until they had become well grounded in broad views, and well supplied with general experience. At Charing Cross Dr. Irvine spoke much in the same strain, remarking that the steady-working student would soon see the inter-dependence of the various branches of the science. At Middlesex Dr. A. W. Edis said that the time was rapidly approaching when doctors, who were once looked upon only as professors of the art of healing, would be regarded peculiarly as agents for the preservation of health and for the prevention of disease. At King's College Professor Garrod dealt with the "zoological aspect" of the subject, and the evolution of the profession, the survival of the fittest to practice. He had never been able to find any indication of the medical power amongst the lower animals. Sketching the history of the medical art, he remarked that it would be no great misfortune if all the works from Hippocrates to Harvey had been entirely lost. The chief epoch-making events of medical history were Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood, that of vaccination by Jenner, the introduction of chloroform by Sir James Simpson, and the adoption of the antiseptic method by his friend and colleague, Professor Lister. At Westminster Mr. Macnamara urged strongly upon the members of the profession the advisability of forming medical colleges, and said it was a man's own fault if he did not succeed in the medical profession. At St. Mary's Dr. Farquharson said that ward work was necessary to acquisition of thorough professional knowledge, and it was a defect in the London system that no facilities existed for seeing patients at their own houses, which would be the best preparation for private practice. He considered that some portion of the revenue of every solvent hospital should be devoted to the payment of the medical staff, who were really the mainstay of the institution. But if this was not practicable, the real workers of the place should at least obtain the compliment of an honorary seat at the Board of Governors. At St. George's Dr. Whipham, while admitting that if specialism was tolerable in any profession it was so in medicine, which embraced so many collateral sciences, expressed a fear that its further extension would result in evil both to practitioners and the public. At the London School of Medicine for Women, Dr. Edith Pechey, of Leeds, was the lecturer. After remarking that the students whom she addressed did not need grave warnings against the attractions of beer and billiards, she dwelt impressively on the importance of acquiring a thorough knowledge of anatomy, and appealed to the ladies studying for duty as medical missionaries—medical mission students—to regard it as a point of honour that they should carry with them to their future field of Christian labour the best possible credentials as to their medical acquirements, and with this end in view she would urge them most earnestly to work for the degree of the London University.

Miscellaneous.——The expected overflow of the Thames on Saturday did not take place, high-water at London Bridge being fully three feet below the inundating line, and therefore the preparations which had been made all along the southern shore of the river to keep out the water were happily unneeded. The absence of heavy rains and the favourable direction of the wind seems to have caused the failure of the hydrographers' predictions. On the east coast, from Shields to Margate, the tides were remarkably low, but on the southern coast they ran high, especially at Falmouth and Hastings.—The Princess Alice inquest is still going on, the evidence being mainly technical, and in some measure contradictory. The Board of Works are instituting inquiries into the alleged poisonous character of the water in Galleon's Reach.—Pumping is still going on at the Abercarne colliery. On Tuesday the depth of water in the pit was reduced by thirteen inches.—Waterloo Bridge is to be opened toll free this day (Saturday).—A free Reading Room has been opened at the South London Working Men's College.—Two marine collisions are reported. Off Hastings on Friday a screw collier ran into a sailing vessel, which foundered in a few minutes, two of the crew being drowned. On Sunday, during a thick fog, a passenger steamer fouled a screw steamer lying at anchor, and was so damaged that the captain ran her on the Nore Sand. Passengers and crew were all saved.—The first Annual Conference of the Library Association was opened at Oxford on Tuesday under the presidency of the Rev. H. O. Coxe, of the Bodleian Library, who in his address alluded to the scheme for the construction of "The Universal Catalogue," and said that it presented immense difficulties through which no man could see his way. Referring to the Copyright Act he protested, on the score of public utility, and on behalf of the literary world generally, against the taking away of the privilege now granted to the four Universities. It was not enough to give one copy to the British Museum, for there were such things as fire and thieves. Papers were read on a variety of subjects, and in the evening the Bodleian Librarian received the members of the Conference in the Hall of Worcester College.—General Sir T. Biddulph, K.C.B., Keeper of Her Majesty's Privy Purse, died last Saturday at Abergeldie from an attack of bronchitis. We shall shortly publish his portrait, and reserve his biography until then.—The verdict of the coroner's jury in reference to the recent accident on the Dublin and Macroom Railway has created a profound sensation in the neighbourhood. They find that the accident occurred through the culpable negligence of the directors, the traffic manager, and the working ganger, who was declared least culpable. The inquest was adjourned to give the directors an opportunity of attending and entering into bail for their appearance.—Much excitement has been created in commercial circles by the suspension of the City of Glasgow Bank.—The Echo, which has recently been discussing the high price of bread, and complaining of the trade combination amongst the bakers, has received the following laconic epistle:—"If you go to Drury Lane, among your own class, you can have it at 4½d. Get some of that down your throat, and make your will, and Lord have mercy upon your soul!"

THEATRES

Mr. Chatterton has reopened Drury Lane Theatre with a play of Shakespeare which no other manager has ventured to put upon the stage during the last twenty years, and this circumstance has, we observe, been treated in some quarters as an example of inconsistency on the part of the gentleman who—as we are not permitted to forget—publicly declared a few years ago that Shakespeare and bankruptcy were almost convertible terms. If we mistake not, however, Mr. Chatterton has already given token of a reviving faith in the poetical drama—at least when accompanied by the pageantry and the scenic embellishments of which it is customary at Drury Lane to make especial features. But the truth is that, in giving utterance to the dictum which has brought upon him so much satirical comment, he did not express any abstract opinion, but simply referred to his own experience in the past, fortifying his view with certain figures which he was good enough to confide to the public ear. That he had not found Shakespeare profitable was a fact on which he could hardly be mistaken. If he is now inclined to think that poetry may be combined with profits, it seems somewhat ungenerous to twit him with a lack of faith in the poet which no one has yet shown to have been unfounded; and it is to be presumed that, if the result of his production of The Winter's Tale should be directly the reverse of his Shakespearian experiences in the past, no one will rejoice more than Mr. Chatterton himself. Care at least has been bestowed upon the scenery and accessories of the revival; and, if this beautiful play should fail to awaken enthusiasm among playgoers, the fault will be rather that of the actors than of the stage management. It is true that the duties of an ideally perfect manager would include, not only the selection of a company efficient in all respects for the objects in view, but an active supervision over the rehearsals, guided by a fine literary taste, and a profound acquaintance with the histrionic art. Such managers, however, are not, in the present state of our stage, to be expected; and some indulgence is due on the score of the dispersion of our leading performers, owing to the great competition for their services. That the performance of The Winter's Tale is not quite satisfactory must be confessed. Miss Wallis is certainly not equal to the task of representing Hermione—a famous part of Mrs. Siddons; and Mr. Charles Dillon, though in many respects an admirable actor, does not achieve more than a respectable performance in the character of the jealous king. The pastoral scenes, in which Miss Fowler enacts the part of Perdita to the Florizel of Mr. Edward Compton, were, however, less effective than the scenes of what may be called the prologue to the story; and surely it is a mistake to associate the gentle beauty of this portion of the play with so riotous a dance of shepherds and shepherdesses as the ballet master of the theatre has been permitted here to introduce. Mr. Cowper's Old Shepherd and Mr. Calhaem's Clown deserve praise for humorous characterisation. Mr. Atkins as Autolycus caused much laughter, but the circumstance was rather due to his distinct enunciation of the humorous speeches assigned to that typical rogue of country fairs than to any art in his performance. Mrs. Vezin's impersonation of Paulina, on the other hand, gave delight by its sincerity and just delivery of the words. Altogether, the play was well received, as was an operetta by Lecocq, entitled Angela, or a Woman's Wit, which occupies the first place in the programme.

Land Ahead, a new drama by Mr. Manville Fenn, brought out at Astley's Theatre on Monday last, is a version of a Christmas story by the same writer. Irish rural life and manners furnish the theme of the play, which is very liberally furnished with exciting incidents, and omits no one of the recognised elements of the Boucicaultian drama. Mr. Fenn's dialogue is lively, and his scenes are managed with a good deal of skill. The play is in itself, however, somewhat diffuse, and this objection is the more strongly felt owing to the fancy of the management for loading the action with dances, songs, and other ornamental features. The piece is fairly acted by Miss Virginia Blackwood and her company, and its first performance was witnessed by a large audience, who testified their approval in no qualified fashion.

Haymarket.——Mr. Byron's new comedy, entitled Conscience Money, has been withdrawn, at least for the present, and Mr. J. S. Clarke has reappeared here, this week, as Bob Acres in The Rivals, supported by a company which includes Miss Pateman, Miss Carlotta Addison, Mr. Charles Kelly, Mr. Howe, and other popular performers.

A new burlesque, by Mr. Herman Merivale, entitled The Lady of Lyons Married and Settled, will be performed, for the first time, at the Gaiety Theatre this morning. Miss Farren and Mr. Terry take part in the performance.—The Strand Theatre will reopen on Monday next.—At the Park Messrs. T. Swinbourne and H. Forrester, with a company which includes Miss Edith Lynd and Mr. Charles Harcourt, have this week been playing Othello and Richard III.

FROM PARIS TO CHARTRES

From Paris to Chartres by way of Port Royal and Rambouillet is a very interesting trip. Of course the cathedral, on the whole perhaps the finest in France, is the main object of the expedition; but there is much to see on the road, even in the way of scenery, for which that part of France is not usually supposed to be famous. Along the top of the downs the country is bare and dull enough, and the great plain of La Beauce, out of which Chartres rises, is richer in corn than in romantic views; but still the walk down from near La Verrière station to Port Royal is just like one of the wood-paths which lead from the top of Bathwick down to Claverton, i.e., it is as good as the best scenery round Bath; while the La Chevreuse valley is so unexpectedly beautiful that we wonder Parisians don't talk more about it. Of Port Royal it is enough to say that the favourite abode of Pascal and Racine and the Arnaulds and their sister the Mère Evangélique deserves to be a pilgrimage-place if it is ever worth while to turn aside and visit the homes of those whose thoughts have given humanity a dead lift. Very little of the monastery remains. The walls of the chapel are down, and its floor is a flower garden; but there is a museum of relics, including a number of pictures which vividly represent the atrocious way in which the Jesuits suppressed the place. Close to La Chevreuse, amid fine woodland scenery, stands the Duke of Luynes' château of Dampierre—well worth seeing, for it contains some of Ingrés' best pictures. It is hard to say why this lovely bit of country should have remained what Murray calls it five and twenty years ago "one of the least visited, as it is one of the prettiest, spots near Paris."

At Rambouillet the house, a vast mass of brick, is as ugly as it can be, and the forest has been woefully cut down—most of the big oaks gone, and in parts little left but young birch. If our Indian Forest Service men go to Rambouillet for their year's apprenticeship, I tremble for what remains of that Wynaad the wholesale destruction of which for coffee-planting had something at least to do with the Madras famine.

Maintenon, given by Louis XIV. with the title thereunto pertaining, to Scarron's widow, the clever and beautiful creole, Françoise d'Aubigné, when he made up his royal mind to marry her, calls up even more memories than Rambouillet. The ruins of its aqueduct make one reflect how Versailles and its addenda caused the old French revolution in the same sense in which "Tenterden steeple caused the Goodwin Sands." Louis XIV. was as reckless of life as he was lavish of money. He found that he had built his grand palace in a waterless desert, and so he was fain to try to bring a river more than thirty miles to feed his fountains and cascades and spouting sprawling tritons. Forty thousand soldiers were employed on the work, which proved so unhealthy that they died like rotten sheep, and it must have been a boon when the war of 1688 called them away. The aqueduct was never finished; the waterworks at Marly were set up to supply Versailles.

Chartres is as well seen from a distance as Peterborough, almost as Lincoln or Durham. You must spend a good deal of time there; or else, between the grandeur of the proportions inside, the richness and variety of the stained glass, the elaborate carving of the screen ("point lace in stone") which shuts in the whole choir, and the magnificent portails, three on the west front, and three on each of the two transepts, you will carry away only a confused idea of the whole. We went up one of the spires, after walking round outside and getting a general notion of the interior. By climbing up you get a better idea not only of the building as a whole but of the wonderful perfection of the details than you could in any other way. Some of the carving inside the tower stands out four or five inches from the walls, and the leaves and animals which run up the sides of the windows are lifelike. "At the bottom of these long strings of carving," says my journal, "are stone monsters and demons of all kinds." Inside, besides the screen which stretches from pillar to pillar all round the choir, like the lists which shut in the "spiritual tourney," and every compartment of which gives some scene in the life of Our Lord or of the Virgin, the guide-books call attention to three huge rose-windows, to me more curious than beautiful. But, despite the elaborate carving everywhere, the chief glory of the place is the glass, so different in colour from most modern attempts; the designs so simple, the colours so beautifully harmonised. Most of the stained windows were given by guilds, representations of whose trades fill up most of the lower lights. Underground there is almost as much interest as above. The crypt, which runs under the whole circuit of the choir-aisles, is like a ring of chapels opening into one another. On the walls are frescoes, a few in Byzantine, most in very early French style, dimly seen by the lamp which burns on every altar. The whole is dedicated to Notre Dame sous Terre, and is a grand series of what we may call ecclesiastical phantasmagoria—what Victor Hugo in his last book, "Le Pape," means when he says:

> Nous étalons avec des effets de lumière

In fact, a wooden image, the Black Virgin of Chartres, is the central point of attraction in this gorgeously-decked and mysteriously-lighted crypt. It is that image to which the Cathedral owes much of its splendour, for Chartres was the chief, and perhaps the earliest, seat of mariolatry in France, and when the Cathedral was a-building, not only did a vast company of volunteers come from other towns and encamp outside that they might take part in the work, but foreign princes sent large gifts, and for centuries a constant stream of pilgrims paid for keeping up the splendid work in which Bishop Fulbert and his successors had been enabled to indulge.

Chartres, we know, takes its name from the Carnutes, the central tribe of Gaul. The Romans called it Autricum, but except Lyons and Orleans (Aurelianum) almost all important French towns have gone back for their modern name to the name of the Gallic tribe which dwelt round them, and have given up their Roman designation. So Paris is named from the Parisii, not from Lutetia; Tours, not from Cæsarodunum, but from the Thrones; Bourges, not from Avaricum, but from the Bituriges. The land of the Carnutes Cæsar speaks of as the head-quarters of Druidism. Here the Arch-Druid held his court, and once a year his brethren from all quarters met to take counsel with him. These Druids, some time before Christ came, discovered in the very centre of their sacred grove, where now the high altar of the crypt stands, a female figure carved in oak, bearing an inscription which, translated into Latin, ran Virgini pariturae—"to the Virgin pre-destined to bear a child." This image they (though in general no image-worshippers) installed with great reverence in their most sacred place, and taught not all the people, but the initiated, to look forward to a virgin-born Saviour. Unfortunately, Cæsar says not a word about this; but nevertheless, the oakwood image, black with age, was held in growing honour as time went on, until, in 1793, a mob of Gauls who cared neither for Druid nor for pontiff, burst in and burnt it. The present image is supposed to be a fac-simile, and is warranted to pilgrims to be as efficacious as the original.

One might well spend a few days at Chartres, where there are two other notable churches, one with glass rivalling that of the Cathedral. See the town on a market day; the contrast is amusing between its normal quiet, deeper than that of Lichfield or Coutances, and the bustle of innumerable blue blouses, all carrying about samples of wheat, like so many ants; they looked no bigger, we thought, and just as mazy in their movements, as we watched them from the Cathedral spire.

From Chartres we went on to Tours, but as our title is "From Paris to Chartres," I'll drop you at the city of the image that came down from heaven. Let me, however, give one word of advice about travelling in Central France—choose the early summer or late spring, if you can. Go to Touraine, for instance, before the yellow tulip and the starch hyacinth have quite disappeared from the vineyards. Touraine is hot even in May, in April it is lovely—lilacs and Judas-trees and Westerias, all in full bloom, more forward than they are a month later in Paris. Of course I advise this to pedestrians, and to pedestrians of the feebler sort, to whom a day's march in the heat is no joke. Muscular Christians who are unaffected by "skyey influences," and folks who mean to do it all in train and carriage, may go later. To the feebler pedestrian there is moreover a special charm in the woods in early spring; la bonne odeur des bois, as it is called in Erckmann-Châtrian, is stronger then, and the great French forests (those of Touraine have sweet little rich valleys winding through them) are a new sensation to the Britisher, who thinks a few miles of woodland country something to be taken note of.

AFTER THE HOLIDAYS

Already we see signs of the "beginning of the end"—the evenings are drawing in, and with them come that inevitable accompaniment of British autumn—the mist. Lounging in airy costumes under the shade of big trees, lazy strolls by the river side, after-dinner cigars under verandahs or in garden seats, are already things of the past; the morning air is crisp, we no longer shun the sunny side of the road for the shady; there is a very perceptible difference in the temperature of the matutinal tub; sealskins are to be noted out of doors, and through more than one window have we seen the gleam of a fire within doors.

Most of our brethren, our fellow-toilers in the great London hive, are straggling back from their "outings." Every other man we meet bears indisputable evidence in the shape of a bronzed face and a cheery heartiness of manner of having been away, and as we catch the fag ends and odd bits of conversation in the street, how often may we note the recurrence of the questions, "Where have you been?" or, "How have you enjoyed yourself?" or their respective answers. And very pleasant it is to find out that John Bull, notwithstanding the scarcity of cash and the badness of times, has yet been able to put a little by for the enjoyment of a few weeks' fresh air and relaxation. We are not speaking of the moneyed owners of broad acres, or the lords of unlimited leisure—those of the bronzed face and hearty manner are of our own kith and kin—men whose year is made up of eleven months of toil and one of holiday, men who cannot look a gift horse in the mouth, and who in the possession of leisure are determined to make the most of it.

And as a rule we do make the most of it, although our differently constituted minds may not agree in the manner how, and as a rule the result of making the most of it is satisfactory. To the active-minded, strong-limbed man, the month's dawdle at a fashionable watering place is a criminal waste of precious hours; to the dawdler the violent exertions of the stalwart one—his tremendous walks, his perilous climbs, his rough adventures, appear so much abuse of time which should be devoted to rest, and of energy which requires relaxation. The Continental scamperer—the man who flies from country to country, from town to town, and from village, as if his success in life depended upon the quantity of places to be seen in the smallest given time—utterly despises the man who, jaded and fagged with the incessant brain work of the past year, seeks a refuge in some retired village, surrounded by nothing but the grandeur and beauty of solitary nature. So does the yacht owner look down upon the man who prefers a gentle ramble through quaint towns to the boisterous excitement of ocean life. So does the Norway or North America sportsman upon the humble pedestrian or bicyclist content with the beauties of our Old England. Be it as it may, unless we have really wasted and misused our time, unless we have seriously run beyond the original pecuniary tether, or have met with accident and misfortune, most of us return to toil with cheerfulness. At first we may feel a pang at exchanging the sweet smell of the moorland heather and the "champagne draughts" of ozone for the close musty atmosphere of our hives, but we have taken in our stock of health, we feel ready for any amount of work, and we console ourselves with the reflection that, if we did not breathe the close musty air of our hives for eleven months, the one month of sweet scents and pure breezes would be denied us.

The one mistake so many of us make is in attempting too much. If we try to strike an average amongst the hundreds of our fellow-countrymen that we meet in the oddest and most out-of-the-way nooks of Europe, of those who have but a reasonable acquaintance with their own land, how very small does it seem! And yet one has but to glance through the British Isle section of the "Picturesque Europe" series, and wonder that so little is known of it. Mrs. Grundy regards the man who has spent his holiday at the French Exhibition, or at Cockney show places in Switzerland, or in tourist-infested towns on the Rhine, as having done his duty better than the man who has been content with the cathedral towns of England, the lakes, the mountains of Wales, the wild grandeur of Scotland, or the beautiful solitudes of the sister isle.

Many of us, with the fear of Mrs. Grundy before us, at the outset get hold of the idea that we must stir ourselves and "do something." So we think, not of taking things easily, of forgetting that in everyday life we are toilers, but of cramming as much action and scamper as we can into our allotted time. With this object in view, we map out tremendous tours, and in the execution of our plans find ourselves in such a perpetual state of worry and confusion that the benefits which might be derived from a rational holiday do not make themselves felt. Could we be persuaded that by the judicious cutting away from our programme of a few railway, steamboat, and diligence journeys, we should be much the better, we should not be observed returning home with the too frequent sigh of relief.

Not the least pleasant part of the holiday is the retrospect, and dull November evenings find many of us, not only dilating pleasantly on days when there was sunshine in the land, and we were free unfettered members of society, holiday-bound, but planning excursions for the next holiday, and enjoying it "After the Holidays."

TWIN SONNETS FROM THE PYRENEES

THE MOUNTAIN

'Tis morn, but on the misty mountain's brow
  The rising sun no golden ray can shed;
  Darkness and cold are lowering o'er his head:
  E'en thus, in early life, hearts that are led
Too soon by towering hopes and visions fine,
  With mists of doubt and thought long cumberèd,
See all the humbler spirits smile and shine.
Struggle, brave heart! and as thy day wears on
  The brightest of the glow shall still be thine.
When from the lowly valleys it hath gone,
  Around thy brows alone it shall incline:
Thy force of thought shall fling thy mists away,
And shining Heaven concede its crowning ray!

THE CLOUD

Soon as the cloud escapes the mountain's brow,
  Swift it regains its pristine sphere on high;
Free from earth's bonds, it rides in summer's glow,
  Sails on the breeze, rejoicing in the sky.
  Such have appeared to me the minds that lie,
Cold and encumbered with established dread
  Of merely counterfeit authority,
That holds them long subdued and chained and dead.
These, when the pouring warmth of Reason's ray
  Dissolves their bonds at last, and they expand,
Then they arouse, and tear themselves away,
  Scorning the sterile tyrants of the land,
Aid and delight mankind, as clouds that rise
Water the valleys and adorn the skies.

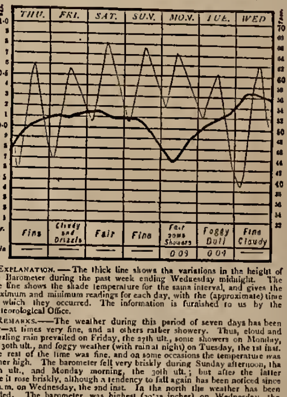
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

September 26th to October 2nd (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.—The weather during this period of seven days has been fair—at times very fine, and at others rather showery. Thus, cloud and drizzling rain prevailed on Friday, the 27th ult., some showers on Monday, the 30th ult., and foggy weather (with rain at night) on Tuesday, the 1st inst. The rest of the time was fine, and on some occasions the temperature was rather high. The barometer fell very briskly during Sunday afternoon, the 29th ult., and Monday morning, the 30th ult.; but after the latter time it rose briskly, although a tendency to fall again has been noticed since 11 a.m. on Wednesday, the 2nd inst. In the north the weather has been settled. The barometer was highest (30·32 inches) on Wednesday, the 2nd inst.; lowest (29·67 inches) on Monday, the 30th ult.: range, 0·65 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (64°) on Saturday, the 28th ult.; lowest (38°) on Wednesday, the 2nd inst.; range, 26°. Rainfall: Total fall, 0·13 inches, on two days; greatest fall, 0·09 inches, on Monday, the 30th ult. The weather on Thursday morning, the 3rd inst., was very fine and mild, with a light south-westerly breeze and falling barometer.

The Shakespeare Memorial Buildings at Stratford-upon-Avon are being actively proceeded with, and the library and picture-gallery were begun last week.

The Sunday Society.—We have, in another part of the paper (under the heading of "Topics of the Week"), spoken of the objects of this Association; we need here, therefore, merely mention that a collection of water-colour drawings, chiefly of Swiss Life and Scenery, will be exhibited to-morrow (Oct. 6th), and on the two following Sundays, at 33, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars, from two to five p.m. The admission is free by tickets, which will only be issued to those applying by letter, and sending stamped and addressed envelopes to the Hon. Secretary, 19, Charing Cross. We have seen these drawings, which form a very meritorious and interesting collection. Among them will be found views of some of the most celebrated mountains, under varying conditions of light and shade, shower and sunshine. Two sketches of the famous Matterhorn peak, the first rosy with the dawn, the second purple with the shades of evening, deserve especial notice. There are, too, many charming little bits of valley scenery, and numerous figure subjects showing, among other interesting features, the fast-vanishing costumes of the Swiss peasantry. The catalogue is, in itself, well worth reading, forming, as it does, a condensed guide to Switzerland; and we sincerely hope that, after visiting this collection, some of the élite among our working men may be induced to take the advice proffered by the artist in his interesting preface, and, like their German brethren, save up money for a Swiss tour, a by no means impossible feat for a thrifty man, and one which will, in retrospect, afford him life-long pleasure.

Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" has been translated into Servian.

A Railway to Dartmoor is shortly to be constructed, and the first sod was turned near Bridestowe Station last week.

The Sorrowing Relatives of a Negro lately hung in Massachusetts for the murder of two old people resolved to turn a few honest pence by their violently-deceased friend. They exhibited his body after the execution at 6*d.* a head.

The first Austrian Official Newspaper has appeared in Bosnia. The journal is called the Bosnian and Herzegovinian News (Bosansko Ercegovacke Novine), and is printed in the Croatian language in Latin characters. The dual-headed Austrian eagle surmounts the title.

The Origin of the Parliamentary Custom of never mentioning names is easily discovered, declares the New York Christian Union, when gentlemen possess such curious appellations as those of two members of the Ohio Legislature—Mr. Teasongoon and Mr. Goodykoonts.

A Fresh Flying Machine has been invented by an Oregon electrician. The machine is egg-shaped, made of sheet-iron, measures 8 feet by 5 feet at its greatest diameter, and is to be propelled by electricity produced by a generator of 200 horse-power. The inventor declares that electricity will carry the traveller from New York to San Francisco in ten minutes.

A Dolphin has been caught off the coast of Elgin, according to the Live Stock Journal. Dolphins, while well known in the Mediterranean and also in the Arctic Seas, as the creatures often enter the mouth of the Siberian river Obi, are rarely seen on the British coast. The present specimen was 7 feet long, with a beak fully a foot in length, garnished with 280 teeth, and resembling a duck's bill, whence the French call dolphins "sea-geese."

The Gipsy Queen of the United States has lately been buried at Dayton, in Ohio, the headquarters of the American gipsies, representatives of every clan and tribe scattered over American territory being present at the funeral. Red was the predominant hue in the funereal trappings; each mourner wore a scarf of crimson, and the hearse was decked with red plumes. Queen Matilda and King Levi Stanley emigrated to the States in 1860.

The Falls of Niagara have been the subject of a speech made by Lord Dufferin, who has proposed to the Governor of New York that that State and Ontario should combine to make a public International Park at the Niagara Falls. The Governor, he said, received the proposal very favourably, and certainly it is well worth consideration, as it would do away with the system of private speculation to which the visitor to one of the grandest sights of the world is at present liable.

A Drink Map of Norwich has been published by the Norwich Auxiliary of the United Kingdom Alliance, by which a bird's-eye view of the full provision for the imbibing of intoxicating drinks is vividly represented by red dots thickly scattered over a plan of the city. By it we learn that in addition to grocers who sell wines and spirits, and wine merchants, Norwich can boast of 655 licensed houses, not a bad percentage for a population of (1871) 80,390.

Autograph Hunters, Mayfair tells us, now make as much use of Mr. Gladstone as they used to make of the Duke of Wellington. One of these gentlemen has been consulting the ex-Premier, this week, about the future representation of Bristol, and the right hon. gentleman's reply has been hawked about every public-house in the city, the happy possessor showing it, it is said, for a glass of beer! A similar use was made of Mr. Bright a few months ago; but Mr. Bright is more chary of his post-cards and note-paper than Mr. Gladstone, and is not to be drawn quite so easily.

London Mortality increased last week, and 1,355 deaths were registered against 1,259 during the previous seven days, showing an increase of 96. There were 2 deaths from small-pox (a decline of 2), 6 from measles (an increase of 4), 30 from scarlet fever (an increase of 6), 13 from diphtheria (an increase of 3), 53 from whooping-cough (an increase of 10), 27 from different forms of fever (a decline of 3), and 61 from diarrhœa (a decline of 19), being 26 below the average. There were 2,494 births registered against 2,491 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 52·2 deg., 2·7 deg. below the average in the corresponding week of the 60 years, 1814—73. The duration of registered sunshine was only 9·6 hours, the sun being 83·6 hours above the horizon.

A Socialist Almanack is largely circulated among the German Democrats, according to the Paris Figaro. In this calendar the usual Saints' Days and Festivals are replaced by notices of prominent heroes and enemies of the revolutionary cause. Thus April 3 is sacred to Gustave Flourens, "massacred by the servants of the Versailles executioner;" May 28 to Delescluze, "killed in the Paris Commune incorruptible character." January 21 commemorates Louis XVI., "executed for treason to his country—of weak and hypocritical disposition, yet ranked as a saint;" January 28, Charlemagne, "Prototype of the crowned brigand, who destroyed the last vestige of German liberty;" January 9, Louis Napoleon, "Incarnation of abjectness in power;" and February 8, Peter I., "surnamed the Great by the flatterers of princes—a brute and an Emperor." This almanack is specially intended for workmen, and 50,000 copies were distributed last year.

The Editor of Every Newspaper has a great mass of correspondence to attend to, and, apart from all legitimate communications, every subscriber who is aggrieved at the delay in the reception of his newspaper feels he has a perfect right to write to the "Editor" for redress, forgetting that that official does not perform every function connected with the production of the journal. At least so thinks the Calcutta Statesman, which publishes the following "Notice to Correspondents:"—"Many correspondents will, we know, be surprised to hear—(1) That the editor of this journal does not turn the crank and print the sheets; (2) does not keep the subscribers' registry book; (3) does not address the papers; (4) nor pack them; (5) nor stick the labels on them; (6) nor make the paste for sticking the labels on; (7) that he does not carry the sacks to the post-office; and (8) is not able to accompany each paper to its destination, to ensure its safe delivery. Strange as it may seem, this is nevertheless all true. Will correspondents make a note of it, and when they have anything to say under these heads, remember to address the publisher?"

OSNIA — STREET FIGHTING IN SERAJEVO

FOREIGN

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina is now fast being completed, and on the 27th ult. Zwornik was peacefully entered, the troops being received at the entrance of the town by a deputation of the inhabitants, while within the Turkish Kaimakan himself declared the submission of the city and fortress. On Saturday two other important places fell into the hands of the Austrians, although not in so peaceful a manner, the Duke of Wurtemburg announcing the capitulation of Livno after a heavy bombardment, while General Jovanovitch also occupied Klobuk, the last stronghold of the Herzegovinian insurgents. Thus the only place of importance at present held by the insurgents is the district of Novi Bazar, which the Austrians intend to leave for a spring campaign, as the bad weather has already set in, making the military roads almost impassable, rendering the transport service of the Austrian army exceedingly difficult, and raising considerable apprehension as to the means of procuring provisions for the army during the winter, and of keeping the communications open. Indeed, the prospects of the winter are by no means hopeful for the army of occupation, as the severities of the climate will tell severely upon the troops, while the insurgents will probably again take heart at the misfortunes of the invaders, who have every reason to dread the rigour of a winter campaign in so mountainous a country. As, however, the insurgents have been subdued for the present, and General Zach has practically closed every outlet from Novi Bazar, three divisions of the army of occupation are to be sent back to Austria. In the mean time there is considerable excitement in Hungary over the whole question, as the occupation has never been popular with the Magyars, who are greatly incensed at the expenditure of so much blood and money, and are warmly expressing their indignation with Count Andrassy and M. Tisza; while on Sunday, at an open-air meeting at Pesth, motions were passed declaring the occupation of Bosnia dangerous, that a convention ought to be concluded with Turkey, and the army recalled, and that the Government ought to be impeached. In the Cabinet also there has been dissension, owing to the Hungarian Minister of Finance, M. Szell, being unable to provide for the great outlay required by the military authorities, who, in consequence of the protracted nature of the occupation, have largely exceeded the voted 6,000,000*l*. M. Szell, who of late years has done much to diminish the deficit of the Hungarian Treasury, has resigned.

To turn to TURKEY proper and her capital, San Stefano being now completely evacuated by the Russians, the English fleet has left the Prince's Islands, and has gone to Artaki, a step for which the Sultan has thanked Sir A. H. Layard, to whom he subsequently sent Osman Pasha to express his regret that he had not paid a visit to the fleet before its departure, and to thank Admiral Hornby and the officers and men of the fleet for their conduct during their stay, and for their kind feelings both towards himself and towards Turkey. The Turkish troops are quietly re-occupying the territory which the Russians are vacating, and no disturbances either in Europe or in Asia have been reported from either side, both Russian and Turkish commanders taking the most stringent steps to prevent any outbreak during their several occupations. The Russians are anxious to effect a settlement with the Turks as to the various questions left open by the Treaty of Berlin, and a convention has been proposed fixing the indemnity at 300,000,000 roubles, with further sums of 10,000,000 roubles to Russian subjects whose interests have been injured, and of 20,000*l*. towards repairing the Sulina Channel of the Danube. In the ceded territories Mussulman inhabitants for three years are to have the option of selling their property and of emigrating to Turkey, and on their side the Porte promises a general amnesty to all Bulgarians, including those under sentence of imprisonment. The Eastern Roumelia Commission is to be presided over by Assim Pasha, and the Russian Commissioners, probably under the advice of Prince Lobanoff, have suddenly adopted a conciliatory attitude. The first meeting was held on Tuesday, when the Grand Vizier declared that the Sultan and his Government were most anxious to forward the welfare of the new province. Regarding the Asia Minor reforms, Sir A. H. Layard is said not to favour the Porte's scheme for their generalisation, while the Greek question seems as far off settlement as ever, and Safvet Pasha has issued a circular note denying the accusation of the Greek Government that the Porte has been stirring up the fanaticism of the Albanians against the Greeks, and pointing out that the Greek Government is preparing an army of 40,000 men, with a reserve of 35,000, and is raising a loan of 2,000,000*l*. It is said that Hobart Pasha has transmitted to Athens letters from Her Majesty and the Prince of Wales, who advocate a moderate and conciliatory arrangement between the two countries.

In CYPRUS the health of the troops is somewhat better owing to the colder weather, although Sir A. Home states that ague is replacing the intermittent fever. The total number of sick averages 154 per 1,000. On the 27th inst. Sir Garnet Wolseley held a State reception of Mahomedans at Nicosia, and announced that Her Majesty has instructed him to appoint a Legislative Council to make the necessary laws for the island, subject of course to the approval of the High Commissioner and the British Government. The Council is to number not less than four nor more than eight members, half of whom are to be officials, and the remainder residents on the island. By the same Order in Council the High Commissioner is endowed with special powers to act in cases of emergency, and is also authorised to remit pains and penalties at his discretion.

FRANCE.——Political news is still at a discount, and even the elections have taken place without any noteworthy comment, and the only incident which has excited any attention has been the action of the new Bishop of Marseilles, who, unearthing an old Napoleonic decree of 1804, claimed military honours on his entry into a town and during his residence there. As Marseilles is an eminently Radical city, and as serious disturbances were to be expected should these honours be accorded, the Government were placed somewhat in a dilemma, from which it escaped by agreeing to the military display, but intimating that there must be no religious procession, which, according to a subsequent law, would be illegal. To this the Bishop demurred, and finally entered his diocese in a private carriage, without any form or ceremonies. One reason for the dearth of political news is the intense interest which the Exhibition is still exciting, Paris being crowded to excess with both provincial and foreign visitors; the produce of the "tickets" alone amounting to 280,000*l*., and exceeding that during the corresponding period of 1867 by 75,000*l*., the total number of persons admitted being 8,898,202, in four months. There is considerable discussion concerning the dress and behaviour of English tourists while abroad—a subject which was first raised by our old friend Punch, and which has been warmly taken up by the French papers, and the Temps and Gaulois in particular, who make some very severe remarks upon the conduct of many of our countrymen while in Paris, their unutterable rudeness, their vulgarity, and their disrespect to society, evinced by attending the theatres in garments in which they would be ashamed to be seen at home. Unfortunately these complaints are only too true at the present time, and any Englishman who has visited Paris within the past four months cannot but feel ashamed of his nationality, when he witnesses so many of his countrymen conducting themselves in a fashion which at home they would themselves be the first to condemn as the lowest depth of bad breeding. To turn to pleasanter matters, the Prince and the Princess of Wales are anxiously expected for the much talked-of distribution of the prizes at the Palais de l'Industrie, which has been converted into a vast hall for the occasion, while considerable attention is being devoted to the grand national lottery, of which the third million of tickets are now being sold, and the first prize of which—a set of jewels—has just been bought of a jeweller in the Exhibition for 4,000*l*. There is little theatrical gossip beyond that there have been two first representations—a melodrama, full to repletion of murders, at the Château d'Eau, by Eugène Liuville, entitled Le Braconnier du Nid de l'Aigle, and an amusing one-act comedy, at the Vaudeville, by M. Daniel Darc, entitled Les Rieuses.

Peace and war have been both liberally discussed this week. The Peace Congress has been holding its sittings, and, after considering a score of marvellous projects for the Millennium, has recommended the organisation of a Court of Arbitration, or European Parliament, which is to decide on all international disputes. Some rather incongruously warlike scenes occurred during the last sitting, when the various members quarrelled on the religious question. As for war, the estimates for 1879 show that France is to pay 22,000,000*l*. for her army next year, the strength of the active contingent being set down at 446,442 men. The total military and naval forces, however, amount to 3,600,000 men, or a tenth of the whole population, the active army consisting of 2,080,000 troops.

GERMANY.——The Parliamentary Committee on the Socialist Bill have been busy considering the various clauses, and have adopted the paragraph instituting a final Court of Appeal of nine members. Various amendments were also made, which Count Eulenberg, the Minister of the Interior, announced on Tuesday would be accepted with one or two minor exceptions, but that with regard to the proposed limitation of the operation of the Bill to two years and a-half, the Government considered the term to be too short.—The relations with the Vatican appear to be growing more and more cordial, and negotiations for an amicable arrangement continue.—The Emperor and Empress visited Cologne last week in order to unveil a memorial stone erected to the late King Frederick William III. The Emperor made a speech, thanking Providence, "who, after many hard-fought fields, brought the Rhine Provinces under the sceptre of King Frederick William III., thereby assigning to Prussia the duty of holding the watch on the Rhine by her strength. This duty," he declared, "Prussia, in union with the whole of Germany, has gloriously fulfilled."

ITALY.——The Vatican is somewhat disturbed at the aspect of affairs both in Italy and abroad. A rupture is said to be pending with the Jesuits, the tribute of Peter's pence has declined four-fifths, while the tone of M. Gambetta's speech at Romans has not tended to reassure Pontifical circles. A conciliatory policy is now accordingly not thought improbable.—The eruption of Mount Vesuvius continues, though its activity has somewhat diminished. Wednesday was the anniversary of the Roman plebiscite of 1870, and was kept with all due honour.—A curious disease of the nervous system, entitled pellegra, is prevailing among the peasants in Lombardy. The disease is thought to be due to dirt, unhealthy dwellings, and the consumption of damaged maize.

INDIA AND AFGHANISTAN.——We have fully treated this subject this week in our special supplement, where will be found the number and destination of the various bodies of troops which are to form the advance guard of the force destined to punish the Ameer of Cabul for his insult; but we may mention that it is stated that the Ameer has sent a special Envoy, Mussafir Khara, to the Sultan to induce him to use his good offices with England to prevent a war, and also to impress upon him the advantages of a Russian over an English alliance. As for the Russian mission, it is believed that the Envoy, Count Stolyetoff, (not General Abramoff, as has been stated) has returned to General Kauffmann's head-quarters, but that two Russian officers still remain at Cabul. Russia herself is assuming, through her semi-official Press, an attitude of injured innocence, and, in answer to a note from the English Cabinet inquiring how the Russian Government proposed to reconcile General Stolyetoff's mission with its previous engagements to renounce all political influence in Afghanistan, the Government made the following curious reply: "Russia is always disposed to respect existing engagements, but that that mission, although decided upon at a time and under circumstances now no longer existing, was merely intended as an act of courtesy to the Ameer of Afghanistan." Still the various journals do not hesitate to declare that the blow is a serious one to English prestige, and that, as England assisted Turkey during the last war, so Russia will help the Ameer during the coming struggle, for, remarks the Novoye Vremya, "he will require a Russian alliance to cover his rear." The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Berlin Post declares that "there is no one in Russia who will not be delighted at the insatiable British Lion breaking his teeth in the vain attempt to tear and worry the Afghans." He admits, however, that the "Ameer acted independently, and it was only the malice of English scribblers which imputed to Russia the guilt of hounding him on against Great Britain." In fact, the whole Russian description of the situation is aptly stated by the Berlin correspondent of The Times as that of a "noble-minded and independent nation resisting rapacious England, and looking for sympathy to generous Russia, whose civilising philanthropy is fostering peace and progress on his northern frontiers." In the other European countries the balance of opinion is decidedly in favour of England, although the German official Press is somewhat disposed to lean towards Russia. The North German Gazette, however, publishes a letter from St. Petersburg, stating that Russia must have peace before everything. In France the Temps remarks that England must place some more trustworthy Prince upon the throne of Afghanistan; but in Austria great anxiety is manifested lest the result of the crisis should be an Anglo-Russian war.

In India itself the army is said to be enthusiastic about the prospect of speedy employment, and the tone of the Vernacular Press is at present very favourable. Mr. A. Vambéry, writing to the Daily Telegraph, accuses Shere Ali of having disobeyed the Koran, which enacts that an ambassador, even though he be an infidel, should always be respected, and recommends that this should be widely brought to the notice of the Indian Mussulmans.

UNITED STATES.——The yellow fever epidemic continues in the South, and up to last Saturday the total number of deaths in New Orleans and Memphis had amounted to respectively 2,758 and 2,469. The most heartrending account of the desolate aspect of the towns during the height of the epidemic have come to hand by mail, and strongly remind the reader of the scenes described by Defoe in his account of the Great Plague of London. People sicken and crawl to die under a bush, fires are lit before the houses where a death has taken place, the dead carts are the only vehicles about the streets, and the utmost misery and starvation exist amongst the people.

The released Fenian convicts landed in New York on Monday, no display, however, attended their reception.—The first Chinese Minister to the United States has been received by President Hayes.—A six days' walking match is taking place at New York between O'Leary and Hughes.—The Australian cricketers are also in New York, and played their first match with a New York eighteen on Tuesday and Wednesday, beating their opponents by seven wickets.—Mr. Bancroft, the historian, has been thrown out of his carriage and severely injured.

MISCELLANEOUS.——There has been an alarm in MADRID of yellow fever, three cases having been asserted to have been sent to the hospitals. The Board of Health, however, have declared that the cases do not display the characteristic symptoms of the disease. Leprosy is very prevalent in Alicante, where a lepers' hospital has been established.—The King of BURMAH died on Wednesday at Mandalay.—The Emperor of JAPAN has adopted his boy cousin as heir to the throne.

THE COURT

THE Queen remains at Balmoral. Her Majesty last week drove to Glen Gelder Shiel, received the Earl of Fife and the Hon. Hamilton Duncan to lunch, and Viscount Cranbrook and Major von Liebenau to dinner. On Saturday the Queen was deeply grieved by the death of Sir T. M. Biddulph, Keeper of the Privy Purse, who had been in Her Majesty's service for 27 years. The Queen had been calling on Lady Biddulph just before her husband's death, and on receiving the news Her Majesty went again to Abergeldie Mains, with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, to visit Lady Biddulph. Next morning Divine Service was performed at Balmoral before the Queen and the Royal Family, the Rev. A. Campbell officiating. In the afternoon Her Majesty visited the Princess of Wales and called on Lady Biddulph, and in the evening Viscount Cranbrook joined the Royal party at dinner. The Princess of Wales and her three girls lunched with the Queen on Monday, and afterwards Her Majesty drove home with the Princess and took tea at Abergeldie Castle, subsequently visiting Lady Biddulph.—Prince William of Germany left Balmoral last week for the south.

The Prince of Wales has been visiting Viscount Macduff this week. The Prince was out deer-stalking on Saturday when he heard of Sir T. M. Biddulph's death, and at once went to see Lady Biddulph. The Princess and her three daughters continue at Abergeldie Castle. Early this month the Prince and Princess go to Paris.

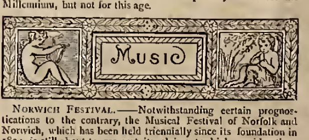
The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, accompanied by two of the Ladies Campbell, Lady Dufferin, and two of her sons, left Roseneath on Monday for Edinburgh on their way south to start for Canada. At Edinburgh they lunched at Earl and Countess Percy's residence, and stayed the night with Sir J. and Lady O'Neill at Burnhead, leaving again on Tuesday night for London.—The Duke of Connaught has resumed his duties at Woolwich.—Prince Leopold left Balmoral on Tuesday.—The baptism of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh's infant took place on Wednesday at Coburg, the child being named Alexandra Louise Olga Victoria.

The marriage of the widowed King of the Netherlands and the Princess Emma of Waldeck Pyrmont is definitely decided on, and the betrothal was announced by the Prince of Waldeck at a banquet at Arolsen on Monday night, the King and his fiancée subsequently holding a reception to receive congratulations. King William III. is 61 and his future bride 20.—Prince Henry of Germany, second son of the Imperial Prince and Princess, starts this year on a two years' cruise.—Prince Louis Napoleon is staying with Lord O. Elphinstone at Tulliallan Castle.

CHURCH NEWS

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.——At most of the churches in Sheffield special services were held on Sunday last. The Bishop of Sodor and Man, preaching at St. Silas', said that Infidelity and Ceremonialism were the great hindrances to the liberty of the gospel. There was much speculation of opinion, and free thought on every hand in connection with religion, and he thought it well that all things should be fairly and fully discussed. The Archdeacon of Ely preaching in the evening said that during the last eighteen years Church Conferences had exercised a powerful influence for good, and he could not doubt that the coming meeting would promote the great end in view—the glory of God. On Monday the 21st anniversary meeting of the National Free and Open Church Society took place, and a Conference of Sunday School Teachers was held under the presidency of the Bishop of Sodor and Man, who said that the first great essentials for the work were efficient teachers, good lessons, proper inspection, and good prizes. On Tuesday the Congress itself was commenced. There was a procession of clergy and laity from the Cutlers' Hall to the Parish Church, where the Bishop of Ripon preached the inaugural sermon, and at two o'clock the Archbishop of York as president delivered an address in the Cutlers' Hall to an audience of some 3,000 persons. His Grace justified such gatherings, and the presence of all parties within the Church at them, by an illustration showing the happy effects of the free Conference at Lambeth in dealing with the dispute that arose last year between the Church Missionary Society and the Bishop of Colombo; and said that he should be much disappointed if the Pan-Anglican Synod did not bear fruit in the increase of missionary activity; in a greater circumspection as to the admission of new clergy to labour abroad; in a fuller knowledge of, and consequently in a greater sympathy with, the work going on through the agency of distant Churches; and even in a gradual abatement of that which seemed to many of them a needless addition to their troubles—the arbitrary changes of ritual made without authority, and persisted in against lawful remonstrance. The true questions of the hour were those which belonged, not to the inside of theology, but to the threshold; such as, whether there be any soul, any future life, any sin, any need of redemption, any Redeemer, any God. Inquiries on all these subjects were pursued with a pitiless logic, an erudition, an astuteness, greater than any former time had exhibited. To deal with the forces arrayed against them they needed all their united strength.—Amongst the subjects dealt with on the opening day were "Modern Doubts and Difficulties in Relation to Revealed Religion," "Free and Open Churches," and "Foreign and Colonial Ministers." On Wednesday the topics discussed were "Church Endowments," "Ecclesiastical Patronage," "Marriage Law as Affecting the Church," "Duty of the Church in Relation to Intemperance," "The Church's Work in the Country," and "The Just Limits of Comprehensiveness in the National Church." The last-named subject was introduced by the Hon. Charles Wood, and gave rise to an animated debate, at the close of which the Archbishop of York spoke in strong terms concerning the resistance of the Ritualists to the authority of the Bishops, and said that it seemed to him a thing to "make the angels weep" that the Ritualists should be going on in the course they were pursuing.

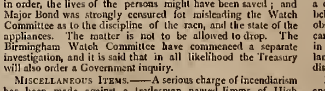
VARIOUS.——The Archbishop of Canterbury, presiding at the Canterbury Diocese Conference on Friday last, alluded to the Pan-Anglican Conference recently held at Lambeth Palace, and quoted the declarations of the Bishops with regard to Ritualism. The Conference proceeded to discuss the subject of the Church of England Temperance Society. Many clerical and lay members spoke, and there appeared to be much diversity of opinion as to the practicability of the Society's operations.—Dr. Pusey has just issued a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury on "Habitual Confession not discouraged by the Resolution accepted by the Lambeth Conference." The learned professor, admits that for some forty years he has, as his Grace, he says, knows, received the confession of all who came to him. These confessions, he says, in many places had become habitual at the wish of those who made them. Of some still living he had received confessions for some thirty-five years. What then, he says, concerns him is to know whether in so doing he has come under any censure from the hundred Bishops assembled at the Lambeth Conference in that part of their resolution which ran:—"It is the deliberate opinion of the Conference that no minister of the Church is authorised even to encourage the practice of habitual confession." Dr. Pusey devotes nearly forty-two pages to his arguments.—Four new churches were opened in Barrow-in-Furness on Thursday last week. They have been built by private subscriptions, the Duke of Devonshire giving 12,000*l.*; the Duke of Buccleuch, 6,000*l.*; and the remainder being raised by private subscription. The Archbishop of York and the Bishops of Carlisle, Hereford, and Sodor and Man officiated at the dedication.—The John Bull states that the living of St. James's, Hatcham, has been offered by Mr. Robert Tooth, at the request of the Rev. Arthur Tooth, to the Rev. A. H. Stanton, curate of St. Alban's, Holborn.—The Rev. Dr. Nihill (what a name for a Ritualistic clergyman!) has this week been holding a series of dedicatory services in St. Michael's Church, Shoreditch, of which he is vicar. On Tuesday the Rev. Arthur Tooth preached there to a crowded congregation. The burden of his discourse was that the world had practically forgotten the providence of God, and was ever boasting of its strength and its power in the promotion of art, literature, and science, whilst the Church was always pleading its weakness, but its very weakness was its strength, and in the end it would overcome the world.—A community of Carmelite Nuns, consisting of twelve sisters, amongst whom is Lady Minna Howard, has been established at Notting Hill. On Sunday last the convent was solemnly blessed by Cardinal Manning, the inaugural ceremonies lasting the whole day.—Last Sunday the Rev. W. Robinson, an Independent minister who is about to join the Church of England, preached a farewell sermon to his congregation, in which he gave his reasons for leaving the denomination. He said that his whole life had been spent in Nonconformity, and all his relations were connected with Nonconformity, except his only brother, who had been an Independent minister, but who, because of what he had suffered, had gone to the Established Church. The inner working of Independency, was one reason why he left it. He, with many of his brethren, had felt the awful degradation of preaching on "approval." The Churches were riven and rent by the choosing of a minister who was miserably paid, and might sometimes be cruelly tortured by the deacons, or jeopardise his salary if he preached this or failed to preach that. But the greatest curse of Independency was the Church meetings, which sometimes beggared description. Independency was sublime as a theory, but deplorable in practice. It was exquisitely suited for the Millennium, but not for this age.



NORWICH FESTIVAL.——Notwithstanding certain prognostications to the contrary, the Musical Festival of Norfolk and Norwich, which has been held triennially since its foundation in 1824, is still about to reassert its claims to high consideration. This meeting has, in its time, done a good deal for the musical art, and, had it been more substantially and regularly supported by the clergy, aristocracy, and gentry of the city and county—not to speak of East Anglia generally—might have done a good deal more for the funds of the principal charities in aid of which it was virtually established. The festival which is to be held the week after next, under the direction of that eminent musician, Sir Julius Benedict, who succeeded the late Professor Taylor, Spohr's enthusiastic advocate, in 1845, and has retained the post without intermission since then, is the 19th on record. As usual, we find a catalogue of Royal "Patrons" (headed by Her Majesty the Queen), who allow their names to be used, but rarely attend, or, indeed, do anything very remarkable for the Festival or its belongings; and once more the Earl of Leicester, Lord Lieutenant of the County, has accepted the post of President. There is a strong list of Vice-Presidents; but how many are likely to honour the performances by their actual presence, as well as by their invariably vouchsafed "countenance" and approval, is at best matter for conjecture. Under the supervision of Sir Julius Benedict, however, there is pretty sure to be a selection of music, sacred and secular, day after day, night after night, to tempt genuine amateurs to St. Andrew's Hall; and while there is not much of absolute novelty to point out in the week's programme, it is on the whole a really attractive one. There are to be three morning performances, at the first of which Professor Macfarren's oratorio, Joseph (received with such unanimous applause at the Leeds Festival of 1877), followed by Beethoven's Mass in C (No. 1); at the second, Mendelssohn's Elijah; and at the third, the perennial Messiah, are to be given. The first evening concert includes Handel's Acis and Galatea (with Mozart's additional accompaniments); the second is a "Grand Ballad Concert;" the third a "Grand Operatic Concert." A symphony will precede both the second and third concerts—which will allow plenty of leisure for those Norwich amateurs (of whom there are many) who don't care a straw for symphonies to arrive in time for the ballads and operatic airs. There is only one new contribution from the pen of Sir Julius Benedict in the programme—an overture, Das Kätchen von Heilbronn (Katherine of Heilbronn); but in revenge his clever pupil (we believe), Mr. H. Kingston Rudd is to play the brilliant pianoforte concerto in E flat, composed some years ago for Madame Arabella Goddard, who first introduced it to the public. The only other instrumental solo—such devouring cormorants are singers, native and foreign—is Ernst's fantasia on airs from Rossini's Otello, set down for our foremost English violinist, Mr. J. T. Carrodus (favourite pupil of the late Bernhard Molique), who also leads the orchestra. That both orchestra and chorus will be on the customary grand scale may pass for granted; Sir Julius Benedict is always earnestly assiduous about these very important essentials. The leading singers are Madame Albani, Misses Catherine Penna and Anna Williams (sopranos); Mesdames Antoinette Sterling and Trebelli (contraltos); Messrs. Edward Lloyd, H. J. Minns, and W. Shakespeare (tenors); Messrs. R. Hilton and Santley (basses). The organist is Dr. Bunnett of Norwich.

CRYSTAL PALACE.——Among the novel features at the first Crystal Palace Saturday Concert to-day are a new orchestral symphony in D, by Johannes Brahms (his No. 2), and Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, performed by M. Brassin who, though highly prized on the Continent, is but little known in England. The programme is otherwise varied and interesting, comprising as it does Gluck's overture to Iphigenie in Aulis, with Wagner's "concert coda;" Sterndale Bennett's beautiful overture, The Wood-Nymphs; and the first appearance at the Crystal Palace of Miss Emma Thursby, the young and accomplished American songstress who visited us in the summer. So that these admirable entertainments, with Mr. August Manns again as conductor (it would be difficult to replace that gentleman), will be "inaugurated" with the spirit of enterprise which has marked them from their earliest period. There are, as usual, to be twenty-five concerts—eleven before, and fourteen after, Christmas. Not the least attractive among these will be the concert of Nov. 2nd, in commemoration of Mendelssohn (who died Nov. 4, 1847), at which an unpublished, and to us quite unknown, Symphony in F minor, for string instruments, is to be heard, and the entire programme, vocal and instrumental devoted to compositions by that distinguished master. Still another promise, not less interesting, is the Harold en Italie, an orchestral "tone-poem" with which Hector Berlioz was inspired by Lord Byron's "Childe Harold," the character of the eloquently reflective pilgrim being assigned, from beginning to end, to the viola solus. Only the late Heinrich Ernst has shown the capacity and feeling indispensable to an adequate interpretation of this; but in the hands of Herr Ludwig Straus it is likely to be safe enough.

WAIFS.——Four of the leading singers originally attached to the operatic company with which Mr. Mapleson has sailed for New York seceded at the eleventh hour, although one of them, Mdlle. Caroline Salla, if we are well-informed, had even signed her engagement. There are, however, wheels within wheels. Miss Minnie Hauk is on the way, and so is Madame Etelka Gerster, but Mdlle. Salla has manifested qualities that recommend themselves, and need have feared no rivalry in her legitimate sphere. For the genus irritabile, indeed, we must look to vocalists, and before the rest to operatic vocalists.—The first performance of Gounod's Polyeucte, founded on the same theme as the Poliuto of Donizetti (afterwards extended into Les Martyrs, for Paris), is announced by M. Halanzier for the 7th inst. All musical Paris is alive with curiosity, anxious that the celebrated composer of Faust should in this new effort succeed in brightening up the laurels to some degree tarnished by his Cinq Mars, the comparative failure of which, even when remodelled, is notorious. Something fresh is loudly called for at the New Grand Opera, where people are getting heartily tired of La Juive, Le Prophète, Hamlet, Faust, &c., of which they have heard so much lately, and no one knows better than the director of the New Grand Opera that, with the exception of Guillaume Tell, nothing for nearly half a century has been produced so fresh, so spirited, and so genial as Auber's shamefully neglected masterpiece, La Muette de Portici (our Masaniello).—Beethoven's Choral Symphony, given on Monday for the benefit of the Messrs. Gatti, brought the Promenade Concerts triumphantly to a close. "Large promises, all kept, and proportionate success," is the general verdict pronounced upon these entertainments, so admirably conducted by Mr. Arthur Sullivan.—M. Rivière begins on Saturday with a new series.



THE BIRMINGHAM FIRE.——The coroner's inquiry into the circumstances of the recent fatal fire at Birmingham has resulted in an extraordinary verdict. The jury, after deliberating for three hours, found that the death of the child who fell from the arms of his rescuer was accidental, and that the other three persons perished by suffocation resulting from a fire which was designedly lighted, but by whom there was not sufficient evidence to show. To this a rider was added to the effect that, had the fire-escape been in order, the lives of the persons might have been saved; and Major Bond was strongly censured for misleading the Watch Committee as to the discipline of the men, and the state of the appliances. The matter is not to be allowed to drop. The Birmingham Watch Committee have commenced a separate investigation, and it is said that in all likelihood the Treasury will also order a Government inquiry.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——A serious charge of incendiarism has been made against a tradesman named Emms, of High Street, Shadwell, and his wife. The fire, which broke out on Saturday last, was discovered by a police inspector, who, as soon as it was subdued, examined the premises, and found carefully arranged trains of all sorts of inflammable materials in nearly every apartment. The woman Emms returned at seven next morning, and, on being told of the fire, offered 10*l.* to be allowed to go upstairs. She also prevaricated very much as to her knowledge of her husband's whereabouts, and on being asked in what Office the place was insured, again attempted to bribe the police inspector. The man Emms was subsequently arrested, and both are now in custody on remand.—The new Act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday in Ireland, comes into operation this week, and some difficulties are expected to arise in the enforcement of it. The prohibition extends to the whole of the day, except in the cities of Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, and the town of Belfast.—Mr. John Rea, the eccentric solicitor, who was last week sentenced to a week's imprisonment for contempt of Court, was liberated on Tuesday, the committal being quashed by Mr. Justice O'Brien, on the ground that Mr. Rea had had no opportunity of showing cause against the sentence. Mr. Rea's counsel raised fifteen objections to the committal, and read extraordinary affidavits filed by him, in which he spoke of Mr. Lloyd, the stipendiary magistrate who signed the warrant, as a perjured conspirator who had done this to ingratiate himself in the eyes of the Duke of Marlborough, at whose pleasure he held office. The affidavits also contained allusions to the Duke of Abercorn, Tory Papists, and Fenian policemen. Mr. Purcell, Q.C., who appeared for Mr. Lloyd, asked the Judge to take judicial notice of these scandalous charges, but his lordship reserved them for the full Court. Mr. Rea, who was loudly cheered on leaving the Court, delivered a characteristic address to the mob.—The Kensington Guardians have sent a letter to the Home Secretary, protesting against the parish being called upon to bear the cost of the infliction of punishment in its present form upon the Rev. Mr. Dodwell, whilst the opinion of eminent medical men was that his sanity was undoubted.—Three men have been committed for trial for the robbery of bank notes, bills of exchange, &c., of the value of 14,000*l.* from the Thornhill Arms, Stanningley, in July last. Two of them had been seen in the house during the evening. In the Doncaster race week the three prisoners, who all lived at Leeds, were taken into custody, and the greater part of the missing property was found concealed in the houses they occupied.—Mr. H. S. Marshall, assistant secretary to the Curates' Augmentation Fund, has been arrested for embezzling large sums of money belonging to the funds, amounting, on his own admission, to 3,000*l.*—A curious incident occurred at the Hammersmith Police Court the other day. An Irish labourer was charged with stabbing his wife, but the woman (a Roman Catholic), although quite willing to state what had occurred, persistently refused to take the oath. Under these circumstances her evidence was of course inadmissible, and the magistrate, after hearing a policeman's account of the affair, adjourned the case, and, on the woman declaring that she could not again attend, expressed his intention of issuing a warrant to compel her to do so.—On Saturday a dreadful tragedy was enacted at Bradford, where a man named Owston, prompted by jealousy, cut his wife's throat as she lay in bed, and then, rushing to the house of a neighbour with whom he suspected her of being too familiar, jumped through the window, and stabbed him in the face. He afterwards cut his own throat, but the wound was not fatal.—The death of Mr. Justice Keogh is reported from Bingen on the Rhine. The unfortunate mental disorder during which he attacked his valet about a month ago, is said to have entirely passed away before his death. He was sixty-one years of age.

EX-SULTAN MURAD still takes a deep interest in the affairs of his country, according to Galignani. Although he suffers from frequent fits of derangement, he is wonderfully clear-sighted during his lucid intervals, and writes frequent letters of advice to Sultan Abdul Hamid, speaking enthusiastically of the regeneration of the Empire and the improvement of the state of the population.

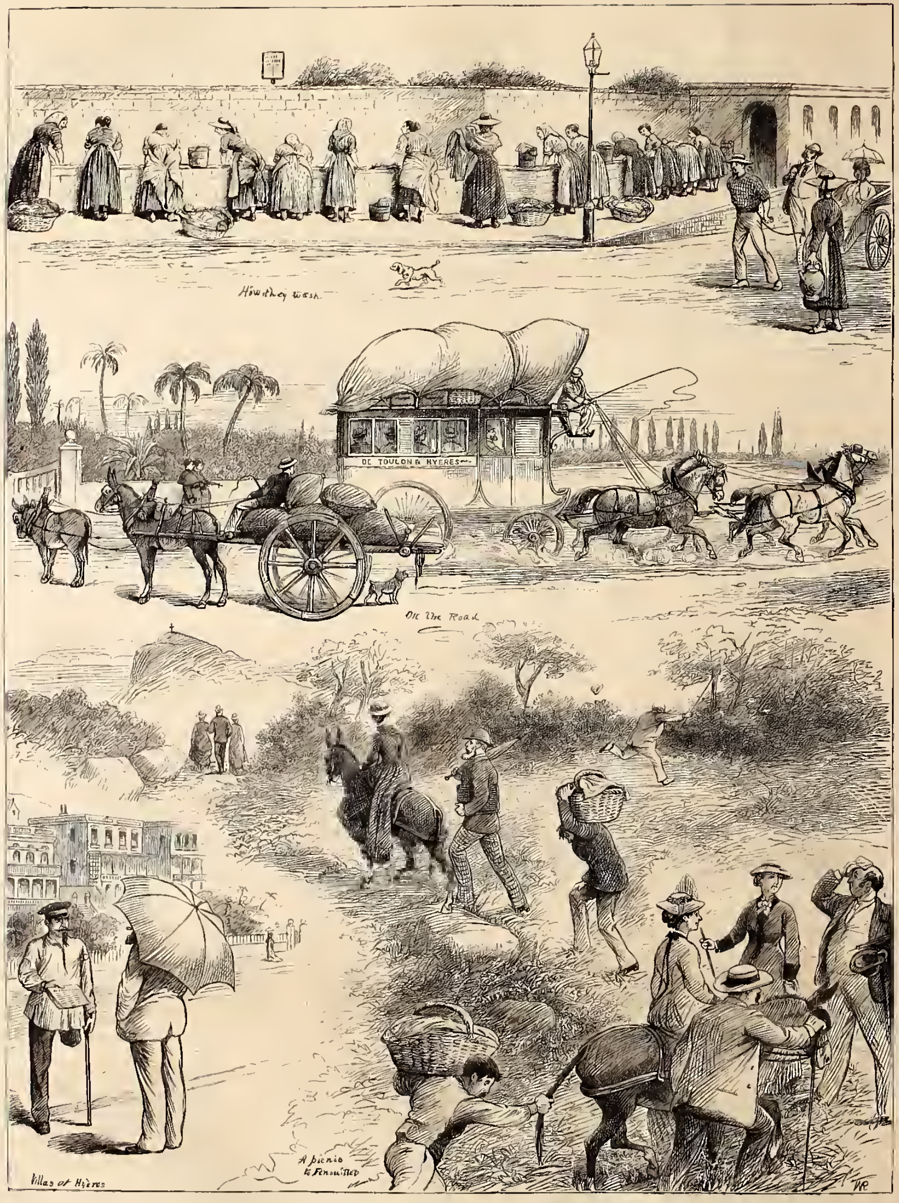
A FEMININE BULL-FIGHTER is the great attraction of the Mexican arenas at Nueva-Arata. Señora Cnucha Salata is asserted to be a most skilful torreada. Armed solely with a long dagger, she springs on the back of the most ferocious bull, stabs the creature, and escaping from the pursuit of the enraged animal by flinging herself flat on the ground manages to despatch the bull without receiving the slightest injury.

POPE LEO XIII. is passionately fond of lark-catching, and part of the Vatican garden is being fitted up to allow His Holiness to indulge in his favourite pastime. A small piece of ground is fenced in, and nets laid in readiness on the bushes, while the sportsman hides in a tiny hut at the corner of the enclosure. Worms and different insects are scattered on the earth, and tame larks, secured by a chain on one foot, acting as decoys, speedily attract a large number of their species. As soon as the sportsman considers the number sufficient he rings a bell which frightens the larks and makes them fly up, only to be caught in the nets which have been suddenly extended by means of a spring. This style of bird-catching, call a "rocolo," is much practised in Northern Italy.

THE ELEVATION TO THE PEERAGE of the Lord Chancellor has attracted no little attention in France, more especially as the title of Lord Chancellor is apparently considered synonymous with that of Premier. Thus the Figaro and the Gaulois announce that Lord Beaconsfield has been created Viscount Garmoyle and Earl Tairns (sic), and while the latter remarks that shortly, without doubt, his lordship will be made a Duke, the former, which has a correspondent in London, and makes a special feature of daily quotations from the English papers, devotes a whole column to moralising on the character and policy of that "keen and clever diplomatist, the Hero of Cyprus, who has just been elevated to the dignity of Earl."

EXPLOSIONS IN COAL MINES.——A correspondent sends us the following suggestion:—"Instead of increasing the number of shafts I would dispense with all but the main working one, and instead of trying to coax the foul air either by rarefying at the upcast or by exhausting fans, I would suggest a blowing engine similar to those used at the iron-smelting furnaces, but perhaps not so powerful—and to have a pair in duplicate in case of accident to either of them—to send the compressed air in suitable pipes to every nook and corner of the workings, to let every man have a tap and flexible pipe, so that each could have a constant supply of fresh air from the top, and thus to get behind the foul air and force it out, to remove all trap doors and obstructions, and let the enemy find his way out the best way he can, and up the main or working shaft. I think the men might, in this case, safely work with gas and dispense with the safety lamps, which are a great nuisance at all times, and ought to be discontinued."

PRINCE BISMARCK has a great dislike to posing for his statue, and a German sculptor who wished to execute a full-length figure of the Chancellor had recently to take up his abode in the Prince's house so as to study his model at odd times and complete the task from memory, the Prince refusing to sit quiet for the necessary likeness. The sculptor however was anxious to produce exactly the historic right hand of the Statesman, and tried to persuade the Prince to have a plaster cast taken, Marshal von Moltke having already submitted to the process. Prince Bismarck declined, notwithstanding, declaring that he was too nervous to bear the prickly feeling of the plaster sticking to his skin. The Chancellor evidently lacks the endurance possessed by the feminine original of two curious plaster casts in the Russian department of the Paris Exhibition. These casts are the first ever taken entire of a living form, and represent two recumbent female figures, one lying on the side and the other on the face.



A VISIT TO HYÈRES.

THE affront which England has received at the hands of the Ameer of Cabul by the stoppage of Sir Neville Chamberlain upon the threshold of Afghanistan is of such a serious and unmistakable character that no room is left for any difference of opinion as to the policy it imposes upon the Government. Unless Shere Ali immediately disavows the action taken by the Afghan commandant at Ali Musjid, or at once apologises for it, he must be punished, and that promptly, for his treatment of our Envoy. It is not usual for Afghan officers to go beyond the instructions of their Ameer, and, as we are told that, after a three hours' conference, the mission was not only turned back and the Afghan forces paraded on the heights, but also Major Cavagnari, the officer sent forward by Sir Neville Chamberlain, was told by the commander of the fort that but for his personal friendship he would have shot him there and then, there appears to be little ground for indulging in the hope that war will not supervene; military preparations have indeed already commenced, although it is announced that no immediate hostilities are intended. The garrison of our advance station at Quetta, which now consists of a Regiment of Punjaub Infantry and the Peshawur Mountain Battery, is to be reinforced by two batteries, three cavalry regiments, eight battalions of infantry, and two of pioneers and sappers. The Kohat column under General Roberts is to assemble at Thul, at the entrance of the Kuram Valley, and will consist of one horse and one field battery, two regiments of cavalry, five battalions of infantry, and one of pioneers and sappers. The reserve to collect at Sukkar comprises seven batteries, a siege train, two cavalry regiments eight infantry battalions, and two of pioneers and sappers. Lieutenant-General Crawford Chamberlain (a brother of Sir Neville), of the Oude Division of the Bengal Army, has been named as likely to receive the chief command of the Expeditionary Force.

Without presuming to pass judgment upon the conduct of Lord Lytton in his negotiations with Shere Ali, or to express any dogmatic opinion upon the purely military question of our frontier defences of India, we propose in this article to give a brief account of the geographical position, physical characteristics, and history of Afghanistan, with some description of the people over whom the Ameer of Cabul holds sway.

The Afghans, like the Chinese, have always exhibited the greatest aversion to foreigners entering their country, and therefore our knowledge of it, acquired under circumstances of great difficulty, is very imperfect, even the recent maps being but roughly accurate. Afghanistan is, on an average, about 430 miles from east to west, and 460 miles from south to north. On the north it is bounded by the Oxus till a few miles below

AFGHANISTAN ILLUSTRATED—TEMPLE OF AHMED SHAH AT KANDAHAR

Kilat, and thence the boundary-line dividing it from Khivan territory runs east and by south to a point a few miles west of Sarrakhs. On the west it is bounded by Persia; on the south by Khelat. From its south-easternmost extremity the frontier runs in a north-easterly direction along British territory as far as Swat. On the east it is bounded by Swat, Caffristan, and Kashgar. Afghanistan is traversed across the centre from east to west by a chain of mountains, which may be viewed as an offshoot of the Himalayan system. This chain, called the Hindoo-Koosh, ends in the Koh-i-Baba, a huge mass north-west of and at no great distance from the city of Cabul, the loftiest peak of which is 18,000 feet in height, and is covered with perpetual snow. Thence run two parallel chains, one called the Safed Koh; the other—the southernmost one—the Siah Koh. The northern range terminates near Herat, and the southern range, when it reaches a point just south of that city, trends off to the south-west and by south. These mountains are of no great height. North of the Koh-i-Baba and the Safed Koh is a high plateau, intersected by minor ranges, and called the Hazareh district. Running in a south-west direction from Cabul past Kandahar to Girishk is another chain of mountains. Practically, almost the whole of Afghanistan is a mass of mountains interspersed with valleys, of which some are of considerable size. The main water-sheds of the country are, however, the crests of the two mountain chains which run, one from east to west, and the other diagonally from north-east to south-west.

The chief rivers of Afghanistan are the Murghab, the Hari Rood, the Balkh, the Cabul, and the Helmund. There are also several smaller rivers, the whole country being well watered, and the valleys in consequence being extremely fertile.

CLIMATE AND PRODUCTIONS

The climate and soil of Afghanistan are very variable. In the valleys the climate is very hot in the summer, and fruit and grain are abundant. There is also a good deal of cultivation on terraces on the lower slopes of the mountains. Throughout the country, however, and especially in the north, there are tracts of desert, or rough rock-strewn plateaus, where nothing is cultivated. In the eastern part of the Cabul Valley, and in those to the south, the heat is sufficient to mature all the products of India, such as sugar-cane, indigo, and some tropical fruits, while the northern valleys abound in the productions of colder regions, and the mountains are covered with forests of pines. The soil of the country resembles that of the rest of the great table-land of Central Asia. In Cabul and the northern part of Herat are high forest-clad mountains and vast plains, susceptible of every species of cultivation; but south of Herat and Kandahar the mountains are sterile and the plains are sandy and arid; and the inhabitants only obtain water by means of a series of wells connected by subterranean canals. Throughout the country agriculture is in the same primitive state as in Persia and other Asiatic countries. The soil is broken by a crooked log of wood shod with iron, and drawn by oxen; and irrigation is largely resorted to in those districts where it is found necessary. Only the richest tracts of land are cultivated; but the seasons are regular, and the harvest usually abundant. To the fruits of Europe in high perfection are added most of those common in India, and vegetables of all kinds are reared in great abundance. Of these two deserve mention: the ruwash (rhubarb) and the assafoetida plant; the former is eaten both raw and dressed, and the latter is not only considered valuable for its gum, but is eaten roasted, and esteemed a great delicacy. Its odour is so strong, that, to persons unaccustomed to it, one head of it, while being cooked, is enough to poison the air of a whole camp.

The chief animals of Afghanistan are the horse, camel, and sheep, which last are of the fat-tailed variety, and are remarkable for the peculiar brown colour of their wool. The principal wild animals in the plains are the gazelle, jackal, fox, and wolf; but in the mountainous districts the tiger, leopard, lynx, hyæna, bear, and monkey are found; while in the western deserts a species of wild ass, called from its colour the "gorakhar," or white ass, is met with.

THE PEOPLE OF AFGHANISTAN

The Afghan nation is divided into two great sections, the nomads and the fixed population, both of which are further subdivided into numerous tribes or clans. The nomads are of course a pastoral people, but they vary the monotony of life by engaging in tribal feuds, and predatory excursions upon each other; and though they pride themselves upon the strict observance of the duties of hospitality so long as a stranger is within their tents or houses, he is no sooner beyond the limits of the camp or the shelter of the roof than they are ready to rob and, perhaps, murder him; all comers being considered fair game.

These nomad tribes, as represented by their various chiefs, pay tribute to the Ameer of Cabul, and, besides furnishing a contingent for the regular army of Afghanistan, they constitute the bulk of the militia upon which the Ameer can draw in an emergency. In all other respects they seem to be quite independent of the Government at Cabul. The fixed population are engaged chiefly in agriculture. They never trade or work at any kind of mechanical handicraft, unless compelled to do so by abject poverty. So thoroughly beneath their dignity are commercial pursuits held to be, that the very small number of Afghans who are tempted to engage in mercantile enterprise invariably leave the actual transaction of their business to Persians or Hindoos. The Afghans, like most mountaineers, are proud of their lineage, and are highly national. Their love of individual freedom, though strong, is exceeded by devotion to the family or clan, and this again yields to their love of country at large. Mr. Elphinstone, with whom subsequent travellers are in perfect agreement, sums up their character as follows:—"Their vices are revenge, envy, avarice, rapacity, and obstinacy; on the other hand, they are fond of liberty, faithful to their friends, kind to their dependents, hospitable, brave, hardy, frugal, laborious, and prudent; and are less disposed than the nations in their neighbourhood to falsehood, intrigue, and deceit." The tribes are further divided into branches which are termed Ooloos, each of which is a commonwealth ruled over by a chief, or master, if small; or if large, by a khan, who is always chosen from the oldest family, and sometimes selected by the Shah, sometimes by the people. These carry on the internal government, civil disputes being settled by the statutes of Mahomed, and criminal justice administered according to Afghan usage, which is founded on the principle of retaliation. Their marriage customs are similar to those of most Mahomedan countries, wives are purchased and regarded as property, a man marries the widow of his deceased brother, and it is a mortal affront for any other man to take her to wife. Sometimes the bridegroom earns his wife as Jacob did Rachel. Polygamy is permitted, but not largely practised, the poor contenting themselves with one wife, and the middle class with two, and perhaps as many concubines. The wives of the rich live in luxury and indolence, but those of the poor labour both in the household and in the field. In some tribes the smallest familiarity before marriage is strictly forbidden, whilst in others an excessive and perilous degree of it is allowed. Education is conducted much as in the conterminous countries, the children of the poor are taught by a moollah (schoolmaster) to read the Koran and say their prayers; the rich employ private tutors, whilst students intended for the learned professions go to colleges. Literature is at a very low ebb. The Pooshtoo language is an original stock, embracing a good deal of Persian, with some Zend and Sanscrit words, and the character used in writing it is the Niskee form of the Persian alphabet. Very few works of repute exist in the language. The Afghans are all Mahomedans of the Soonee persuasion, but they are very tolerant of other faiths. Christians sustain neither persecution nor reproach; they being called people of the book, as deriving their tenets from a written source, which the natives themselves respect, instead of pagans, as the Hindoos, who have to pay a slight tax. The Sheahs are more detested than any other sect, yet many of them hold important offices. Soofeeism (free-thinking) is very common and gaining ground, although denounced by the moollahs and priests, who are mostly bigoted, avaricious, and hypocritical, as well as arrogant. The Afghans are very social in their habits, they delight in dinner-parties, and are fond of listening to love songs sung to an accompaniment of guitars, fiddles, and hautboys; and to the marvellous fairy tales of the professional story-tellers. They smoke a great deal, and take much snuff, of a finely-powdered kind, like the Scotch. They are also fond of the chase, and of all kinds of sports, and they habitually train cocks, quails, rams, dogs, and even camels to engage in combat."

ORIGIN AND ANCIENT HISTORY

From what stock the Afghans have sprung is a difficult matter to determine. They themselves have a tradition that they are descended from the ten tribes whom Shalmaneser carried away captive after the destruction of Samaria, but no proof is advanced in support of the statement. Afghanistan Proper may be said to date as a nation from a period a little before the Norman conquest of England. We have little information with respect to it till about 997 A.D., when Monsoor, a Tartar chief, held sway to the north-west of what is now our Indian frontier, and on his death one of his officers, Sebek-Taghee, seized the opportunity to carve for himself, out of Tartar territory, an independent State, of which Ghuznee was made the capital. In later times the dominant power has been exercised by the tribe of Dooraunees, which was founded by Ahmed Shah, who was crowned in 1747, taking the title of Doree Dooran (the Pearl of the Age). He was a prudent politician and a successful warrior, and at his death the monarchy passed to his son Timour, a slothful and indolent prince, who not only made no effort to extend his dominions, but actually submitted to encroachment upon his own territory. After his death, his five sons engaged in a civil war for the possession of the throne, to which each laid claim. Zemaun Shah secured the crown for a time, but was ultimately compelled to yield to his elder brother Mahmoud, by whom he was imprisoned and deprived of sight, a cruelty which he himself had previously practised upon another brother, Hoomayun. Mahmoud had soon to give place to another brother, Shujau Shah, who put him into prison, but spared his sight, a clemency which Mahmoud repaid on regaining his freedom by reappearing in arms against him. The result was disastrous to Shujau, who fled to Lahore, where he was plundered and confined by Runjeet Singh, but he ultimately escaped and took refuge in British territory. Mahmoud owed his success to the talents of his Vizier, Futteh Khan; but Kamram, the son of Mahmoud, persuaded his father to imprison him and put out his eyes, and the Minister was eventually murdered. The numerous brothers of the Vizier, alarmed at this piece of cruelty, fled to their strongholds, and raised a rebellion throughout the kingdom. Mahmoud fled to Herat, where he died, his son Kamram succeeding to such authority as he had been able to retain, and the rest of the country passing into the hands of various chiefs—the most able and active of whom was Dost Mahomed Khan. This brings us down to the period immediately preceding

THE LAST AFGHAN WAR

In the year 1837 the conduct of Russian agents in the countries lying to the westward of India induced the British Government to seek an alliance with Dost Mahomed Khan, but their overtures were rejected, and the consequence was that the exiled Prince, Shah Shujau, was adopted by them as a protégé, and a military expedition was organised for the purpose of restoring him to the throne from which he had been expelled. A force of over 28,000 men, under the command of Sir John Keane, invaded the country, and though it was attended by some difficulties and privations, it successfully pursued its way to Kandahar, where Shah Shujau was solemnly enthroned in May, 1839. On the 23rd of the same month Ghuznee was taken by storm, and on the 7th of August the victors entered Cabul, from which Dost Mohamed had fled, and the war was thought to be over. But the illusion was soon dispelled.

On the 2nd of November a rising took place in Cabul, and an attack was made upon Sir Alexander Burnes's dwelling, in which he and his brother were killed. The British force occupying Cabul consisted of about 16,000 men, including camp followers. General Elphinstone withdrew all his troops into the cantonment, leaving the commissariat fort, containing all his supplies, to be guarded by a few troops, who speedily abandoned their post. From this moment the resistance of the British troops was only a question of time, as every day brought them closer to starvation. After a month of spiritless defence, during which the numbers of the enemy had enormously increased, negotiations were resorted to. But it soon became clear that Akbar Khan, the leader, was only trying to gain time, and to add to the miserable prospects of the garrison a heavy fall of snow covered the ground. Six weeks after the rising a pretended programme was submitted to the British Envoy, to which he assented, and in accordance with which, unaccompanied by any escort, he went to meet Akbar Khan. Sir William Macnaghten paid with his life for his credulity. He was shot through the head by Akbar Khan, and his body was exposed in the principal bazaar of Cabul. A convention under which the British were to leave Afghanistan and have safe conduct to the frontier was subsequently agreed to, and General Elphinstone, on the 6th of January, marched out with upwards of 4,000 fighting men and 12,000 camp followers. Almost immediately the massacre commenced: the rear guard was attacked, the guns captured, and every mile the army traversed had to be won with the sword. Want of food and excessive cold paralysed the native troops, so that they were cut down without any attempt at resistance. The soldiers of the 44th Regiment were destroyed almost to a man. General Elphinstone surrendered to Akbar Khan, and eight ladies, including Lady Sale and Lady Macnaghten, put themselves under his protection. At Jugdulluck, only thirty-five miles from Cabul, there were, with the exception of a few prisoners, 300 survivors out of the 16,500; and of these the only one left seven days after leaving the capital was Dr. Brydon, who died a short time since. Shah Shujau met the same fate as so many of his English supporters, and died by an assassin's hand. As soon as the dreadful news reached the Indian Government a force of 12,000 men, under General Pollock, was sent to avenge our honour, and punish the treachery of the Afghans. It successfully fought its way through the Khyber Pass, and, joining Sir Robert Sale, who for four months had gallantly held the town of Jellalabad, and obtaining a victory over Akbar Khan, it advanced to Cabul, whither General Nott from Kandahar had also marched. The abandoned city was destroyed, the European prisoners rescued, and the British army finally withdrew from Afghanistan.

RECENT POLITICAL CHANGES

Dost Mahomed, who had surrendered himself to us during the war, was set at liberty, and, returning to Cabul, regained the allegiance of his subjects. Subsequently, in 1857, a treaty of alliance was concluded with him, and a mission under Major Lumsden was sent to assist him in organising his forces to resist the Persians, who had begun an attack upon his western frontier. In 1858 the heir apparent to the throne of Cabul died suddenly, and Shere Ali Khan was nominated heir, to the exclusion of an elder brother. The natural consequence of this has been that since the death of Dost Mahomed in 1863 the country has been the scene of perpetual strife among his sons. Shere Ali, the present occupant of the throne, in 1864 obtained a great victory over one of his brothers—who surrendered to him on promise of good treatment, but was treacherously cast into prison.

Shere Ali himself has had five sons, two of whom are dead. The eldest fell, in 1865, at the head of his father's army, in a hand-to-hand encounter with his uncle, Amin Khan, who was a claimant to the throne. Abdullah Jan, the youngest and favourite son of the Ameer, who was then nominated heir-apparent, died quite recently, and it is a matter of doubt whom the Ameer will now appoint as his successor. His three surviving sons appear to have little chance; the eldest, Ibrahim Khan, though loyal to his father, is a man of no capacity and little popularity; Yakoob, the next in age, who seems to have some military genius, and is more ambitious, has been imprisoned by his father since 1874; whilst the third, Ayub, after making a vain attempt to raise a rebellion in his brother Yakoob's cause in 1874, fled into Persia, and has ever since remained in exile. It is thought that Shere Ali's choice will fall upon his grandson Ahmed Ali, the son of Mahomed Ali, who is now about seventeen years of age.

The gradual approach of the Russians towards our Indian frontier has long been a source of anxiety to the British Government. At the beginning of the last century their advanced forts were 2,500 miles distant from those of the English. Towards the close of the century the distance was lessened to 2,000 miles, and early in the present century was further reduced to 1,000. Since the Crimean War they have crept up to within 400 miles. It is therefore easy to understand that the advent of a Russian Mission at Cabul should have been regarded with suspicion, and that Lord Lytton should have sought to neutralise its influence by endeavouring to open negotiations with the Ameer. Whether Shere Ali's refusal to admit our envoy to his dominions was the result of Russian instigation is at present unknown, but we shall soon learn whether the Czar intends to help the Ameer to defend his country. Of course much might be secretly done by Russia, by supplying rifles, mitrailleuses, and the like; but even if the Afghans be left entirely to their own resources, the invasion of the country cannot but cost us much blood and treasure. The Ameer has a standing army, consisting of twenty regiments of infantry, seven of cavalry, and a small force of artillery; besides which there is the militia, which probably includes nearly every adult male in the kingdom. The infantry are armed with flintlocks, modern rifles, crooked swords, and "kindjals;" the cavalry with pikes, matchlocks, "kindjals," and crooked swords. It is said that their drill is entrusted to Anglo-Indian deserters, and carried on in accordance with English rule, the word of command being given in our language; and that a fair degree of success in tactics and manœuvring has been attained. The natural defences of the country are very strong, all the approaches running through difficult mountain passes, which are further strengthened by forts, perched here and there, upon the overlooking heights; and besides this, the independent hill-tribes are little likely to be bound by any promises which they may make in return for the bribes which they are ever ready to accept. Then, too, every town and village in the country has its wall, and innumerable towers are scattered about the country for the protection of the cultivated grounds, and the grazing cattle.

According to the latest intelligence, out of 15,000 British troops now under orders, 6,000 will proceed to Thall in the Koorum Valley, and 6,000 viâ the Indian Valley Railway and Jacobabad, to Quetta, and a reserve of 6,000 will form at Mooltan or Sukkur, where the required siege train will be collected. General Roberts commands the Kohat force, and General Biddulph that of Quetta, whilst the reserves are under General Stewart. Lord Lytton intends remaining at Lahore during the winter. The troops are very enthusiastic, but it is said that the expeditions will not cross the frontier until after the winter is over (a statement probably intended to be re-telegraphed to India). General Havelock suggests that the Ameer should be allowed until the 15th inst. to consider his position, and then that in the event of his remaining obstinate, the British forces should on that date divide into four columns, and, entering by the Khyber, Koorum, Gomal, and Bolan Passes, advance simultaneously on Cabul and Kandahar.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

OUR engravings and the following description are all taken from an illustrated work on Afghanistan, published in 1848, by the late James Rattray, Esq., a Lieutenant in the 2nd Grenadiers, Bengal Army.

THE TEMPLE OF AHMED SHAH, KANDAHAR

This temple, in which rest the remains of Ahmed Shah, the founder of the Douraunee tribe, stands upon a raised platform near the palace, or Citadel. It is built of white stone, with Turkish arches, decorated with coloured tiles, and painted with great taste. The ensemble thrown up by the dark tints of the Bullock's Hump mountain, rising in quaint and jagged outlines behind it, and viewed through the peculiarly transparent atmosphere, is charming in the extreme. Ahmed Khan, the "Faultless King," was the greatest sovereign the country ever produced, and all Eastern nations, whether friend or foe, still speak in terms of admiration of his military skill, his nobleness of heart, his clemency, and his decision of character. His virtues were as numberless as his victories, he was fond of study, and was a great patron of men of learning and piety. In his latter years he was anxious to acquire the reputation of a saint, and his wishes have been fulfilled, for his Temple is regarded as the very perfection of sanctity, and is resorted to as a place of retirement by nobles or chiefs, who, discontented with, or tired of the world, profess to meditate and pray there. I believe that no European has ever been permitted to cross the threshold of this holy edifice, and though I and others often essayed it, no sooner did we show our unbelieving heads at the outer courtyard, than the Moolahs and Hadjees (pilgrims), who abounded there, drove us away with hoots and cries of disgust.

THE AFGHAN FOOT SOLDIERS

THE summer dress of the Afghan infantry soldier consists of a blue, red, or white loose shirt, worn outside the full trousers; a "kummerbund" (waist-belt) of muslin, and a plaid scarf of silk and cotton mixture, from which hangs the "kummurkusa," or ammunition pouch, of embroidered Russia leather, with a variety of useful articles, including a small hammer, a gun-pick, a knife, a rosary, amulets, relics, and little bags full of texts and prayers, which they believe will preserve them from danger or death. The head-gear is either a close-fitting skull-cap or a high flowing turban. In winter, in addition to the "cameez," or shirt, they wear the "neemcha," a kind of half-jacket of tanned sheepskin, with the wool inside, the outside being tastefully embroidered with silk; and in place of the full trousers, thick black cloth ones are substituted, fastened with rope round the waist, and bound with the same material from the ankle to the knee. Their arms are short iron spears, shields of buffalo or rhinoceros hide, "choras," straight knives, twenty-five to thirty-five inches in length, blunderbusses, called "sherebuchas" (lion whelps), "tofungs," matchlocks, with barrels forty-six inches long, and stocks inlaid with ivory, brass, or silver; curved swords and "juzzails." These last are large heavy rifles, resembling a wall-piece in size, and fixed in an iron forked rest when fired; but which, notwithstanding their calibre, they fling across their shoulders, and handle with great dexterity, while they spring from rock to rock, or swarm hand-over-hand the hanging precipice. One of these formidable weapons, which I picked up at Kandahar had the whole length of the stock inlaid with rows of teeth. The Afghan has no idea of proper proportions in loading. He places a bullet in his half-closed hand and pours powder on it until it is covered, then rams the two down together, careless which reaches the bottom of the barrel first. Sometimes he uses a rude pair of scales, one side of which consists of a string of glass or leaden beads, or an iron tube filled with gravel to weigh against the powder, which is of very coarse grain. The bullets are always cast in a jagged mould, that they may cause a tearing wound, and when lead is scarce pebbles are used as a substitute.

INTERIOR OF THE CITY OF KANDAHAR

THE ancient city of Kandahar is believed by the Afghans to have been built by Alexander the Great, but since that period two more recent cities have been destroyed by earthquakes or abandoned for new sites. North-west of the present (the fourth) city, which was built by Ahmed Shah, under a hill called Chihel Zeenah (forty ornaments), lie the vast ruins of one of these ancient cities. Towards the left of the sketch is seen the tomb of Ahmed Shah; to the right a mosque, the Balla Hissaur, and the citadel. The buildings in the foreground are all more or less dilapidated, from the frequency of earthquakes. This, however, serves to show their interior structure. The roofs are mostly dome-shaped, as, unlike flat roofs, they require no timber, which is extremely scarce in this part of the country. Kandahar is situated in the centre of a fertile and well-cultivated plain encircled by mountains. Every hill and building around has some singular title, and each has its legend. Here, too, are magic grottoes, spots where virgins were turned to stones, and where miracles were performed by despairing lovers; and solitary caves where eminent saints practised their austerities for centuries. The city is an oblong square, four miles round its ramparts. It has six gates, and four principal streets which meet in the centre of the town, where the Nakarra Khana, or royal band-room, is situated. Several streams, crossed by small bridges, run through the city, and the streets were once shaded by avenues of trees, but of these few remain. The city is divided into a number of walled divisions, where each peculiar family or clan takes up its abode. Viewed from without there is little to catch the eye, as nothing is visible above the high walls, except Ahmed Shah's tomb, the summits of a few minarets, and the upper parapets of the citadel. But the interior, as seen from the battlements, cannot fail to delight. Mud houses partly in ruins; square houses of red brick, with doors and windows of Turkish arches; the lofty habitations of the Hindoo; the tents pitched here and there on the flat house-tops, the long terraces crowded with people, the high enclosures of the different tribes, the castles of the chieftains, with the domed houses, mosques, turrets, and cupolas, form a panorama pleasing to look upon.

CABUL, AND THE BRITISH CANTONMENTS

The Afghans assert that Cabul is six thousand years old, and that the Arch Enemy fell there when driven out of Heaven. The present city was built by Mahmoud, and before the visit of the avenging British army in 1842 was a handsome and busy city full of bazaars. Mr. Rattray proceeds: "A few months rolled on, and I again entered their mighty city. Great and terrible changes had taken place. Razed houses and blackened walls met my view. The city was deserted. We rode through the streets without encountering a living soul, or hearing a single sound, save the yelp of a half-wild dog, and the echoes of our own suppressed voices and of our horses' hoofs, sent back through the long grim avenues of the closed bazaars. Our countrymen had perished miserably by the knife of the wild mountain tribes. Merchant, husbandman, and citizen, all had forsaken their occupation and risen as one man to revel in the gore of the detested foreigner; and now upon our approach they had all fled from the city. Our Cabul forces lay cantoned on a piece of low ground on the road to Kohistan, and was surrounded by a diminutive rampart. To the north of the cantonments and attached to them was the Mission Compound (the Envoy's residence), which occupied an immense space, larger than the entrenched camp itself, and was surrounded by the houses of the Mission and the body-guard. The three prominent squares above the scattered lines of soldiery were the officers' quarters, the 13th Light Infantry occupied the building to the extreme right, the 35th Bengal Light Infantry the centre, and the 37th Native Infantry that to the left, which flanked the orchards occupied by the Generals and Staffs, in advance of the square of the Mission. The treacherous assassination of our Envoy and Minister took place on a slight eminence 500 yards from the eastern ramparts. The cantonments were commanded on all sides by hills and forts, opposite the south-west angle was Mahommed Naib Shurreef's castle, to the east was a broad, impassable canal, and several forts only a few hundred yards distant, whilst to the north was the village of Be-Maroo, near a low range of hills of the same name. The name Be-Maroo (without a husband) is derived from a virgin who was buried there. Doubtless our subsequent annihilation may be ascribed in the first instance to the unaccountable absence of judgment or military skill which selected such a position for an army in the heart of a half-conquered country; a cantonment which troops could neither quit nor enter without running the gauntlet of a tremendous fire poured into them from fortress, garden, village, hill, and wall, which hemmed in and commanded every face of the ill-contrived and widely scattered lines."

SHAH SHUJAU'S EXECUTIONERS

THESE portraits of Mahommed Shah, a Ghiljye of Zoormut, and Gowpur, a Populzye of Kandahar, give but an indistinct notion of the truly grotesque and demoniacal appearance of the King's "Nassnukchibaushis," or executioners. To judge of them correctly, they should be viewed in a body of some hundreds, dressed in crimson jackets, and bearing on their heads their high fantastic caps of every conceivable semblance. Some are ornamented with huge ears like asses', or spikes like those of porcupines, while others take the form of goat or buffalo horns, and many are conical, spiral, or bell-shaped, all being more or less decorated with rude figures and devices, and some bearing a spear-head as an emblem of superior rank. The seated executioner was a gentleman by birth, who rode before the sovereign. In his hand is the painted wand, surmounted by a bird, indicative of his being the head of a family. This fashion of dress is of very remote origin, and I have been told has been derived from a practice observed in the times of the ancient Roman Emperors, whose courtiers assumed this extravagant costume. If the dress alone of these people strike the beholder with astonishment, when seen in their peaceable vocation of running breathlessly before the Shah, as they clear the way with staves and shouts, how must they chill the Christian man with horror when pursuing their murderous calling! They seldom kill outright, but rip up, hack, and saw their unhappy victims, and leave the bodies to public exposure. None dare to make death sure, or render succour, for their sufferings are supposed to act as an example to others, and make atonement for sins committed. At the first capture of Ghuznee seventy Afghan prisoners were summoned before the Shah, who upbraided them as rebels. One of them, more exasperated than the rest, stabbed a "Peish-khidmut" in open court. The whole of the seventy were immediately doomed to death. They were taken outside the camp, pinioned back to back, and huddled together, some sitting, some standing, some lying prostrate. Then, jumping from one to another, and brandishing their long strong knives, the blood-stained ministers of vengeance hacked at their heads and necks at random, resting themselves between times until the seventy were all butchered.

THE FORTRESS OF GHUZNEE

Of Ghuznee, the capital of a mighty empire which, eight hundred years ago, under the famous Sultan Mahmoud, extended its sovereignty from the mountains of Armenia to the banks of the Ganges, only a single fortress remains. In the twelfth century the Kings of Ghore conquered the Ghuzneevide monarchs, and rased their capital to the ground. A damaged reservoir, several dilapidated "musjeeds," two lofty minarets, the tomb of the Emperor, and some architectural fragments, have alone survived the fury of war and the wreck of ages to point out the former site of this magnificent city of palaces. The town stands on the extreme point of a range of hills which slope upwards, and command the north-eastern angle of the Balla Hissaur, near which, among ruined mosques and gravestones, is perched the tomb of Behoole the Wise. As a city it will not bear comparison with Cabul or Kandahar, but it possesses snug houses and capital stabling sufficient for a cavalry brigade within its walls, and in the citadel particularly the squares and mansions were spacious and princely in their decorations. The accompanying sketch was taken from outside the Kandahar Gate on the west of the city, which has two other outlets, the Cabul Gate and the Water Gate, so-called from the Cabul River, which flows close by its walls. On entering the town from the Cabul Gate the ascent to the Citadel is very abrupt, as it is built on the highest point of th hill. In a spacious square to the right of the bastion of the Balla Hissaur may be seen in this sketch a building called the "Dewaun Khauna," or Hall of Audience of Dost Mahomed, the interior of which is shown in another of our engravings. In front of this edifice stood the famous brass 68-pounder, "Jubber Jung" (the mighty in battle), which at the second siege of Ghuznee was worked with such precision that General Nutt was compelled to shift his ground three times to get out of its range. In a room beneath the right bastion of the Citadel, the officers of the 27th Native Infantry were confined for five months, huddled together in a space measuring only 18 ft. by 13 ft., without light or fuel, although the thermometer was 14° below zero. The place swarmed with vermin, and the whole party suffered terribly, their clothes rotting off their bodies; and they were constantly abused and threatened with death. Among the few relics of Ghuznee's ancient magnificence are two minarets remarkable for beauty of design and sculpture, which stand about 500 yards distant from each other on the road to the village of Roza. They are of unequal height, and the Afghans have a tradition that the lesser was built at the command of Sultan Mahmoud, by an aged architect, who afterwards threw himself from its summit on finding that one of his pupils had excelled his masterpiece by erecting a loftier and more beautiful structure. In 1842, when Ghuznee was a second time wrested from the Afghans by the British army, fourteen mines were sprung in the citadel, the Balla Hissaur was completely swept away, and the outer and lower fortifications, with the town and bazaar were destroyed, and the whole place left a heap of smoking ruins.

SHAH SHUJAU'S PALACE AT CABUL

AFTER describing the splendid pageant which he witnessed on the occasion of Shah Shujau's return to Cabul from his winter palace at Jellalabad, Mr. Rattray says: "What a terrible revolution had taken place when I visited Cabul a year afterwards. King, Envoy, Resident, and politicals, generals and army, all murdered, swept away; the palace of the proudest monarch in the world defiled by the presence of a military mess; the sacred throne—a lounge, a pitch-and-toss table; the arched windows were now crowded by some of the very officers, smoking and chatting there, who had taken so humble a part in the ceremony of enthronement, and who stood beneath, as little noticed by the haughty monarch as the ground whereon they trod. Even the Afghans themselves had forgotten the former sanctity of the palace, for, as I sketched the interior, the Wuzzeer of the little Prince Shauhpoor (the youngest son of the late Shah, whom we left behind as king), who was of the same tribe, too, as the royal house, stretched himself on the marble throne itself to listen to the fooleries of the Court jester, who was capering about and displaying his juggling antics for our amusement. In the picture he is represented sitting there. The throne is said to be very ancient; it is composed of an octagonal block of white marble, raised on legs of the same material. The arches and pillars of the windows are of wood, carved, and painted. The sides of the room are full of niches, which are embossed in various patterns on the glittering plaster; the ceiling is richly painted in flowers and scrolls."

THE FORTRESS OF ALI MUSJID, AND THE KHYBER PASS

ON entering this celebrated pass the progress of the traveller is impeded by all those terrific obstacles common to the wild

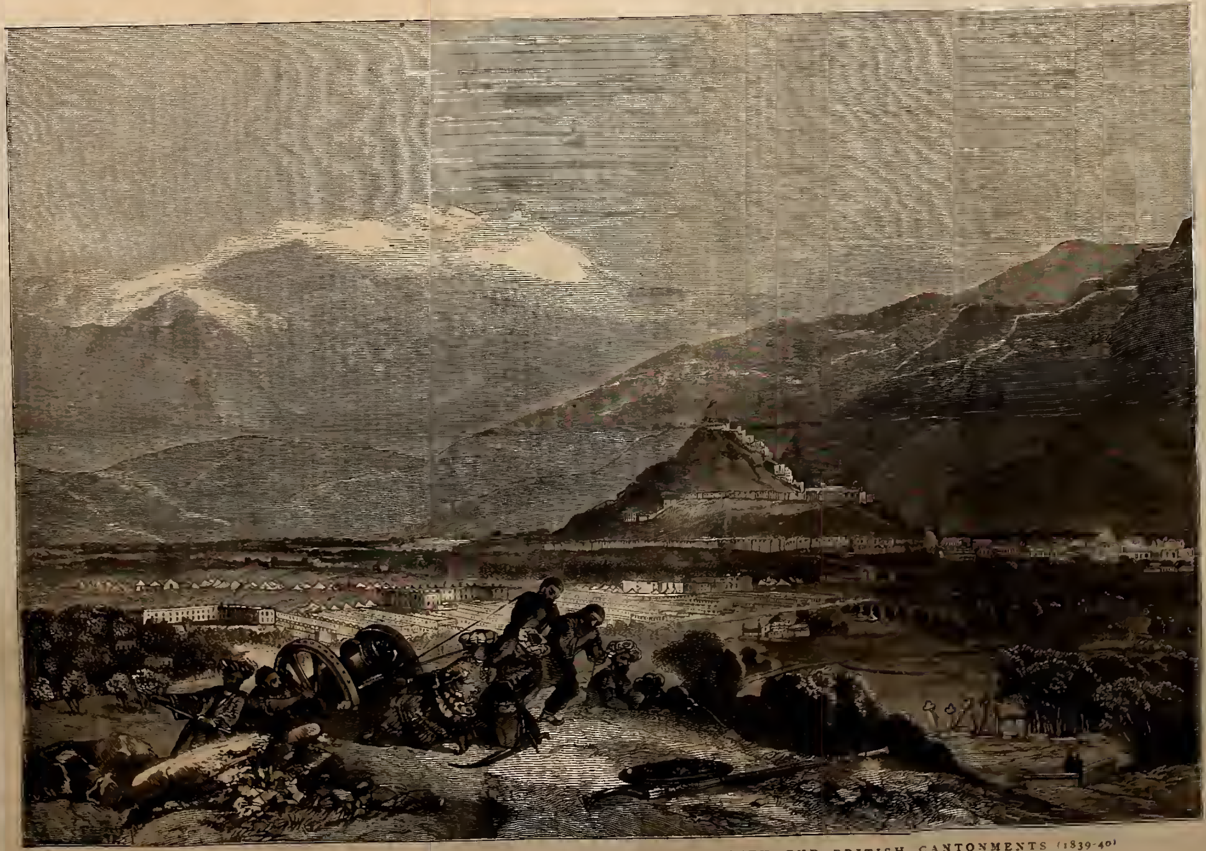
AFGHANISTAN ILLUSTRATED



AFGHANISTAN ILLUSTRATED—CABUL FROM THE BE-MAROO HILL WITH THE BRITISH CANTONMENTS (1839-40) mountain scenery of Afghanistan. The road lies up the stony bed of a river, enclosed on either side by perpendicular cliffs from 100 to 200 feet in height. The ravine varies in width from fifteen yards to a quarter of a mile, and the narrow path to the heights above winds and twists like a spiral staircase, turning at sharp angles and zigzags until it reaches the fortress itself, Ali Musjid (Temple of Ali), which completely commands the line of road called Kaffir Thunghee (Infidel's Pass). The Khyberees who inhabit the hills acknowledge no chief, but are divided into a number of petty clans or tribes. They live in caves in the hill-sides, climbing higher and higher as the weather waxes warm, and gradually descending in the winter. They are filthily dirty, mean, cunning, and treacherous, much addicted to robbery and murder, and they levy black mail upon all who pass through their haunts. They received heavy toll from both sides during the war of 1839—42, and they will probably do the same in the coming contest. The present fortress, the commander of which behaved so insultingly to our Mission, must be of recent construction, for Lieut. Rattray goes on to say, "While on the extreme rear-guard of General Nott's division, I had been taking the accompanying sketch from the Kaffir Thunghee, and had scarcely completed it, when suddenly a report was heard, and, to my utter astonishment, walls and bastions composing the fortress blew up simultaneously into the air, like a whirlwind of sand, and so completely was it swept from off the summit of the mountain, that when the dense cloud cleared away not a vestige of the building remained."

THE VALLEY AND THE GROVE OF JUGDULLUK

On leaving Cabul in October, 1842, our route lay through those same dark narrow defiles which some nine months before had been trodden in blood by our ill-fated army. Though throughout the valley of Cabul to the gorge of Boodkark skeletons scattered here and there prepared us in a manner for what was to follow; no fables yet feigned, or fear ever conceived a scene so sickening as that which we had to encounter. In the Koord Cabul, a defile five miles long, hemmed in by almost perpendicular mountains, the skeletons of 3,000 men were piled one upon another. It was a fearful thing to hear the crackle of the bones as the gun-wheels smashed them into powder. As we wound down the staircase-like summits of Huft Khootul, three miles long, the dreadful spectacle increased in horror, for between there and Tazeen the bodies of 9,000 soldiers and camp-followers (besides cattle) strewed the road. The frost had wonderfully preserved the corpses, which, though having a dried, mummy-like appearance, were in many instances perfectly recognisable from the complexion, shape of features, colour of hair, and remnants of clothing which still hung about them. Twenty-three miles from Tazeen lies the Valley of Judduluk. Between its stupendous walls of blackened granite remnants of barricades still stood in many places. They were interlaced with bones, skulls, branches of trees, and pieces of rock, and close by were piles of whitening skeletons. The holes in the rock were filled with bodies so choked together that it was hard to conceive how they could have got there. The ruined fort on the right of the sketch was the scene of awful destruction, the worn-out remnant of the army who crept for shelter between its walls was deliberately butchered by the merciless enemy. The slaughter was immense, and the few who managed to escape were all killed before reaching Futtehabad, with the exception of six officers, who there met with the same fate, Dr. Brydon alone remaining to tell the disastrous story. "Why," inquires Lieutenant Rattray, "were those skeletons permitted to remain above ground as everlasting monuments of our weakness and disgrace? Had each successive regiment of the armies passing over them buried, during its brief halt, a portion of those bones, they would have been shut out effectively at least from the gloating eyes, if not from the memories of their slayers; nor would our haste to retreat from the charnel-house have been impeded by this act of decency and duty to our countrymen. Why have the brave been thus abandoned to the insults of a whole nation?"

THE BAZAAR AND CITADEL OF KANDAHAR

The Nakarra Khana, from the terrace of which this sketch was taken, is the room where the Royal Band plays. It is situated in the centre of the city, in a domed building called the Charsoo, beneath which is a covered space, where proclamations and public orders are read, where the mutilated bodies of malefactors are exposed, and where the best shops for every variety of merchandise are located. Nothing can surpass the stunning and unearthly music of His Majesty's band. The performers attempt only three or four notes, repeated in regular rotation on a dozen deafening drums, discordant horns, and hoarse speaking-trumpets, from the most dismal bass to a high braying treble, the whole burthen of the strain being "Shah Shujah—Shah—uh—Shu—jan." These reverberations, heard for miles around, proclaim the entrance of the Sovereign and the Princes, and serve likewise to mark the divisions of the day, as the band plays at daybreak, mid-day, and midnight, after which hour until the morning beat, no one can appear in the streets under pain of imprisonment and fine. The bazaar, extending on this side from the Charsoo to the citadel, was always a gay, thronged, and ever-changing scene, crowded to suffocation with wild tribes and people as various and extraordinary as the goods in which they dealt. The lofty and spacious edifice which we pass on our left from the Charsoo to the citadel is a mosque, sacred by reason of the enshrinement of the Prophet's shirt. Beyond the citadel and ramparts is a plain bounded by a range of mountains, whose rugged outlines appear above the walls, and in front of the same fortification is the square where the Douraunee chief, Ukram Khan, was blown to pieces from the mouth of a gun.

LADIES OF CABUL

The lady Shukkr Lub (sugar lips), the seated figure in this sketch, was the favourite wife of a former Governor of Baumiann, and a niece by marriage of Dost Mahomed. She was a Kuzzilbaushe belle of the first water, and the description of her dress will indicate that of her countrywomen generally. Her long black hair, allowed to enshroud her whole figure, was divided into a hundred strings of gilded plaits. The back of her head was covered with a golden skull cap, adorned with coins of the same metal, while splendid jewels, set in peculiar workmanship, hung from her nose and ears. Her eyes were dyed with "soormah" (antimony), which, put on with a bodkin drawn between the closed eyelids, gives to the organ that almond-shape so much admired. Her brows by artificial means assumed a crescent shape, the dye extending down either side of the nose, and a shawl pattern was painted between the arches. Her neck and cheeks were also dotted with moles, and rouge, and henna stained her hands, feet, fingers, nails, and toes a deep brown colour. These women amuse themselves indoors with their pipes, embroidery, and conversation. They are fond of gossip, but their toilette is the chief object of their existence. A few read, but writing is considered highly improper, as conducing to mischief and intrigues. Their habiliments are a loose shirt of crimson, or some other bright coloured silk or satin, braided with gold lace, open at the bosom, and fastened at the throat by a brooch or jewel; a chintz jacket, resembling an hussar's, adorned with loops and buttons, with wide sleeves pointed at the cuffs, and caught by a stud at the wrist, to display the flowing shirt beneath, and trowsers of rich velvet, or kimboh, edged with a massive band of gold, the joining of which is fringed out into a tassel. When out of doors they don an immense white sheet, reaching from the top of the skull cap to the feet; a large square veil, attached to the back of the head by a jewelled clasp, conceals the face, across which is an opening of network to admit light and air, long loose boots of white calico fastened above the knee, with silken garters embroidered with texts from the Koran, and other inscriptions, complete their outfit. They sit astride on horseback, generally behind their husbands, but when alone the animal is led. Though the ladies of Afghanistan are strictly under the "purdah" (curtain), they enjoy life more, and exercise greater influence over their husbands than is the case in most Eastern countries. They may often be seen riding on horseback, tripping along the crowded bazaars, or listening to the story of some Persian story-teller. On such occasions they keep closely veiled, but they also make frequent excursions to sequestered spots, and then they throw off their disguise and restraint together. I have occasionally come suddenly upon a group of them before they had time to veil themselves, or scud away like startled antelopes, and found the young girls strikingly handsome, though to a European taste their regular features were somewhat disfigured by rouge, white paint, and beauty spots.

A ROUMANIAN WAR BALLAD

INTRODUCTORY

Basil Alecsandri, the author of "Penes Curcanul," is a Moldavian gentleman of ancient lineage and considerable fortune, who has for the last thirty years been unanimously recognised by his countrymen as the first of modern Roumanian poets. From foreign intrigues and home politics, the almost exclusive occupations of men bearing historic names and holding high provincial station in the Principalities, he has resolutely and consistently kept aloof; devoting his whole life to the cultivation of his property, amelioration of his tenants' moral and physical condition, and the production of literary works which have made his name justly famous in every European country peopled by the Latin races. Very recently the prize awarded by the "Society of Roman Languages" to the finest poem upon "The Latin Races" was conferred by the jury, assembled for that purpose at Montpellier, upon Alecsandri's "Canteeul Gintei Latine."

To Alecsandri, Negri, and Bolintineanu, may justly be ascribed the revival of the Roumanian tongue as a literary language—its purification from many of the barbarisms imported into it by Turks and Sclaves during the frequent foreign occupations of the Dacian Principalities—and the definitive regulation of its orthography, as well as its emancipation from the hideous thraldom of the Cyrillic Alphabet, which, hedging round the acquisition of Roumanian with difficulties that proved equally prohibitive to the foreigner and the native, was slowly but surely degrading the language to the rank of a mere proletarian dialect, forlorn of grammar, indefinite as to its spelling, and defaced by innumerable alien overgrowths. Roumanian, forty years ago, exhibited all the symptoms of inevitable decay, and was regarded by many of the more cultivated and ambitious Moldo-Wallachians as a doomed tongue, the poverty and obsoleteness of which afforded sufficient justification for its dismissal to the limbo of extinct idioms; when the poets above named, aided by the historian and journalist, Michael Cogulniceanu, by Nicholas Balcescu, John Ghika, Donici, Negruzzi, and Voinescu, awakened it from a trance which already resembled death, and, but for their collective energy, would certainly have terminated in dissolution.

Alecsandri has at different times published collections of his poetical works, some few of which have been translated into French prose. The latest of these recueils contains a dozen or so of songs and metrical narratives suggested by the late war, in which the Roumanian army played so valiant and distinguished a part. These short poems are instinct with patriotic pride, tempered by the melancholy engendered in their author's soul by the fruitless sufferings and sacrifices undergone by his brave and kindly countrymen, the victims of dishonest intrigue, brutal rapacity, heartless ingratitude, and atrocious treachery.

Alecsandri's chivalrous and loving heart has been wrung by his country's woes; but it has also throbbed passionately in response to the gallant deeds of her heroic sons, and has poured forth its sorrows and joys in verse that has already become an integral part of Roumanian folk-lore.

From his war songs and narratives I have selected "Penez Curcanul" for presentation to English ballad lovers, for that it is, of all his latest productions, the one most vividly illustrating Roumanian characteristics. Its title demands explanation as well as translation. The Roumanian Dorobanisi, or Militia, wear an uniform differing in more than one essential respect from that worn by the Ostasu, or regular troops of the line. One of their distinctive sumptuary attributes is a plume of real feathers inserted in the side of the caciula or sheepskin cap, which, in common with every Roumanian peasant, they wear as a head covering. According to the original clothing regulations laid down for the Dorobanisi when they were first constituted a national armed force, this plume was decreed to consist of eagles' feathers; but the military authorities subsequently found it impossible to obtain the necessary supply of so rare and costly an article, and substituted for the plumage of the king of birds that of the humbler monarch of the farm-yard, turkeys being extremely plentiful throughout Moldo-Wallachia. From wearing the turkey's wing in his cap, the Dorobants acquired the popular nickname of "Curcan" or Turkey. "Penes," a feather, is also a not uncommon "front name" in Roumania; and Alecsandri, whose hero is "Penez Curcanel," is a Dorobants, the narrator of his own and his comrades' exploits in the 1877 campaign, has bestowed upon him a twice-punning appellation; making "Feather the Turkey" stand for "Penesh the Militiaman." Such jeux-de-mots are untranslatable from one language into another, as far, at least, as concerns the possibility of rendering the humorous equivalent of the original jest. Nor can any one dealing with two idioms so entirely differing from each other in construction and tournure de phrase as Roumanian and English hope to convey in a translation from the former into the latter tongue any adequate idea of the beauties especially characterising the versification, arrangement of words and syllables, and dashes of local colour that delight the reader of Alecsandri's poems in their native Roumanian. The more faithful to the text the translator, the less can he hope to fulfil the æsthetic portion of his task. Metaphrasis is a deadly foe to the imitation of style, and offers almost insurmountable obstacles to the achievement of metrical identity between the translated and translating verses. Roumanian is a language numerically poor in words, and consequently compact in expression; it teems with elisions and contractions; there are no limits to the liberties which may be taken with it under the pretext of poetical licence. In its poetry lines which to the eye appear to contain twelve and thirteen feet are so pruned by the enforcement of arbitrary signs that they convey to the ear, when properly recited, only eight feet.

The ensuing English version of "Penes Curcanul" has no pretensions to be anything more than a translation, as nearly verbal as is consistent with the reproduction of Alecsandri's metre and rhythm. The exigencies of rhyme have here and there compelled me to depart from his arrangements of words, and even to invert, in one or two cases, the positions of lines. But "Penesh the Turkeycock" will be found, on the whole, to say in English, as far as the mere sense of his utterance goes, pretty nearly what "Penes Curcanel" says in Roumanian. That his narrative, as here given, lacks the vigour and pathos imparted to it by Alecsandri's genius in a language well-nigh as euphonious and manageable as Italian I am too well aware, and can only crave his indulgence, as well as that of all Roumanian scholars who may chance to light upon this translation, for its many shortcomings and weaknesses. W. Beatty-Kingston

Nine of us marched from Vaslui—
Counting the sergeant, ten;
God knows, not one man's heart
Felt cold within him then!
Light as the soaring hawk, whose cries
The mountain echoes rouse,
We sped along, with wingèd heels,
And plumes upon our brows.

Sturdy militia-men were we,
Roumanians, void of fear,
Each man with sandals, cloak, and belt,
And cap cocked on his ear.
"Turkeys" our nick-name, long ago
Given by a jesting clown;
That name our Balkan deeds have made
A title of renown.

Our sunny fields, our homes, and ploughs,
We left, a joyous band,
To free from Turkish yoke our poor
Belovèd native land.
That, Sergeant Matraguna said,
Our duty 'twas to do;—
And so, with trust in God, we marched,
Resolved to do it, too!

Singing with all our might,
Stood still, with admiration filled
At such a gallant sight.
And when they asked us, whether we
To a wedding-feast were bound,
We answered, with a scornful laugh,
"We seek the battle-ground!"

"Good luck go with ye, dearest lads!
We know you'll do your duty!"
Shouted the old men, wives, and priests,
And many a village beauty.
Then loud our beardless sergeant cried,
"Be not with fear opprest!
A Rouman lad has seven lives
Of brass within his breast!"(a)

Who would have thought, as on we marched
Rejoicing, through the land,
That Fate to perish had foredoomed
Our gallant little band!
Behold! of nine that erst we were—
Counting the sergeant, ten—
I, only I remain, to mourn
The death of those brave men.

'Tis cruel when, among the oaks,
The keen, relentless axe
The giants of the leafy glades
Lays low upon their backs!
But black the star (b), whose lurid rays
On Death's sharp hatchet shine
As through our lives he hews his way,
And stretches us supine!

Ah! bring me, friends, a brimming cup
Of water from the spring,
That I may quench my burning thirst,
Allay my sorrow's sting.
Mine eyes are filled with blinding sparks,
My grief is deep and dour,
When of my comrades dear I think,
All cut down in their flower.

The shepherd, Cobuz, on his flute
At Kalafat was playing;
And we the Hora gaily danced
Whilst shells were round us straying;

A jagged splinter rushing came,
And screaming on its way,
Poor Cobuz's skull it battered in,
And spoilt our dance that day.

Just three days after that we crossed
The Danube at its worst,
And pitched our tents upon the plains
Round Plevna the accurst.
In front of us loomed Grivitza,
And gave us dreadful pause,
That grisly monster, crouching there,
With hidden teeth and claws!

But we crouched also like the snake
When watching for his prey,
And racked our brains to think how we Might seize that monster grey;
From dawn to dawn the Turks and we,
We rent the skies with lead
Like barley-grains in handfuls thrown
To pigeons, when they're fed.

The earth shook with the cannon's roar,
The shells came thick and fast,
Dismally moaning through the air,
As moans the tempest-blast.
The Turk was hidden in his trench
Like bear within his den;
And, whilst we fired at earthen walls,
He shot at living men.

Poor Tsintses was a gunner smart,
And every shot he sped
The Turkish ant-hill smote with might,
And struck some Pagan dead.
But, just at daybreak, from the fort
A bullet came—but one!
Our gallant Tsintses prostrate fell,
And, dying, clasped his gun!

One night, before the trenches, Bran
And Vlad were mounting guard;
The ebon canopy of heaven
With glowing shells was starred:—
At dawn we found them, dead and stark,
All slashed by yataghan,
And, close beside, a gory heap
Of stiffened Mussulman. (c)

Poor lads! full gallantly they strove
Against a pagan band;
A weapon, tightly gripped, was found
In each dead hero's hand.
Alas! to half our little host
Relentless Death had beckoned;—
Five—only five—of us remained,
Or six, the sergeant reckoned.

Then came the day of the assault,
That day of slaughter dire,—
When face to face with Death we stood
Braving the Moslem fire.
Our sergeant then, that dragon's son, (d)
To us did loudly cry,—
"You five and I, my boys, will do
Our duty, ere we die!"

Crossing ourselves, "Please God, we will!"
We answered with a shout;
And then we made a sudden rush
Straight at the grim redoubt.
Great God! how fiercely they attacked,
My gallant comrades all!
How swiftly stormed the bristling trench
And climbed the bastion wall!

We're up at last!—another spring!
Forward! Hurrah!—'tis won!
But many a voice is silenced there,
For Death his work hath done!
A hellish fire encounters us
From out the bastion's face;
A host is stricken down—forthwith
Another takes its place.

Brave Burcel in the trenches died
Amongst the Pagan rout;
"Long live Moldavia!" Shoimu cried,
And fell in the redoubt.
Two brothers Calin, herdsmen both,
Lay writhing in their gore,
Without a groan, in silence stern,
Each man his anguish bore.

And then our valiant captain,
With a red slash 'cross his brow,
Shouted, "Each Turkey-cock must bear (e)
Him like a falcon now!"
Grasping the standard in his hand
He clomb the ladder steep,—
I and the sergeant after him
As close as we could keep.

Through fire, sabres, bullets, smoke,
And thrusts of bayonet,
We upward strove until, at last,
We reached the parapet.
Allah-il-Allah! at us dashed
The Turks with horrid shout;
Roumania's flag we planted high
Upon the grim redoubt.

Hurrah! how nobly in the breeze
Spread out our standard gay!
But we bestrewed the earth, mown down
In that surpassing fray.
Our dying sergeant fiercely gibed
The Turk with his last breath,
And, gazing at our floating flag,
Our captain met his death.

And, as they bore me off the field,
Aloud I feebly cried,
"On this, our day of victory,
Would God that I had died!
And then, when next I oped my eyes
After my wounds were drest,
I found the Cross of Honour laid
Upon my bleeding breast.

Oh! give me back my shattered hand,
Lord of All Power and Might!
And heal my death-wound, that I may Return unto the fight!
This world of ours, I ween, affords
No nobler destiny
Than this—to lead a warrior's life,
And like a hero die.

NOTES.

(b) "Black the star." Stea neagra, the "black star," is an anomaly having its only raison d'être in Roumanian popular superstition, which typifies Adverse Fate or Cruel Destiny as a "black star." Alecsandri, of course, uses it strictly in its figurative sense, and as an image of evil fortune familiar to all classes of his countrymen.

(c) "Mussulman" is a noun of plurality.

(d) "That dragon's son." Puiu de zmeu. A superstition is still prevalent amongst the Roumanian peasantry to the effect that any abnormally valiant, masterful, or physically vigorous man is a son (or rather, a descendant) of a dragon or a giant—mythical beings equally esteemed by a people whose ballad-lore is full of their marvellous exploits. The titles "dragon's son" and "giant's son" will be found in the older Roumanian "cantice batrinesce" applied to Michael the Brave, Stephen the Great, Vlad the Cruel, and other popular heroes of Roumanian traditional history.

(e) "Each Turkey-cock must bear him like a falcon, now!" Another play upon words, in the manner of that presented by Alecsandri in his title to this ballad. Turkey-cock stands here for a punning synonym of Militia-man. The falcon (soimu) is the Roumanian popular type of courage, swiftness, and fierceness.

FASHIONS

THOSE of our readers who are fortunate enough to spend this month in the northern counties must put aside all outdoor costumes of thin materials, as, although the midday sun may be warm, and sometimes even hot, the heat lasts but for a short time, the mornings are chilly, and the dews of autumn are very heavy.

The shooting and hunting seasons are now of almost as much interest to the female as to the male portion of the fashionable world, as the former take more or less share with the latter in these sports. A few hints as to the most useful costumes to be taken for a visit of a month or so to the north of Enlgand or Scotland may be useful to young novices who are making their début in the sporting world. First and most important are the dresses for what may be termed "roughing it," two at the least, if not more, are needful; they should be made of dark materials, but not heavy, for example: a costume of beige, or camel's hair cloth, of fine Scotch tweed or Lowland cloth, in heather mixtures or plain, made with a short round skirt entirely kilted from the bodice to the hem, put into a deep yoke, and fastened at the waist with a leather belt, tight sleeves, plain linen collar; hat of the same material as the dress, with a long gauze veil to match; these veils, by the way, should be fixed on with a strong silver or fancy buckle only, as they require to be ironed and renewed very often. Those personages who consider this style too severe may embellish it thus: the kilting only three quarters of a yard deep, and the front arranged in six or more folds divided by a plastron of plain material, if the foundation be plain, or vice versâ; large buttons of mother-of-pearl and silver, or bone and gilt edges, pockets, yoke, and cuffs to match, the skirt either kilted at the back, or plain, with flat trimmed pockets; sashes or scarves on the skirt are very much in the way for climbing. A plaid put on in the orthodox Highland mode, over the shoulders with the ends tucked in, not only looks stylish, but is very warm and comfortable. A long paletot to match may be worn with these costumes. The only real tartans which can be worn by adults are the "Forty-second" and the "Argyll," both of which make very graceful costumes trimmed with green velvet facings and small gilt or silver buttons, a toque hat with a velvet band and an eagle's feather. A still more striking effect may be produced by a plaid woollen skirt, over which should be worn what is all the rage just now with Parisians out of town, namely, a casquin de fermière, made something in the form of an old-fashioned, swallow-tailed coat, which opens over a waistcoat. The casquin in this case should be of dark green moleskin velveteen, with a Gainsborough hat to match, green velvet waistcoat edged with gold.—For a visiting dress nothing can be prettier than a costume of velvet and poult de soie, or cachemire, in bronze green, ozone black, Bordeaux peacock green, or mahogany brown, made thus: on a silk foundation a plain bodice and skirt of velvet, fastened with small gilt or silver buttons from the throat, half-way down the skirt, when the corners are turned back, faced with velvet, and fastened together on the square demi-train; the velvet skirt is divided at the hips, drawn back, and forms the train, displaying the silk at the hem three quarters of a yard. A long silk waistcoat may be worn, or a double frill of soft wide white lace round the throat, and down the front to the waist, ruffles at the wrist to match. Bonnet with a double brim, and curtain of velvet and silk, relieved by touches of old gold, which must be used very sparingly, as gilt feathers and ornaments have already become very common. For a home dinner dress our old friend and most useful companion, the black silk, must not be neglected, it looks very nice made with a gathered or fluted plastron of black satin; for a slender figure the long tight silk sleeves may be puffed and slashed at the shoulders and elbows with satin. The latest fashion in fichus is made of soft fine Indian muslin, a double square edged with white lace, and fastened with satin bows or loops of two colours across the bosom, and a small bow on the left shoulder; deep lace chemisettes or bibs are also much worn with dark dresses, deep lace cuffs are placed outside the sleeves, and bows of ribbon, either of two colours, reversible, or separate.

The "old masters," foreign and English, are taken as models for the fashions of the day more than ever they were, and the result is most artistic and graceful; to quote the words of a Parisian contemporary: "For fear of not being pretty enough, we consult the great masters. Parisian taste no longer suffices; it is to art galleries we now address ourselves—Rembrandt is the modiste, and Watteau the coiffeur."

We have been asked again and again, "What are the fashionable shapes for bonnets and hats this autumn?" Our invariable answer is, "Whatever suits your face and general appearance, and is most appropriate to the time and occasion when it is to be worn." The endless varieties of form, from the wide-brimmed black, or sombre-coloured Rembrandt, either made in felt, beaver, or velvet, to the small airy toque shape, made of white or some delicate-hued flowers or feathers, are too numerous to catalogue or describe. White felt hats, with moderately wide brims, turned up in the front or at the side, lined with plush, white, or of some rich dark colour, trimmed with fan-shaped bows and long ostrich feathers. Snug little drawn velvet bonnets, lined with pale pink or blue silk, and trimmed with two rosettes of fringed silk, a bébé cap under the brim, may be classed amongst the most universally becoming head-gear of the period. Caps are no longer worn by single girls; but for young and middle-aged matrons they are very stylish. One design, for morning wear, is very neat and becoming: the crown is rather high, terminating below in three gathered runnings drawn up with embossed ribbons, not half-an-inch wide, sometimes minute roses or other flowers, at others plaids form the pattern, they are tied in front with bows and long ends.

Amongst the numerous beautiful materials for evening wear we may mention embossed velvet, striped satin and velvet, pékin, and brocaded silk, Genoa velvet in every shade and hue, shot satin, which is as many tinted as mother-o'-pearl—hand embroidery is very much employed for trimming both morning and evening costumes on the dress itself or on bands of net; some of the designs are veritable works of art executed with consummate skill and taste.

A few words as to bridal costumes in general, for we hear of many weddings to come off this month. A charming model dress for a bride comes from Paris, it consists of a long white satin square train arranged in ample folds from the waist, outlined with a wreath of orange blossom, clematis, and myrtle, the dress of white satin trimmed across the front with puffings of tulle, studded with small bouquets to match the train; floral collarette and wristlets to correspond, small wreath and sprays of orange blossom, a large veil of plain silk tulle, covering the wearer from head to foot, fastened with two diamond stars. The twelve bridesmaids' dresses, in groups of four, are composed respectively of cream colour, evening sky blue and rose pink, made thus: plastrons of satin wide at the shoulders, tapering at the waist and expanding to the hem three-quarters of a yard, arranged in folds; train skirt of grenadine with three wide satin loops, and an end edged with wide Breton lace. The head-dresses are, for the cream-colour, deep yellow roses with faded leaves; for the blue, shaded pink china-asters; for the pink, roses shaded from the deepest crimson to the palest pink; all the bridesmaids wear tulle veils which cover the face as far as the chin, and are long at the back; they are fastened at each side with mother-o'-pearl butterflies.

ALL THE WORLD AT PARIS.—VII.

Panem et Circenses.
An empty stomach has no ears.

WE are to leave Paris to-night; but, if we can get packed up, Papa promises we shall go to the Hippodrome, which every one says we ought to see.

But how are we to stow away all the things we have bought at the Exposition—Austrian glass, Japanese mice, Algerian baskets, a clockwork peacock that struts and spreads its tail, swimming dolls, a Moorish easel, and heaven knows what beside? Hours have passed, and at last everything is in, stamped in by Charlie, and we have counted our packages and parcels—twenty-five in all. Now, Papa dear, for the Pont de l'Alma and the big Hippodrome,—please.

We have been in Rome; we stayed at the Palazzo Pelkinghornia in the Via Babuino, and of course we saw the Colosseum. We saw it by moonlight, and afterwards beautifully illuminated by fireworks. The Paris Hippodrome, colossal in size, open to the sky, with its ten thousand spectators, gave us some idea of what the Colosseum once was. By a stretch of imagination we might be standing in the Colosseum itself, and the illusion was carried further when Roman chariots rushed round the arena.

The charioteers were women. They should have been four in number, dressed severally in white, red, blue, and green, the colours of the Roman and Byzantine factions, so Charlie said. They pass and repass one another. The people fill the amphitheatre with shouts. There is one, coming up on the inner curve, will win. How closely she shaves the posts and cords!—too closely—her wheel has struck the post; her horses have jumped the rope and she lies stunned! Can she be dead?

Verily, if Gérôme's gladiators were to come down from the Trocadero and fight it over again here in the arena, and the fallen one were to look up into my eyes for pity, I could just now, with the women in the picture, shriek "Habet," and make the fatal sign to the victor to despatch him.

So could Mamma; her eyes gleam like a Fury's. We are no better than the women of 2,000 years ago!

The men look on in a sort of stolid simmering of excitement. They are used to it.

Cafés abut on to the arena, and in them they can sit and sip their coffee or their syrup of gooseberries, smoke their cigarettes, and feed their eyes all the while.

They can loll at their ease and see English clowns grin and tumble for them; Americans twirl on the trapèze for them; Wainratta (barbarian, country not known) walk on an invisible thread for them; Japanese poise themselves on a bamboo; Mexican boys race standing on barebacked ponies, and finally the luckless Mr. Caudle, an ancient Briton, devoured by cannibals, pelicans, and crocodiles—a burlesque of the bloodshed and wild-beast fights of the old circus.

Give us "bread and circus games" (panem et circenses), shouted the Roman rabble, and we will stand any Cæsarism. And the dearth of bread was a ray of hope for Revolutionists. Tout va bien ici, le pain manque.

This was the last we saw of Paris. We walked in the hotel through the green glades of the Champs Elysées, and wished we were not going.

Then came the paying of bills, the tipping of waiters, the search for Papa's hat, which some one had taken from the salle-à-manger, the crush at the railway station, and the cramp in the carriages, and, last of all, the boat.

"Why didn't you come over in the Calais-Douvres?" said our friends at home to us. Because the Calais-Douvres was disabled temporarily. Why did we go down into the saloon? It was filled with people feeling very ill, and trying to sleep, and waking to find themselves on dry land. Their peace had been invaded by a healthy family, man, wife, and child, insensible to sea-sickness.

The husband was a clergyman of the muscular type of Christians. He had probably been a rowing man at Oxford. He held that cleanliness was on a par with godliness, and that sickness and want of appetite were crimes best corrected by a good example.

Therefore he ate—and ate enormously—of beef and bread, and pickles and cheese, and drank bottled Bass and Dublin stout—things, the very nauseous sight and smell of which were torture to the reclining sufferers. Meanwhile the child, a boy of five, spoilt to distraction, chattered, battered with his feet, flourished them over the heads of recumbent seniors, blew on a trumpet, and the mother, good, mild lady, happy in the faith that father and son were perfect, kept laying down her book and saying "Naughty" with a smile.

The father was the only man whose ears were deaf to the trumpet.

L'AMENDE HONORABLE

Sir Peter (I mean Lallie, of course) has, in return for all the pleasure this trip has afforded her, drawn the boot-cleaning machine for Papa, standing as it does in the British section of machinery near the Canadian trophy, surrounded, as it always is, by an interested crowd drawn from "All the World at Paris."

His Little Mother

By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman"

PART I.—TEN YEARS OLD

Children's parties then were not exactly what they are now. We used to be invited at four o'clock, and we always left at half-past eight—on our feet, generally—for our toilettes were not of a kind which would startle the streets of that innocent country town. We had short sleeves, certainly, and comparatively low necks, but tippets and long white linen gloves made all right, and our frocks descended comfortably to the ankle. Besides which we wore beautiful white frilly "trowsers"—or plain ones of the same material as the dress. Hats, too, which really covered the head, and were tied down, gipsy fashion, over a bush of curls—if our hair would curl; if not, it was plaited into tails—the more the better. I remember, on state occasions, my mother used to plait mine into six, three on each side, tied with bright ribbons, of which I was exceedingly proud.

This little girl—perhaps she had no mother to be conceited about her hair, for it was only divided into two tails, not very carefully plaited, and tied with rather shabby brown ribbon. Neither she nor the little boy were quite as well dressed as the rest of the young party, but they were neat and clean, and, though not exactly blooming children, were interesting, if only from the way they seemed to hang together, as if accustomed to depend upon themselves, or rather upon one another, for everything.

At least, so it seemed to the lady who watched them—one Miss Waldershare, a rich and lonely woman, glad of any interest, especially when it came in the shape of a child. She was only a passing visitor in the town, and had come almost accidentally to the party, where she had nobody belonging to her. Neither had these two little people, apparently. All the other young guests had come with mothers, aunts, or nurses; but these, Miss Waldershare had observed, had walked in, walked upstairs to take their things off, and walked down again, hand-in-hand, and quite alone.

The two little faces, unlike, and yet with a certain family look which satisfied her as to their relationship, touched her more than all the merry faces round the table. Particularly so when dangerous dainties circulated round it, and the boy would look appealingly to the girl, who smiled back either a "No" or a "Yes." But both were given smilingly and accepted obediently. He was a big, handsome boy, much bigger and handsomer than his sister, with a soft, good-natured, rather weak expression; whereas she was small, dark, thin, with sharp, firm features; an "old" face rather, which might almost have been called plain but for the look of love in her eyes, and the sweet decision of her mouth. All the better! since the boy, pretty as he was, seemed of an undecided nature; as if it were almost a relief to have somebody to settle everything for him.

So at least thought Miss Waldershare, amused to notice how character shows itself even at ten years old.

"You are about ten, I suppose, my dear," said she to the little girl, "and a sensible girl you are too, not to let your brother eat too much plum cake. And he is a good boy to mind what you say," added she, patting the handsome head, which had drooped disconsolately when, for the third time, the tempting dish was allowed to pass.

"We are both ten, Ma'am" (children were always taught to say "Ma'am" and "Sir" in those days), "we are twins, though I am so little, and he is so big and tall. I am obliged to be very careful what he eats. He is not as strong as he looks, and he does not like being ill, or taking physic."

"Nobody does, I think. But he is a lucky boy to have such a wise little sister."

"I am his little mother," answered the child, in a grave, old-fashioned way. "Mamma told me I was to be his little mother till she came back again."

"Is she away from home, then?"

"A long way from home—in India. She has been gone two years and a month. It will be four years and eleven months before she and papa are back again."

"Four years, ten months, and two weeks; we counted yesterday, Dor," corrected the little boy—to which the sister assented, looking quite pleased, and saying that "he was always so good at arithmetic."

"And what was it he called you?" asked Miss Waldershare, more and more interested, yet not liking to seem too curious, as she thought the reticence of politeness ought to be observed with children as much as with grown-up folks.

The little girl laughed. "Oh, Dor—or Dormouse—or Dor-beetle—I have lots of names. But my right name is Dorcas. Rather ugly, is it not? But then his is a very pretty one—Cyprian. Mamma said he was always to be called Cyprian in full. She is very fond of him. She thinks there never was such a boy." This was said in a confidential whisper, as the child's heart warmed instinctively to the motherly, childless heart of her questioner.

Somebody now called upon Miss Waldershare to start a game, and she was separated from her two small friends, and swamped in the general vortex for an hour or two; at the end of which time, however, she had contrived to find out all that was to be found out concerning Dorcas and Cyprian.

Their parents, though remotely connected with the little town, where everybody knew everybody, had never been seen there, having gone to Calcutta, or Benares, or Bombay—nobody was quite sure where—leaving behind these children with three old ladies, distant relations, who resided here. The giver of the party scarcely knew the names of her small guests—they were merely "the next-door children," invited "for kindness."

And though both their hostess and everybody else was really kind to them—or would have been, had they mixed themselves up easily with the rest—still, to the very end of the evening, Miss Waldershare noticed a certain forlornness in the little pair, who went about together, or sat close together, hand-in-hand, as if unused to general society, and belonging specially to one another, and not to anybody else. So much so that even she, generally so successful in shaking up a party together, found them a difficult element to deal with.

First, the boy was so exceedingly shy that there was no doing anything with him. He would not, or could not, play at any game—not even simple "hunt the slipper," or merry "kiss-in-the-ring." He refused absolutely to give or to "cry" a forfeit; and when, tempted by the fun and laughing, he was at last lured into blind-man's buff, he somehow got into everybody's way, and being accidentally knocked down, burst into such a piteous howl that he was obliged to be carried off at once upstairs.

"Is he hurt?" the lady asked anxiously.

"But why should you stay, my little girl? You like fun; I saw you playing very merrily. Go back to the rest."

"Without Cyprian?" said Dorcas, with wide-open eyes; as if such an idea produced in her mind simple astonishment. "O dear no! He does not like being alone. Mamma told me never to leave Cyprian."

"That settles the point," said Miss Waldershare, smiling; and went downstairs again. But several times she returned, and tried to coax the little fellow back to the gay party below. However, he was either too shy, or too sulky, or too much accustomed to have everything his own way, with his "little mother" for his devoted slave; for though once or twice he yielded to persuasion so far as to go to the top of the stairs—being evidently of a soft and yielding disposition—still, he always came back again, and sheltered himself behind his sister, as if, though so much less than himself, she was his natural refuge.

For Dorcas, she did her utmost, poor little woman, to get him into a better mind; and when all failed—and the boy's gentle obstinacy and hesitating sweetness were most difficult to make anything out of—she soothed him—she comforted him—she apologised for him. Finally, when all the kindly inquirers left him and her together, she sat beside the little fellow in the somewhat dreary bedroom, listening to the noisy rout downstairs, for very nearly two hours.

"Would you like to go and have a dance? They are dancing, you hear?"

Dorcas looked up at Miss Waldershare with a world of grateful pleasure in her eyes. She was not pretty; but she had that sort of airy, well-set figure which seems made for dancing. Already her little feet were beating time to the music.

"Do go, child," said the kind lady. "Run away; I will stay with your brother."

Poor little "Dor" was almost off—the music was playing such a lovely tune—nearly as enticing as that of the Pied Piper of Hamelin—when she felt her dress caught by Cyprian's imploring hand.

She sat down again. "He doesn't dance—he doesn't like it. Thank you—no. Perhaps I had better stay with Cyprian. It will soon be time for going home. Mamma said we were never to be out after dark, on account of Cyprian. He catches cold so soon."

"But this is a warm summer night," begun Miss Waldershare, feeling inclined to argue the point; and doubtful of the wisdom of allowing one child to sacrifice everything to another child. Still, there was something so pathetic in this literal obedience to the wishes of the far-away mother—this entire devotion to a rather trying little brother, that the kind stranger lady, unto whom it had pleased Heaven to give neither the sweetness nor the bitterness of family duties, held her tongue and remonstrated no more.

When next time she went after them—for amidst all the fun and frolic downstairs she was haunted by a vision of the little forlorn twins sitting in the deserted bedroom, all alone—she found her birds were flown.

Dorcas, she learnt, had quietly crept away with her little brother, not waiting for supper; though she had been seen standing for several minutes at the hall-door till she could say good-bye "politely" to the hostess.

"Mamma said we were never to go away from any visit without thanking the lady of the house for our pleasant evening," she had explained to somebody; and been laughed at a good deal for her "old-fashioned" ways.

No doubt, the family thought, she learnt them from those three prim, elderly ladies, with whom she must lead such a dull life, "to say nothing of that fanciful, disagreeable little brother, to whom she gives up everything, apparently, never thinking of herself at all. Poor little soul!"

But Miss Waldershare, who had seen many a child who thought of itself a great deal, who was everybody's pet, from whom nobody ever expected anything—and certainly never got it—turn out to be not only the most unpleasant but most unhappy of young people—did not altogether pity "Dor." The child had at least—so one of the other children said—"somebody to make a fuss over."

But, having a firm belief in compensation—also some belief in herself as an instrument of the same—for there are those to whom Heaven seems to deny all personal joys, in order that they should be better able to make other people happy—Miss Waldershare set her benevolent wits to work to invent some small pleasure for these two children, whose pleasures were so few.

Fate, kindly seized upon, often turns kind. The very next day every vacant wall in the town broke out into an eruption of huge hand-bills, announcing that Signor Bianchini, the celebrated pyrotechnist, would on a certain evening have a grand display in the High Street; and would end by walking—under patronage of the Worshipful the Mayor—from one of the windows in the Town Hall to a window opposite, on the tight rope, amid a shower of rockets and Roman candles.

Now, the noble art of pyrotechny was then in its infancy, and Blondin the Great had neither been born nor thought of. Consequently the little town was much excited, and on the rumour being spread that the hero of the day was no other than a certain Jem White—who had once fled the town in disgrace for throwing crackers and squibs on Gunpowder Plot day—to return in honour and glory as the celebrated Signor Bianchini—a touch of romance added to the interest. All the townspeople, high and low—the low in the street, and the high upon every available shop-front and first-floor window, assembled to witness the show.

Miss Waldershare, putting off her departure for a day, engaged a tiny room with a balconied window, over a bookseller's shop; and thither, after much perturbation and great hesitation on the part of the three old ladies, she succeeded in carrying off her little friends, Dorcas and Cyprian Hall. There, by seven o'clock on a July night, she established herself, with the twins one on each side of her, which arrangement, however, was soon modified.

"May he come beside me, ma'am? If there should be a—a noise—fireworks do make a noise sometimes, I think?—he will like to be close beside me. He is rather timid, you see,"—added with a half-apologetic air the "little mother."

She was not timid—not even when the balcony gave a sudden crack, and with involuntary instinct she used all her small strength to push Cyprian back upon the safe window-ledge, remaining outside herself. But it was a false alarm, though it frightened Miss Waldershare a little, and Cyprian very much—until there was proved to be no danger, and the trio settled themselves to entire enjoyment of the sight.

What a sight it was! One of the many children who saw it remembers it still: even after five-and-forty years!—the proud delight of sitting up till eleven at night, and being initiated into the mysteries of the nocturnal world—the streets, lit with oil-lamps—gas being still unknown—the houses, dim and tall, and the quiet, starry sky overhead, such a contrast to the noisy crowd below. Then that black platform, whence all the wonderful show was to come—what dozens of young eyes gazed on it in eager suspense!—till, punctual to the appointed minute, there shot from it, with a whizz, a whirr, and a glare—the first rocket. Up it went—making everybody jump, and Cyprian utter an audible cry—up like a live creature, flying, or rather shooting, right into the sky, no one could exactly see where, till it fell down, in a shower of fiery rain, on the very heads of the crowd, who screamed and laughed, and ran hither and thither; trying, some to avoid, some to snatch at, the blazing sparks.

Another, and another, and another—each rising higher and falling steadier than the last; then a grand illumination of "Roman candles"—showing all the faces of the people below—and lighting up the architecture of the old Town Hall, which the townsfolk were so proud of. Finally, a most wonderful set piece—a wheel of light, which kept turning and turning, every moment more rapidly, throwing out a shower of sparks all round.

"The most beautiful thing we ever saw in all our life—isn't it, Cyprian?" cried Dor. "What can it be?"

"A Catherine-wheel," said Miss Waldershare, smiling at the "we" and the "our life" in the singular number—so natural to the twins.

"A Catherine-wheel?" repeated the sister, meditatively. "I wonder has that anything to do with St. Catherine? Mamma had a picture of her leaning against a wheel. She was so pretty—but with a sweet sad kind of face, something like mamma's."

"You have a pretty mamma, then?" said Miss Waldershare, ignoring the other adjective. "And you have heard of St. Catherine—and very likely about Raffaelle, who painted her."

"Oh, yes," brightening up extremely. "I like to read all I can about painters, for I am so fond of drawing. I often try to draw. Mamma says I shall learn properly some day, and then I can teach Cyprian."

"Does Cyprian like reading?"

"N—no," with a slight hesitation. "Indeed, he has not time for reading. He learns Latin, you know. So I read for both of us, and then I can tell him anything interesting. It saves him so much trouble."

"I don't like trouble, and I can't imagine how anybody could like reading," said Cyprian, with his most attractive smile.

"But he likes writing, and he writes so well—small hand—and a great better than I," eagerly said the little sister. "And he can read written-hand beautifully—makes out every word in mamma's letters. If you knew how delightful are mamma's letters—as interesting as a story-book. We get one every mail—and we look for it days before it comes. It has been coming for a week now. Perhaps we shall find it when we get home to-night."

"I hope so," said the lady, with a slight tremble in her voice. Never, either as child or woman, had Miss Waldershare got any mother's letters.

"If it does come, and if she cared to call to-morrow, perhaps we might let her see it," whispered Cyprian to his sister, who slightly hesitated, as if that were a privilege too great for any mortal creature.

"To-morrow, my dears, I shall be miles and miles away. I shall not see you for a very long time, I fear."

"What a pity! Because I shall tell mamma all about you—we always tell her everything—and if she knew how kind you have been to us both she would let me show you her letters. But I should like to ask her first. And it will be six months before we get the answer."

"Of course it will," said Miss Waldershare, thinking of the great gulf of time and space between mother and children—of the letters received ignorantly, months after date, on both sides—and of how sad it was, that with such tender love between children and parents, the one should grow up and the other should grow old in such a long separation that when they did meet again it would be almost as strangers.

"But come, my dears, the fireworks are beginning again. And there is Signor Bianchini on the tight-rope. See how beautifully he balances himself with that long pole. Would you like to be a tight-rope dancer, Cyprian?"

"He is to be a gentleman and go to college, and then go out to India to papa," said Dorcas, with a little touch of pride. And when the boy, boy-like, clapped his hands with delight, watching the ci-devant Jem White make his perilous journey over the up-turned heads of the crowd, the more sensitive girl shuddered, and turned pale.

"Would you like to go in, and not look any more?" said Miss Waldershare, kindly.

"No, thank you—something might happen—he might overbalance himself. No, I would rather stay by Cyprian."

And though still white and trembling, she did stay, till the very last. But, besides the buns and oranges, a glass of wine had to be administered to the child before she was able to walk home. She seemed but a fragile little thing, despite her spirit and—only the word was not known in those days—her "pluck."

The last of the fireworks shot up, a sheaf of flame, hissing and crackling, above the Town Hall, and the old church-tower, right into the silent stars; there was a shout of ecstatic cheering from the crowd, and a final "sending round the hat," which ceremony had been gone through several times already, from window to window, Dorcas apologising sadly that she had no penny to drop into it—"But Mamma told us that Papa was not rich, and that we were not to spend more pennies than we could help." And then the Signor bowed his thanks—in a theatrical attitude, beside the very biggest of Catherine-wheels—and the crowd began to separate. The night's delight was ended.

Miss Waldershare walked through the fast-thinning street with her two protegés, one in each hand. Cyprian, no longer shy, was chattering like a magpie, but Dorcas, who had hitherto done the talking, now began to be silent, evidently very tired. Her friend would have liked to take her up and carry her—she was strong enough and the child small enough—but Dorcas was so astonished at the idea that she gave it up, and merely helped the poor little girl as well as she could till they reached the Terrace.

"I will just wait and see if you have got your letter, and then I will bid you good-bye. I am going away to-morrow morning," said Miss Waldershare, with a slight regret at her heart. Her life was almost as solitary as that of these little people.

"Is that the children? Bring them in at once to me," said a sharp voice behind the sleepy maid-servant who opened the door.

"Oh, Miss Moffat, is that you? Have you got Mamma's letters?"

"There are letters."

"I am so glad," said Miss Waldershare. She kissed the two children, and walked quickly away.

By one of those accidental delays which visit us all, she, however, did not leave next morning. Business—other people's business, of course—rose up, which detained her nearly a week; and being rather troublesome business, her mind was so full of it that she hardly gave a thought to the twins, Dorcas and Cyprian, till, coming home from church, she passed the end o the Terrace. and saw two little figures walking down it, slowly and quietly, hand-in-hand,—two little black figures, so far as her short sight enabled her to judge, which made her at first think it could not possibly be they. Nevertheless, she felt a strong inclination to call and say good-bye over again—for she was going abroad, on a mission of mercy, with a sick friend—and it might be months, nay years, before she was in England again.

So she sent up her card, asking to see "little Miss Hall."

The servant, looking rather surprised, showed her into an empty parlour, where she waited several minutes, and then the two poor little children, still hand in hand, walked in.

They were dressed in black from head to foot—not even a white collar, and their faces were very grave, Cyprian's being rosy still, but out of Dorcas's every ray of colour had departed. Her eyes looked as if she had been crying all day long, and the voice she spoke in, though quiet, was forced and strange.

"How do you do, Ma'am? It is kind of you to come and see us."

"My poor little girl, what has happened?"

"Yes, our Mamma is dead," said Dorcas, but without crying. She seemed to have wept all her tears away.

"But—the letter?"

"It was from Papa. He said Mamma had been dead a week. That is two months ago. So it is two months and a week since we had any Mamma. I can't understand it at all," added the boy, shaking his head in a forlorn sort of way.

His sister put her arm round him, and drew him to her, at which he began sobbing afresh. In truth, they all wept together; Miss Waldershare never thinking till afterwards how strange it was that she, who had had no tears for many a year, should shed them now, over a woman whom she had never seen and scarcely heard of.

She wondered what kind of person the father was, and even went so far as to ask if she might see his letter.

"Oh yes;" (no hesitation now). "But I remember Miss Moffat has it. She said she should keep it, lest Papa might forget his promise, and take us away from here."

"Would you wish to go?"

"Oh no. It doesn't matter. The Miss Moffats are very kind to us. Everything goes on as usual, except for Mamma's letters. She has been a year away, and this is the first time the mail ever came in without bringing us one of Mamma's letters."

The child spoke in a dull, sad, almost complaining tone—evidently even she did not yet realise—how difficult it is for any of us to realise!—that sudden pause of death-silence.

"Did your Mamma ever say—had you any idea—?" began Miss Waldershare, and stopped. What use was it to question?—the plain, hard fact was there—the children were motherless.

"And you are going abroad, too?" said Dorcas, when she had sat a good while, holding the kind hand, whose firm clasp was the only way in which Miss Waldershare could express sympathy. "We shall never see you again. It will be just like Mamma's going. Only you have no little children to leave behind."

"No, nobody."

"Mamma would not have left us if she could have helped it—she told me so—but she had to go with Papa. She said once—I was not to tell Cyprian, and I almost forgot it myself till now—it seemed so impossible—but she said——" Dorcas hesitated.

"What was it, dear?"

"That even if she died we were not to mind, as she would not be much farther away from us than when she was in India, perhaps not so far. What did she mean?"

Miss Waldershare tried to explain—tried to put into the child's heart, without giving any impression of fear or pain, that heavenly consolation of the continual nearness of the dead, of the narrow barrier that for all pure and loving souls exists between the life here and the life everlasting.

"I understand," Dorcas said at last. "And that is why we were to remember what she used to say to us, and do what she wished us to do, just as much as if she were here beside us. It will be much the same now. Do you hear what the lady says? Do you understand her, Cyprian?"

"Poor Cyprian." He had ceased crying now, and was squatting on the hearthrug, playing with two kittens, quite merry and content. None the less, possibly all the more, did Miss Waldershare say, "Poor Cyprian."

Her time was limited, and she rose to go.

"But I shall not forget you, dear. I shall write to you now and then."

"O, how nice! We never get letters from anybody, except Mamma." Here came a sudden shudder of recollection, and a wild look, almost of despair. "I forgot. We shall never have any more letters from Mamma. What shall we do? O, Cyprian, Cyprian!"

That cry, so shrill, so full of intolerable agony, made the little boy spring to his feet.

"Dor—Dor, what is the matter? Please be quiet. You frighten me so—you make me so miserable."

Then the sister, with a violent effort, checked what was growing into an almost hysterical scream. She put her arms round Cyprian, and hid her face on his shoulder till the sobs ceased, and she lifted up a face, deadly white, indeed, but quite composed.

"Yes, he is right; I must be quiet. He has nobody to take care of him but me, now. Thank you, Miss Waldershare, and we shall be delighted to get your letters. And Cyprian shall write—he writes so very well, you know," with a faint smile, as she put up her lips for a farewell kiss.

It had not quite vanished, that piteous smile, even when Miss Waldershare caught her last glimpse of the twins, standing watching her down the terrace, with their faces pressed against the window pane. Two rather forlorn figures, with their mourning clothes, and grave, sad looks, but they were two—and they stood close together, hand in hand, as usual. Also, Cyprian had his head safely nestled into the shoulder of his "little mother."

The dead mother—could she have beheld them—might have felt that life was not altogether hopeless to her children.

OLD-FASHIONED PHEASANT SHOOTING

THOUGH, according to the almanacs and in right of the Game Laws, pheasant shooting begins on the 1st of October, this date is not practically a great sporting anniversary like the 12th of August or the 1st of September. Not one grouse moor in twenty is allowed to lie quiet on "the twelfth," and hardly an acre which is likely to hold a partridge is untried on "the first;" but the case is altogether different on the first legitimate day of pheasant shooting. For this simple reason—you can't get at the pheasants if you would, i.e., at the birds in the great woods and preserves. It is too early to force yourself into the covers, even if you felt disposed to invade these sanctuaries prematurely. Though the brown leaves are beginning to come fluttering down from the beeches, the foliage generally has scarcely been touched, nor will it be before the autumn frosts are followed by gales to shake the branches; and the undergrowth has hardly yet shown signs of its annual decay. At present you might as well go shooting in a tropical cane patch for any chance you would have of seeing a dozen yards before you, and a pheasant might rise whirring from your feet and scarce give you the glimpse of the tip of a tail feather. There are many weeks yet to come before the bright-plumaged denizens of the big woods are to be got at; and even if they could be dealt with satisfactorily in October or even November, in few instances would they be disturbed, except for mere market purposes. The great majority are reserved for Christmas, when country houses and the mansions of "the nobility and gentry" are full of visitors who must be amused, at least the male portion of them, somehow or other with out-door recreation; and when a hard frost stops the hunting, and hunting men are in the pitiable condition of the frozen-out gardeners, "who have no work to do," the pheasant preserves come in handily enough, and grand battues are the order of the day. And every year it seems that this style of pheasant shooting is becoming more and more customary, if not popular; and, indeed, there is some excuse for it, for after all it is almost the only kind of pheasant shooting now-a-days which can be got. The old-fashioned sport with the long-tails which used to begin on the 1st of October, years ago, is now hard to find, as modern high-farming, with its practices of grubbing up small woods and spinneys, destroying thick hedgerows, and keeping all the ditches as clear of tangled undergrowth as the fields themselves, has taken away most of the opportunities for pheasants to breed according to their own fancy, and so stock large portions of the country, affording rough wild shooting of the most enjoyable character to the true sportsman.

Fortunately, however, this kind of pheasant shooting has not entirely disappeared; and where it can be had, it is, perhaps, better appreciated than almost any other sport with the gun. There is—if we are not speaking heretically—a monotony in partridge and even in grouse shooting which does not attach to old-fashioned pheasant shooting in October. The former, too, are often pursued with great toil and weariness owing to the heat of the weather and the foolish desire to make big bags. Not so pheasant shooting over a rough country after the olden type. The weather just now is generally the most enjoyable of all weather for a ramble with the gun. At no season of the year is a stroll over the fields, along country lanes, and by the hedgerows more delightful. The first fortnight in October, in nine seasons out of ten, is blessed with fine sunshiny weather; and there is a quiet soft calmness about "the Fall," as the West Country folk still call the Autumn, which is most acceptable; and even when the days are dull the autumnal tints on the trees impart such a brightness to country scenes that as Southey has said—

What more then than pheasant shooting in the old style can a sportsman want to make him supremely happy? Spinneys and small woods, thick hedgerows and ditches with a mass of entangled growth in them, patches of furze, rough corners of fern and bramble, small fields with thick covers of turnips, mangold-wurzel, and seed clover, or rape seed, rough farming generally—in fact, a country where pheasants still breed naturally and require finding, and good shooting, too, when found—these are the requirements for such a day as the sportsman loves. Four guns at most, about the same number of steady, pottering, but good nosed dogs, whether they be spaniels, setters, or retrievers, and about the same number of beaters, a genuine working party;—and you have about the complement for a happy day. Of course, the more pheasants you have on this rough kind of shooting the better, but it must be remembered that however many you have, they are not the tame stupid creatures of the preserves, with hardly more fear or instinct of self-preservation than barn-door fowls. Being bred wild, they are really feræ naturæ, and up to a variety of dodges to elude pursuit, wise enough to run along the ditches and creep wherever they can rather than rise. Good generalship and perseverance is then required to bring them to book, and no little steadiness of head and hand with your gun when you spring them. In a large wood you are more or less prepared for your game, and firing at hand-raised pheasants in a battue requires hardly more nerve than does firing at a mark. A very different thing it is to bring down the genuine wild birds, as dashing aside all opposing obstacles they oar their way upwards remigio alarum, with a mighty crashing sound, which is but feebly represented by the "wroost-cuckle-rickle-wroost" attributed to the cry and fluttering of the noble bird. No—your wild "rocketer" cannot be described; he must be seen and heard; and not one sportsman out of a dozen is altogether free from a certain kind of trepidation when he raises his gun in the hope of staying the strong and rapid flight of his game. The poet's advice is thus given—

> Should pheasant rise, be most particular;
> He rises nearly perpendicular;
> Wait a few seconds till your sight

Advice easily given, as much advice about sport is, from an arm-chair, but by no means easy to follow; and even when you have made all kinds of good resolution to be calm, steady, and self-possessed, and do your best to put them in practice, you will often fail. One advantage in a rough day's pheasant shooting is that pheasants are not the only game that will come to hand. As you cross the fields of green cover a partridge or two may fall to your lot, the lively rabbit will occasionally bolt from the ditch or hedgerow, or run across your path in the spinney to his destruction, while the more sober hare will from time to time meet death in the course of your ramble; and so it will often come to pass that at the end of a day's old-fashioned pheasant shooting your bag will show those diversified contents which so delight the genuine sportsman.

After such a day—and would that there were more of them!—those who have borne a part in it have the happy consciousness that it is not one to be ashamed of in any respect, but one for congratulation, presuming, of course, that the pheasants, when displayed on the return home, make a fair show. A winter's evening at this time of year by a happy combination often succeeds a summer's day; and in the cosy dining-room, enlivened by an English fire, the "wasted tissue" is recuperated, and "across the walnuts and the wine," and afterwards, amid the fragrant Nicotian clouds, are recounted again and again the incidents of a day's old-fashioned pheasant shooting.

"THE FAMINE CAMPAIGN IN SOUTHERN INDIA," by W. Digby (2 vols.: Longman and Co.)—The famine outbreak in Madras and Bombay, from the failure of the south-east monsoon for the second year in succession in October, 1876, till long after the return of the welcome rains towards the close of 1877, stands out conspicuously among the periodic records of Indian famines. No previous visitation of the present century equalled this in duration and extent. One only—that of 1874, in Bengal—attracted as deep and general attention. The great famines of 1792 and 1824 came in a day when the fierce light of publicity had not begun to break on the affairs of India. Even the Orissa disaster in 1866 awoke few echoes outside the limits of that isolated province. The easy, but costly, victory over dearth in 1874 left behind it a distrust of sensational prophecies of evil, a sharper sense than heretofore of the necessity of strict economy. In the famine of 1876-78 we met an enemy with which, for all our efforts, we could only partially cope, losing in the struggle, by death and migration, a fourth (it is said) of the population of the most severely afflicted districts, finding ourselves at its close face to face with a cloud of questions as to the growth of population and of the means of providing for them, land-tenure and cultivation, improvement of irrigation and transport, &c., almost terrible in their importance to a generation just beginning to realise that in India there is an economic as well as a political peril, and that the question whether our dependency will pay its way may not possibly dominate in the end that other question as to the permanency of our rule. The bulky, and sooth to say somewhat cumbrous, volumes in which Mr. W. Digby, late honorary secretary to the Indian Famine Relief Fund, has grouped together the miscellaneous records of these trying years, are in some respects a little disappointing. To the Indian publicist they offer little more than might be gathered, as it is, from Blue Books and returns. To the general reader slenderly acquainted with matters Indian—they present a pile of materials from which the points most worthy notice are not always to be disengaged without some trouble. The story of the famine is in two volumes—the first a resumé (under separate headings) of the campaign, according as it was waged in Madras, Bombay, Mysore, or the North; the second, a miscellaneous collection of famine papers—experiences of relief delegates and statistics of relief meetings, discussions of Sir R. Temple's notorious "one pound ration," comparative tables of people, houses, and cattle in the suffering districts at the census of 1872 and now, &c.—often of interest, yet often, too, in decided need of weeding. On the whole, it must be said that Indian officialism came nobly out of the struggle, although doubtless some precious time was lost and some unfortunate mistakes committed before the Supreme Government—personified in the first instance by the over-sanguine and over-hasty, though energetic and capable, Sir R. Temple—could quite admit the urgency of the peril, or all friction between it and the Governments of the Presidencies be effectually smoothed away. In Bombay, where public opinion is more enlightened and more powerful than elsewhere, and where the native association—the Sarvajanik Sabha—worked side by side with the Government in keen and not always friendly criticism of its acts, where, too, distress was much more partial, relief-works were most systematic in their plan, and most pregnant of instruction for the future. In Mysore official routine and false economy were at their worst, though both here and in Madras the flight of the people and the terrible distress could hardly have been completely dealt with by any agencies. On all these matters, as on the vexed questions of a few great or many small relief works, of relief camps, and of the field of private charity, Mr. Digby's volumes contain ample information.

The Imperial spirit which has always characterised the "Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute" is amply evidenced in the present volume (Vol. IX., 1877-8. S. Low and Co.) by the choice of India (though not, strictly speaking, a colony at all) for the subject of three out of the ten papers. But the imperialism of the Institute is not an imperialism of "brag and bluster," but one which delights in collecting and discussing the opinions of men with practical knowledge of the things of which they write, and with opportunities of estimating them from a variety of points of view. Thus, Mr. R. H. Elliot's opening paper upon "Indian Famines"—an able plea inter alia for more attention to tanks, wells, and forests—has special attractions as a view of the land question by a non-official Englishman who has himself held land in Southern India. Dr. Forbes Watson, in "Our Colonial and Indian Trade," supplies a still more valuable survey of the chief sources to which, in the gradual decline of our export trade with foreign nations, we must look in future to redress the balance—so terribly against us at the present moment—between our yearly exports and our imports. A suggestive sketch of a "Colonial Naval Volunteer Force," by Mr. T. Brassey—in British North America there are some 70,000 of the hardiest fishermen in the world—may also be instanced—where all are good—as a contribution of special interest.

"Bengaliana" (Thacker, Spink, and Co., Calcutta), or tales and reminiscences by Shoshee Chunder Dutt, if not remarkable for literary merit—though quite as good as the "Annuals" and "Scrap-Books" in vogue some three-and-thirty years ago, when most of them were written—deserve perusal as the productions of a writer, who claims to be neither European, East Indian, nor Mahometan, but a true Bengalee, with a lively faith in the heroic virtues of the mild Hindoo. Most of the tales are from old Indian history. Two only—an amusing sketch of the adventures of a native clerk among the Burrah and Chota Sahibs of a Government office, and a story of the Mutiny—have a more present interest. We cannot, indeed, say much for the realism of a tale where English ladies are made to exclaim, "the Prophet be d——d!" and English officers represented as requiting a timely shelter by atrocious outrage. Perhaps Mr. Chunder Dutt did not believe such things himself, but, thinking an atrocity needful for the story, depicted, on the principle of "the lion and the man," an Englishman as the perpetrator.

It is the fault, thinks Mr. Matthew Arnold, of modern education that it teaches by far too many things, and leaves too little for the student to examine for himself. Hence his pretty edition (Macmillan and Co.) of the "Six Chief Lives from Johnson's 'Lives of the Poets,' with Macaulay's 'Life of Johnson,'" has, with one exception, neither note nor comment, but simply a brief characteristic preface to explain its uses for the young student of English literature as (in French phrase) a point de repère, a "centre of departure and return" from which he may issue forth to discover and compare, and on which he may ever and again fall back. For the period covered by these six lives of poets—all in their degree of the first class, though some of them are greater still as prose-writers—is no less remarkable as the period in which English effects the passage from the rugged, antique prose of Milton to the prose, distinguished only by superficial differences from our own, of Johnson. And in these lives we have the most mature and characteristic work of a writer who, if not always a good judge of poetry—being himself essentially the man of a prose age—is always fresh, vigorous, and manly in his judgments, an admirable type of "the integrity, piety, good-nature, and good-humour of the English people." Of the value of such a selection from a work few will ever read as a whole it is superfluous to speak, and Mr. Arnold has shown good taste in adding to it nothing beyond this graceful preface on the growth of English prose.

Leslie's Second Wife

By T. W. SPEIGHT,

Author of "In the Dead of Night," "The Poor Gentlewoman of St. Clement's," &c.

When Gawain Leslie's wife died it seemed to him that he had lost all that made life worth living for. She had, in truth, been very dear to him. A little imperious in her temper, perhaps; a trifle more exacting in some of her ways than he really liked; but then she came of a family all of whom were noted for their high spirit, and she had brought her husband a considerable fortune; and Gawain himself was one of those soft-hearted, easy-going men, who find a secret comfort, though they would be loth to acknowledge it even to themselves, in having their affairs managed for them, in being told what to do and what not to do, and in being the victims of a mild marital despotism tempered with kisses.

What an odd sensation it was, after four years of such silken bondage, to find himself once more a free agent—his own master! And not only master of himself and his actions, but called upon to weigh and decide this question and the other without reference to the wishes or prejudices of any superior authority! He felt that his servants, and every one in any way dependent on him, regarded him with deeper respect and with a more marked deference than they had ever exhibited towards him before. He was their master now. Perhaps they had hardly recognised the fact of his being so while Mrs. Leslie was alive.

Leslie, however, mourned the loss of his wife in all sincerity. Hinchcliffe was hateful to him now that its mistress was no longer there. He kissed his little Emmeline, aged two years—the one treasure his wife had left him—bequeathed her to the care of a maiden aunt, packed his portmanteau, and started for the East. He was not seen in England again for three years. He turned up one evening at his club, bronzed, and bearded like a pard; and old cronies, who had all but forgotten his existence, were inclined to look upon him as one come back from the dead. He himself did not seem to realise how time had flown till he set eyes on his daughter, and saw the difference three years had made in her. The child startled him by her likeness to her dead mother. Here at least was something to live for. He would cease from wandering, and settle down at Hinchcliffe, and superintend the education of his child.

To Hinchcliffe went Gawain Leslie, taking his daughter with him, and settled down into a very quiet groove—or rather, he would have so settled down if his neighbours would have let him. But it is preposterous to think that a young widower of eight-and-twenty, handsome, healthy, with one child, and an unencumbered rent roll of some seven thousand a year, is to be allowed, even in a supposedly free country, to bury himself alive,—to lead, as it were, the life of a semi-recluse, however much he may feel desirous of doing so. It would have been a downright flying in the face of Providence; at least, all the mammas with marriageable daughters within twenty miles of Hinchcliffe looked upon it as such. Here was a prize worth struggling for, and struggle for him they would, in despite of himself.

"They are angling for you, Gawain, my boy; and one or another of them will succeed in hooking you," said Leslie's chum, Jack Dawlish, one night after a ball at the Kirkforest Assembly Rooms. Leslie laughed a little dismally.

"Let them angle," he said. "Much good may it do them. As I've told you many a time, Jack, I could never think of another woman after my poor Emmeline. I shall never marry again." And he quite believed what he said.

Lady Bloxham about this time wrote of him to one of her friends as "a great, big-hearted, soft-headed goose, whom no woman could help liking, but whom any woman worthy of the name could twist round her finger as easily as she could a skein of silk." It was a little strong on her ladyship's part to term Leslie a "goose," besides betraying a truly feminine ignorance of genders; but in other respects her description was not far from the mark.

Leslie had been about a year at home when the walls and hoardings of Kirkforest were placarded with bills announcing that Dr. Popjoy, "the world-renowned Lecturer and Spiritualist," would hold a séance at 8 P.M., every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, in each week, till further notice, "at his rooms over Mr. Trumble's shop in the Market Place; on which occasions some most remarkable Phenomena having relation to the Unseen World will be localised and developed. Private séances specially arranged for. Daily communications with the dear Departed. 'Not lost, but gone before.'"

Gawain Leslie read one of Dr. Popjoy's placards one day in the coffee-room of the "Green Dragon," and smiled as he read. He had neither desire nor intention to witness the manifold wonders with which the doctor professed himself able to astonish his visitors. To him the whole affair seemed nothing more than a piece of vulgar charlatanry. He had no prevision—how could he have?—of the important part which this unknown professor was destined to play in the drama of his future life.

Friday was market day at Kirkforest. Leslie attended it about once a month, driving in from Hinchcliffe, which was five miles away, and putting up his horse and trap for three or four hours at the "Green Dragon." Several of his tenants, men who rented farms under him, also attended the market, and there was generally something or other to see one or more of them about at such times. After the market was over there were two ordinaries at the "Green Dragon"—one downstairs for the farmers and another upstairs for such of the neighbouring gentry as were in the habit of driving in after Leslie's fashion.

On a certain Friday afternoon Leslie found himself seated at the ordinary next a stranger whom he had no recollection of having seen before. He was a tall, thin, gentlemanly-looking man of middle age, with iron grey hair and moustaches to match. He was carefully and fashionably dressed, evidently by no provincial tailor. He had very white hands, wore a good deal of jewellery, and had a flower in his button-hole. He had an expansive smile, that came and vanished again with marvellous facility. Nearly everybody at the table were more or less known to each other, but nobody seemed to know the stranger. He was not long, however, before he got into conversation with Leslie, who was the most accessible of mortals, and would chat familiarly with a chimney-sweep.

The stranger began by observing how seldom it was that one could obtain caviare at a provincial hotel in England; in fact, in the majority of such hotels they did not seem to know what the article really was. He then went on to remark that the very best caviare he had ever eaten was at Novgorod. Leslie was interested at once. He too had been at Novgorod, but his recollections of it were chiefly confined to mud and fleas. The ice being thus broken the stream of conversation flowed on readily enough. Leslie found his companion to be a man of varied information, and considerable knowledge of many of the Bohemian phases of modern society. He had travelled much, and he had a knack of recounting his experiences in a half-humorous, half-cynical style that seemed to Leslie very fresh and fascinating. It was a long time since he had spent a couple of hours so agreeably. As they rose from the table the stranger introduced himself.

"My name is Popjoy," he said. "Dr. Aurelius Popjoy, graduate of the University of Leyden."

Leslie started.

"You have heard the name before?" said the other, drily, as he drew out his cigar-case. "Probably you have read one of my posters?"

"Why, yes, to tell you the truth, I believe I have seen one somewhere," said Leslie a little confusedly.

"Just so. By-the-bye, may I ask whether you have ever attended a spiritualistic séance?"

"Never."

"Pardon me if I say that it is one of the traits of a thorough Englishman to cherish a prejudice against anything he doesn't understand, simply because he doesn't understand it, and is too proud to care to."

"I am not aware that I am prejudiced against Spiritualism."

"Pardon me again," said the other, "if I venture to assert that you are—almost unconsciously, perhaps, but still prejudiced. If you have ever given a thought to the subject you have probably labelled it in your own mind with the word 'humbug' or 'charlatanry,' or even with that still more refreshing phrase, 'A regular swindle.'"

Leslie did not answer for a moment. Popjoy was right. He had been prejudiced against Spiritualism, as he had been prejudiced against many other things in his time, without really giving himself the trouble to understand them. At length he said, "You yourself are a believer in Spiritualism, I presume?"

"Try one of my weeds," said Popjoy; "and give me another five minutes before we part, and I will tell you." So they sat down again, and Leslie, who fancied himself a connoisseur in cigars, found that Popjoy's brand was quite equal to the best of his own.

"I am a believer to this extent in what is generally termed Spiritualism," said Popjoy. "I know, through my own experience and through the evidence of my senses, that it embodies a series of phenomena which are utterly unexplainable by any natural laws with which we are at present acquainted. But as to whether that lame result arises from our limited knowledge of the laws of Nature, or whether the phenomena are really the outcome of supernatural agency, is a point respecting which I for one must decline to venture an opinion. I will go no farther than this—that if you, as an educated and liberal-minded man, had seen and heard the marvellous things that I have seen and heard, you would modify one at least of your mental definitions in time to come. You would no longer define Spiritualism as 'charlatanry,' or as 'a juggle to delude the weak-minded.' You would define it as something which the scientists of the nineteenth century altogether fail in their efforts to formulate,—as something entirely outside the range of every-day experience. But why not come and judge for yourself? Come to our séance at eight to-morrow night. If, after that, your curiosity is satisfied, there the matter will rest. But if, on the contrary, you should wish to lift a corner of the veil still higher, then I will gladly arrange with you for a series of private séances, one result of which I hope will be the addition of another convert to the ranks of those who believe in the reality of spiritualistic manifestations, let them originate from whatever source they may."

"I will come to-morrow evening and see you," said Leslie.

After that the two men shook hands and parted.

At eight o'clock next evening Gawain Leslie found himself in Dr. Popjoy's handsomely-furnished drawing-room. Some half-dozen people were there already, none of whom he knew, and all of whom conversed in hushed tones as though somewhat awed by the solemnity of the business they had come upon.

Presently the Doctor bustled in. The general company he greeted with his expansive smile and a comprehensive bow, but Leslie was favoured with an impressive squeeze of the hand. Then the celebrated medium, Miss Rosa de Vaux, was introduced—a hectic-looking young lady, with very bony elbows and very large ears. Then the folding-doors that separated the front from the back drawing-room were flung open, and the company adjourned in a body to the latter apartment, and had the folding-doors shut upon them.

What took place after that need not be set down in detail here. There were the ordinary table-rapping manifestations, slapping of tambourines, and touches by so-called spirit hands. Then some particular spirit, whose acquaintance in the flesh nobody present had ever made, announced himself, and had matters all his own way while he stayed, nobody knowing enough of his history to contradict any statement he chose to make.

It was all very curious and unaccountable; but so far Leslie had not been particularly impressed. Then the unknown spirit, who called himself Jabez Lightfoot, took his departure, greatly to the relief of everybody, and a fresh spirit was announced as being present. This second spirit, on being asked to reveal its name, rapped out the word, "Emmeline." On being asked to state whether any of the company then present had been acquainted with her when in the flesh, the startling reply came, "I was the wife of one now among you!"

"No more, Doctor, if you please," cried Leslie abruptly, as he rose from his chair and broke the charmed circle.

Tears were in his eyes, and a feeling at his heart as though it were bound by a band of steel. The Doctor was by his side in a moment.

"Good gracious! my dear sir," he said in a voice attuned to sympathy; "you do not mean to say that it is your——? Positively, I had not the least idea." His eyes finished the sentence.

"Her name was Emmeline," answered Leslie in a low voice. "The mention of it in that way has brought back the old pain of long ago."

"I am greatly grieved," said the Doctor; "but you will believe me when I say that I have no control in such matters. Although we may often succeed in summoning some particular spirit, yet any other that may choose to come, comes."

"You are somewhat upset," he said. "For to-night the séance is at an end; but pray come and see me to-morrow. I mean privately, of course. I can relate to you many experiences even more startling than yours of to-night."

Leslie, as he quitted the house, vowed to himself that he would never cross its threshold again. He was greatly startled, to say the least. He was more than startled. He was in a maze of perplexity and doubt. Could it possibly be true, he asked himself again and again, that the spirit of his dead wife had really been present in that room? How could any one there know that her name had been Emmeline? Popjoy and he had never met till yesterday. Had he done right in coming away thus abruptly? Might he not have heard more? Might there not even have come some message for him had he stayed?

One moment he said, "I'll go back and probe the mystery further." The next he said, "I'll not go near the place again; the secrets of the grave are sacred."

Little sleep had Gawain Leslie that night. All next day he was in a fever of unrest and anxiety. He could not settle his mind to anything. He took his daughter—his little Emmeline—out with him, and wandered all the morning in the shrubberies. All the old recollections that were beginning to grow dim in his memory came freshly back to him to-day. The sound of his wife's voice, the bright, frank glance of her eyes, all her little tricks of manner, were recalled one by one, or rather, they came of their own accord, and without conscious effort on his part.

At eight o'clock he found himself for the second time in Dr. Popjoy's drawing-room. The Doctor was as good as his word, and related to Leslie several startling experiences that had come under his own cognisance, or that of friends of his in the same line of business.

The two men then adjourned to the back drawing-room; for Leslie had made up his mind to hear more, if it were permitted him to hear. There Miss De Vaux joined them, and they all seated themselves at a slightly-built four-legged table. They had not long to wait. In a very few minutes Miss De Vaux announced that a spirit was present.

"What is your name?" was asked.

Leslie was startled, but he contrived to maintain his outward composure.

"Is there any question that you would like to ask the spirit?" asked Popjoy in a low voice.

What should he ask next? He could have found fifty questions that he longed to have answered, but he shrank from putting them, partly because the Doctor and Miss De Vaux were present, and partly from a feeling that it would seem like prying into the secrets of the dead.

While he was hesitating the Doctor said, "Perhaps you would like some more positive proof that the spirit now among us is really that of your late wife?"

"That seems to me very desirable," he said. "At present——"

"You are not altogether convinced that such is the case. Suppose we ask the spirit to write her name? Probably, sir, you could recognise your late wife's signature?"

"Yes; I think there could be no doubt on that point," said Leslie.

A small slate, such as a very youthful schoolboy might use, was then produced, to which a piece of pencil was attached by a string. Popjoy showed Leslie that the sides of it were perfectly free from writing. He then laid the slate with one face downwards against the underside of the table, and held it there with his thumb. The gas was then lowered again, and all sat in silence. Presently a faint scratching sound was heard which lasted for a space of three or four seconds. The lights were then turned up and the slate produced. On it were the words, "Emmeline Leslie."

Mrs. Leslie's autograph had been peculiar and distinctive. There was no mistaking her mode of writing her name for that of any one else, and Leslie at once recognised the signature as being the handwriting of his dead wife. He was more startled than ever. He knew not what to think. If any suspicion of trickery on the part of Popjoy had ever found harbourage in his mind it was now banished for ever. That the spirit of his departed wife—of her whom he had loved so truly and mourned so tenderly—was veritably present with him, he could no longer doubt. And she had assured him that she was happy—ineffably happy! How dear her memory was to him still, and would continue to be through life! It was more than four years since he had lost her, and yet there was her well-remembered signature on that slate, written but a minute ago! It was all incomprehensible—a dread mystery which it seemed like profanation even to attempt to solve.

Perhaps the Doctor was growing impatient at Leslie's long silence. At any rate, he said, "Suppose we ask the spirit whether she has any message for you?" Leslie bowed a grave assent. Miss de Vaux put the question, "Have you any message to deliver to your husband?"

"What is it?"

"Perhaps the spirit would prefer to write its message," suggested the medium. So the slate was again put in position under the table, and again the mysterious scratching noise was audible. As soon as it ceased the gas was turned up, and the message written on the slate read aloud by Popjoy.

Leslie's face was very pale. A clammy chill wrapped him from head to foot. He tried to speak, but could not. Once more the gas was lowered, and once more the slate was placed in position. Then in slow and impressive accents, Miss de Vaux put the question: "When and where shall Gawain Leslie see the woman whom it is fore-ordained that he shall marry, and by what token shall he recognise her?"

Three minutes later the doctor read out the answer that was written on the slate:—"The first woman Gawain Leslie shall meet who wears a heart-shaped locket set with turquoises will be his future wife. Farewell." The séance was at an end, and Leslie went his way, dazed, stunned, utterly bewildered. To say that no thought of a second marriage had ever entered his head would be to state more than the truth, but it was a thought that had never been seriously entertained. He had told himself again and again that he would remain true to the memory of her who was gone, and he fully intended to do so; but then never since his wife's death had he seen any one whom he cared for sufficiently to fall in love with. Had he been suddenly smitten for the second time, who can tell what might have happened? In such a case resolutions and promises are liable to melt away like snow in spring. But Leslie, as yet, had been exposed to no such temptation. He had his little Emmeline to cheer him when ever he felt hipped, and his maiden aunt Maria looked too carefully after his creature comforts to allow of his feeling that he missed anything on that score. In short, Leslie had found that, with seven thousand a year and an unimpaired digestion, a male creature could live a life of tolerable happiness, even though his solitude might remain uncheered by the presence of a wife.

But what a difference that dread revelation in the Doctor's back drawing-room had made in his thoughts and feelings! He dared no longer tell himself, in such positive terms as heretofore, that would not marry again. Had it not been told him from a source which he could not dispute that he must marry again; nay, more, that it was fore-ordained that he should marry again? The revelation had been so sudden, so unexpected, that for the time being it had seemed to shake the very foundations of his life. But hours went by, and next day came in due course, by which time his mind had in some measure familiarised itself with the new and startling idea thrust thus rudely into it, and began to find it far from unpleasant to dwell upon.

A few more hours passed, and Leslie's thoughts began to project themselves in wonder and curiosity towards the unknown woman whom it was pre-ordained that he should take to his heart, and love and cherish as he had once loved and cherished his poor Emmeline. Who was she? What was she like? Was she young or old, rich or poor? Where should he look for her, or would she cross his path unsought? "The first woman he should meet wearing a heart-shaped locket set with turquoises." He no longer said to himself, "I shall never marry again." What he said now was, "How soon shall I see her?" He had not long to wait.

It was on the fourth morning after his last visit to Dr. Popjoy that Gawain Leslie, passing through the conservatory on his way to the kitchen garden, encountered little Emmeline and her governess, Miss Temple, at the door. As usual, Emmy demanded to be kissed. Having complied with the young lady's peremptory request, her father replaced her on the ground. As he raised his eyes again he involuntarily started. Suspended from Miss Temple's neck by a ribbon of black velvet was a small, heart-shaped locket set with turquoises. Leslie looked and looked again to make sure that he was not mistaken. His surprise expressed itself so frankly in his face that Miss Temple in her turn became surprised. Then she blushed; then she took little Emmy by the hand, and, bowing gravely, led her forward into the house. Her first care was to survey herself in the glass. Surely something must be amiss, or Mr. Leslie would not have stared so—either a pin misplaced, a ribbon awry, or something the matter with her hair? But she could discern nothing wrong. Never before had Mr. Leslie looked at her as he looked at her to-day. What could it mean? As for Gawain, he walked out into the garden, his hands buried deeply in his pockets, his hat pulled over his brows, feeling like a man whose dreams have come true, but after a fashion altogether strange and inexplicable.

A governess for his wife? Well, Miss Temple was a lady in manners and education; of her parentage and connections he knew nothing. It was strange that he had never noticed till that morning what beautiful eyes she had, and with just the tinge in them that he most admired. Without being beautiful, she was indubitably nice-looking, with one of those delicate oval faces which, unfortunately for us, are oftener to be seen depicted on canvas than met with in the flesh. Where had his eyes been all this time?

He got out into the woods, and wandered about all day by himself. The thought of making Miss Temple his wife was anything but displeasing to him. His heart warmed towards the girl already. Three months had passed since she first came to Hinchcliffe. How blind he must be not to have seen long ago what a treasure lay close to his hand! And Emmy, too: would it not be better that she should have some one bound to her by closer ties than those of a governess; some one who would care for her, and look after her interests as well, or nearly as well, as her own mother could have done? But through the tissue of all his musings ran a dark thread of wonder, almost of dread, at finding how swiftly one portion at least of the weird spirit-prediction had been fulfilled. Of a surety, the rest would accomplish itself in due course. He went back to dinner with a strange feeling of warmth and elation at his heart such as he had long been a stranger to.

Small need to tell here the story of the courtship of Gawain Leslie and Annette Temple. Leslie found in Annette what seemed to him like a fuller complement to his own life than he had found even in Emmeline. She was, in truth, what he had told himself she was—a lady in manners and education; to him she was, in addition, all that a lover wishes the chosen one of his heart to be. To her antecedents and family connections she had never made any allusion. Gawain asked her once whether her parents were still alive. A look of pain came into her face, and her eyes filled with tears. "My mother died several years ago," she said. "My father is still living, but—I am alone in the world." After that Leslie questioned her no more. It was herself and not her relations that he wanted to marry. Give him but that treasure, and he would ask of the Fates nothing more.

Even Aunt Maria had only the mildest opposition to offer when her nephew told her that he was going to make Miss Temple his wife, for the girl had thoroughly won her way into the old lady's affections. "I hope she comes of a good family. You ought to ascertain all about that, my dear," she said to Gawain.

"It's all right on that score, Aunty," he answered, with a grave face, but a laughing eye. Then the old lady cried a little, and when Gawain sent Annette to her she kissed her and made much of her, and told her that she loved her as if she were her own child.

To Annette it all seemed like a dream of strange and unspeakable happiness. There was hardly a day that she did not say say to herself, "It cannot be real—it cannot be true. I shall wake up to-morrow, and find it nothing but 'an unsubstantial pageant of the brain.'" For the friendless, dependent girl what a change it was! From Cinderella to a Princess! She had nothing to reproach her conscience with on the score of not loving her fairy prince sufficiently well. He had won her whole heart. The still, deep fountains of her love overflowed for him alone.

It wanted but a fortnight to the day fixed for their marriage—Gawain was no believer in long courtships—when they found themselves, one sunny eve, where they had often found themselves before—on the banks of a garrulous streamlet that wound its way like a silver thread through the Hinchcliffe Woods. Said Gawain to Annette, with his arm round her waist, "I never told you how it was that I first came to love you. It was all through that little turquoise locket which you sometimes wear."

"And pray, sir, what had my turquoise locket to do with the fact of your loving me?"

"Much. It was revealed to me at a spiritualistic séance that the first woman I should meet who wore a locket similar to yours should become my second wife."

"Revealed to you at a spiritualistic séance! Where did the séance take place?"

"Describe Dr. Popjoy to me. Photograph him in words." She was trembling by this time, as Gawain could plainly feel. He described Popjoy to her as closely as he could.

"And it was told you at a séance at this man's house that the first woman you should meet who wore a turquoise locket should become your second wife?"

"Certainly it was. Four days afterwards I saw you with a turquoise locket round your neck. And you are going to be my wife, are you not? Rather a remarkable prediction, I call it."

Gently Annette withdrew Gawain's arm from round her waist. Then she imprinted one passionate kiss on his hand and rose to her feet. Her face was colourless. Gawain gazed at her with wondering eyes.

"You have been the victim of a vile fraud, Gawain Leslie," she said. "You have been the tool of a man without principle or honour. He who calls himself Dr. Popjoy is my father, Aurelius Temple."

"Your father, Annette!"

"He broke my mother's heart, he spent her fortune and his own. Then he turned lecturer and spiritualist, and because I would not become what he called a 'medium'—in other words, a confederate in his frauds—he cast me off, and has never seen me from that day to this. Once every three months I write to him to inform him where I am. Even in the seclusion of Hinchcliffe I had heard something of the wonders reputed to be worked by Dr. Popjoy. I had a suspicion that the Doctor and my father were the same man, although he had borne a different name only a year previously, but it was a suspicion that I would not verify, as I might easily have done. I was afraid to know the truth. I did not want to think he was so near me. One day a woman came to me—a stranger. She had brought me a message from my father, she said. He had sent me his love, and a locket set with turquoises. The morrow would be his birthday; would I promise to wear the locket on that day? I was touched by the message. 'Perhaps, after all, he does care for me a little,' I thought, and I gladly promised. Next day you saw me wearing the locket, and it seemed to you like a fulfilment of the prediction. But it has been a plot from beginning to end to entrap you, a rich man, into marrying his daughter. In one sense I have been his victim as much as you have, for, as Heaven is above me, I had not the faintest knowledge of the web that was being spun round both of us!"

"I am quite sure that you had not," said Gawain, earnestly. He was still resting on his elbow on the grass, and gazing up into her white face. Two tears trembled in the corners of her eyes. It was only by an intense effort that she kept herself from breaking down. Even in the midst of his bewilderment Leslie could not help saying to himself, "How lovely she looks! What a face for a Madonna."

"It has been a happy, happy dream," said Annette, with a half-sob. "The waking has come at last. I knew that it was too sweet to last."

"But why need the waking come, Annette?" said Gawain, as he sprang to his feet and tried to take her hand. "Why cannot we still dream on?"

"That is impossible," she said, as she drew back, and there was no mistaking the decision of her tone. "I cannot win my husband as my father would have had me win you. I have some pride left in me, though it may sound ridiculous to say so, seeing whose daughter I am. I was a coward. I ought to have told you at first who and what my father was. But I couldn't—I couldn't! And then I was so happy! All that is over now. From this moment, Mr. Leslie, your path and mine diverge for ever."

She ceased, and stood gazing at him with eyes in which there was a strange pathetic yearning. He strode towards her.

"Touch me not," she cried, with a ring of pain in her voice, as she shrank further from him among the rustling leaves. Then all at once with a low cry she unclasped her hands and turned and fled, and next minute was lost to view among the winding woodland ways.

Two hours later Gawain reached home, but only to find that Annette was not there. She had come in, all in a hurry, one of the servants told him, had kissed Miss Emmy, and had gone out again five minutes later, carrying a little hand-bag as her only luggage. Leslie mounted his horse and galloped to the railway station, not doubting that he should find some traces of her there. But neither there nor anywhere else were any traces of her to be found—or rather only such faint traces as served to confuse and baffle him the more. She had gone, and days passed into weeks, and still no tidings of the missing girl reached Hinchcliffe. Dr. Popjoy, too, had disappeared, leaving considerable accounts unpaid in the town, and no one seemed to know into what disreputable limbo he had so suddenly vanished.

Leslie was as nearly distracted as it was possible for a man of his temperament to be. He could neither eat, nor sleep, nor feel any interest in the ordinary affairs of life. His mind was filled with the image of his lost Annette. Had she had twenty fathers, all humbugs and charlatans, he would have made her his wife none the less. Weeks passed into months, and brought no tidings of her, and at last Leslie determined to seek the same relief that he had sought in his first great trouble, the relief of travel.

His portmanteau was packed, and another quarter of an hour would have seen him at the station, when Aunt Maria gave utterance to what for her was a really brilliant suggestion. "My dear," she said to her nephew, "has it never struck you that you might perhaps hear some tidings of Miss Temple if you were to call upon Mrs. Woodfall, the lady upon whose recommendation I engaged her when she came here? Probably Miss Temple has had to look out for another situation by this time. To whom would she be more likely to apply for a testimonial as to her character and abilities than to the person who gave her such an excellent one before? Might you not find some traces of her that way?"

Gawain hugged his aunt as he had never hugged her before. Six hours later he was sitting in Mrs. Woodfall's drawing-room. Yes, Mrs. Woodfall, somewhat to her surprise, had been applied to for a second testimonial in the case of Miss Temple. The address of the lady to whom she sent it was "Madame Chose, Rue de ——, Boulogne-sur-Mer."

Leslie started for France next morning. It was early afternoon when the steamer reached Boulogne. The sands were dotted with a gay crowd of idlers and bathers. As he stood on the pier after landing from the steamer, Leslie's eyes roamed over the yellow expanse. Perchance she whom he had come so far to seek was there among the crowd, all unwitting who was so near her. He took out his binocular and searched the sands to and fro, far and near. Yes, by Heaven! yonder she was, full half-a-mile away, sitting on a camp-stool apart from the crowd, with two children playing near her. "'There is none like her, none,'" he said, quoting from "Maud." Then he gave a porter a couple of francs to look after his portmanteau, and found his nearest way on to the sands.

Annette was reading as he drew near. She was interested in her book, and never once looked up as he walked towards her. The children heeded him not, he was only one Anglais the more. Before Annette knew what had happened a strong arm was round her waist, a pair of glowing lips were pressed to hers. "My love, my darling!" he cried. "I have found you at last, and you shall never leave me again!"

He was down on one knee by this time, but still grasping her firmly round the waist. The few loungers near at hand gazed in astonishment to see big-bearded Gawain pulling the pretty "Mees" towards him, and kissing her again and again. They shrugged their shoulders it was only one specimen the more of English eccentricity. Much cared Gawain for their staring. The lost one was found, and who so happy as he?

And Annette? Well, if you can tell me what wiser thing she could do than surrender at discretion, you are cleverer than I. In any case, that is what she did. She capitulated to the enemy, and had such faith in the generosity of her captor that she did not even attempt to make terms with him.

On his wedding morn, about an hour after the ceremony was over, the following note was put into Gawain Leslie's hand:

"My dear Son-in-Law,—So the spirits were right after all, and the young lady with the turquoise locket has become Mrs. Leslie No. 2. No use fighting against fate, dear boy. I might preach you a charming little homily from that text, but I take pity on you, and refrain.

"You have acted a manly part, and I admire you for it. If I know anything of my Annette you will have no reason to regret your choice. A word in your ear: Don't alarm yourself with the idea that the 'old man' will be a thorn in your side. Your ways are not my ways, and we are better apart. Besides—I have secured my object, and want nothing more of you. Kiss Annette for me. In that battered old atomy I call my heart there is still a corner sacred to her, though she may not think so. Farewell. I wing my flight to other climes, where verdant pasturage for such as I still abounds. Bless you, my children! May happiness be yours! Ever your affectionate papa,

"Aurelius Temple (otherwise Popjoy).

"P.S. That little affair of the signature was rather clever, eh? It cost me a couple of sovereigns to get a specimen of your wife's handwriting. But I don't regret the outlay."

"Dr. Popjoy" kept his word. Neither Leslie nor his wife had any further tidings of him. To this day they know not whether he is living or dead.

OCTOBER

October's come; the year has almost sped;
The ripened fruit upon the boughs glows red;
The fallen leaves are crisp, and rustling play
In whirling eddies all the gusty day,
While every tree takes on its autumn dress
Of gold and crimson and sad loveliness.
The night is long, the dawn is raw and cold,
The even cheerless, and the day soon told;
The very sunshine, when it lights the air,
Is sweetly sad and sorrowfully fair.
One while the landskip is a scene of gold
Such as the poets sing in songs of old;
And now the leaden clouds dissolve in rain
And fill the mere and flood the fen again;
At length the winter's breath comes strangely keen
A calm unruffled stillness fills the fields,
Shorn of the golden spoils which August yields;
A hush of well-earned rest, of looked-for peace,
The worker's slumber when his labours cease,
Broods over all; and e'en the winter's care
Is half unthought of and half changed to prayer.

European Literature now counts 13,960 journals and periodicals, according to a German statistician. Of these 937 are claimed by the Roman Catholics.

Some Rare Napoleonic Coins, known amongst collectors as the five-franc pieces "with the lock," have been sold in Paris for 10*l.* a piece. These coins were the first struck after the Coup d'État, and a specimen was sent to the Elysée for Prince Louis Napoleon's approval. The Prince, however, forgot to look at the coin for some days, and was then so annoyed by the representation of a certain stray lock of hair on his forehead that he ordered a new impression to be taken. Twenty-three coins had, however, already been struck, and these are now very valuable.

A Curious Phenomenon in the South Pacific is reported by the Prince Edward Island Farmer. The captain of a German steamer passing by the island of New Britain on the New Guinea coast found the north-east shores of the island covered with thick smoke, and had considerable difficulty in passing the strait separating it from New Ireland on account of the fields of pumice which covered the sea to the depth of four or five feet. Three craters had opened on a peninsula formed by the island, and were sending forth continuous streams of lava, while in White Bay a new island nearly a mile long sprung out of a depth of eighteen fathoms. For several days the bay was very hot, and large numbers of fish and turtles were thrown on shore.

A VISIT TO HYÈRES

HYÈRES, a picturesque little town in the south of France, situated some three miles from the Mediterranean, and about eight miles from Toulon, is perhaps the best suited for the English invalid of all the resorts along the Riviera. Its climate is delightfully mild, while the neighbourhood abounds in beautiful walks and drives, the fruits and flowers of Europe growing side by side with those of the tropics, and the stately-looking palms giving an Oriental aspect to the richly-cultivated country. Though, perhaps, as a town, Hyères can hardly be compared with Nice, Cannes, and Mentone, it is more accessible, and, with the exception of Cannes, is a more exclusively English resort, while here the quietly disposed visitor is quite out of the vortex of that beautiful but baneful spot Monte Carlo, which attracts the off-scouring of Europe to this coast. At Hyères, that elsewhere almost obsolete conveyance, the diligence, flourishes, and on the Toulon road competes successfully with the railway—as the inhabitants, either from Conservatism or from motives of economy, award it a very decided preference.

The municipal authorities are to blame if the sanitary arrangements are not good, for they have now an abundant supply of good water. One of the peculiarities of the place is the long row of washerwomen pursuing their avocations at the roadside, dressed mostly in the costume of the country, which consists of a light cerise-coloured dress, striped with thin black lines, and the broad Leghorn-straw hats, which, however, are generally taken off when they are washing the clothes.

A great resort for pic-nic parties is Fenouillet, one of the highest hills in the neighbourhood, surmounted, as they often are, by a cross. Here, at a small chapel, the party is regaled by a "petit verre" of liquor, concocted by the good monks from the local herbs, as they say; but to our taste very much resembling cognac and sugar. There are very pretty villas in Hyères and the neighbourhood, with beautiful gardens belonging to them. From the gardens at the back of the villas in the sketch, which rise a good many feet above the level of the sea, one gets a most beautiful view of the surrounding country, with the blue Mediterranean studded with crafts of all kinds, from the mighty ironclad to the smallest fishing-boat, and the Islands of Porquerolles and Iles d'Or.

CARLO GATTI

BY the death of Carlo Gatti a man has passed away deserving of more than a passing notice. Carlo Gatti was a Swiss, a native of Dongio in the valley of Blenio. This valley is noted for the periodical yearly emigration of a large number of its inhabitants to foreign lands for the purpose of selling roast chestnuts in the streets. They leave in mid-autumn, and return early in the spring. Carlo Gatti emigrated at the early age of twelve with hardly the value of one pound sterling in his pocket, and from a poor shepherd boy became at once a traveller of the world, for he started for the great capital of France, and reached it, walking the whole distance of 600 miles. His chestnut wandering trade in Paris does not seem to have particularly prospered, for, after many journeys there and back home, he resolved on trying his fortunes in London. He came to London in 1847, and two years later he was a French chocolate manufacturer. It is worth mentioning that he carried on this manufacture side by side with the sale of his roast chestnuts and his gaufres, and before a public that was not in those days particularly fond of "Frenchmen." Happily those days are past, and let us hope for ever. The star of success was already shining brightly over the head of Carlo Gatti, and he seemed to overcome easily all difficulties and prejudices.

He started café after café on the Continental style, and built the Hungerford Hall, which stood near his present magnificent "Café de la Confederation Suisse," with its thirty English billiard tables, and for which he obtained ample compensation at the hands of the South Eastern Railway Company, by whom it was demolished for the requirements of the Charing Cross Station. Carlo Gatti's prosperity seems to have made especially rapid strides since 1857, when, finding ice still very dear and its consumption considerably enlarged, he undertook to import it direct from Norway, where Nature manufactures it and preserves it. He was thus at once enabled to sell ice to the public at under one-third of the current price, distributing it with his sixty vans and carts; and the public bought largely and thankfully all over London. In a short time he had become the largest ice merchant in London. His death has been mourned both in London and Switzerland, and in the latter country especially, as he was a munificent benefactor to his native canton. Carlo Gatti, as stated above, was born in Dongio, in the Canton Ticino, on the 17th of July, 1817, and died in his native place on the 6th of September. The funeral, which was attended by some 2,000 people, took place in Bellinzona, where now lie his remains. He who began as a shepherd boy has died, it is stated, a millionaire.

WASHINGTON MEMORIALS IN NORTHAMPTONSHIRE

OF all the places of interest visited by the Royal Archæological Institute on the occasion of its recent visit to Northampton, few could have presented more points of attraction than the tombs and other memorials of the Washington family, still to be seen at Brington, about six miles from that town.

In the year 1532, and again in 1546, there was a Lawrence Washington, Mayor of Northampton. He was the son of John Washington, of Warton, Lancashire, and a member of Gray's Inn; afterwards, however, he relinquished the profession of the law and settled in Northampton, where he rose to great influence. His uncle was Sir Thomas Kitson, a merchant of London, whose daughter had been espoused by Sir John Spencer, of Althorp. In 1539 he obtained a grant of the manor and lands of Sulgrave, North Hants, together with other estates, which until then had belonged to the Monastery of St. Andrew's at Northampton. Retiring to Sulgrove, he there died at a ripe old age. Three generations of Washingtons only retained possession of Sulgrave, the grandson of the grantee being obliged to sell it and retire to Brington, where he would be under the protection of his kinsmen the Spencers. The house in Little Brington is still shown where he is supposed to have lived. Over the door is the inscription:—"The Lord giveth, the Lord taketh away! Blessed be the name of the Lord. Constrvcta 1606."

The parish register, amongst other Washington records, contains notices of the baptism and burial of a son of this Lawrence Washington in 1606-7. The latter died in 1616, and his remains lie buried in the chancel of the parish church. One of our illustrations represents the shield bearing his arms, impaled with those of his wife, engraven on his tombstone. Near to him, but in the nave, is the grave of his brother Robert. It also bears a shield on brass, showing the same blazon (argent two bars gules; in chief three mullets of the second), with the crescent of a younger brother. This shield, of which we also give a sketch, exhibits even more plainly than the other the characteristics which have caused the device to be regarded as the origin of the American flag, namely, the five-pointed stars and the alternate red and white stripes. Robert Washington died without issue. Lawrence, however, had a large family. The first son was Sir William Washington, of Packington, Leicestershire, who wedded a sister of the Duke of Buckingham, through whose influence the fortunes of the family seem to have revived. The second was Sir John. Repeated mention is made of him in the household books of Althorp, where he and several of his brothers were frequent guests. He was married to a daughter of Philip Curtis, of Islip, North Hants, by whom he had three sons. A mural tablet to her memory still exists in the Islip Church. Little is known of Sir John, save that he appears, like the other Washingtons, to have taken the side of the King in the Civil Wars, and that he was concerned, along with a younger brother Lawrence, in the troubles of 1656, and so with him obliged to take refuge in Virginia. Before his emigration he lived some time at South Cave in Yorkshire, where he had acquired an estate. Emigrating about the year 1657 he settled at Bridge's Creek, Westmoreland County, and, marrying again, became the great grandfather of President Washington. In the red and white bars and the stars of his shield, and the "eagle issuant" of his crest—borne later by General Washington—the framers of the Constitution undoubtedly, too, got the idea of the stars and stripes and the spread eagle of the national emblem.

Joss, the large Baboon at the Alexandra Palace, who had a tooth extracted some weeks ago, has been obliged to undergo a further operation, as he was suffering from disease of the jaw. The monkey was put under chloroform, and two more teeth and part of the jaw were taken away; while Joss seemed none the worse for the operation when he came to again, but after cooling his face against a window-pane, rejoined his companions, apparently much relieved. The chloroform took 4 min. 37 sec. to produce total unconsciousness in Joss, who is a large specimen of his tribe, and from twelve to fifteen years old, while he revived in about ten minutes.

The Greenland Eastern Ice-fields, between the Danish colonies of Fredrikshaab and Godthaab, have been successfully explored by three Danes and a Greenlander, who spent twenty-three days and nights in the icy territory, enduring great hardships and suffering. The explorers ascended the eastern mountain range, declared by Dalager, after his ascent of the "Nunatak" mountain, near Fredrikshaab, in 1751, to form the east coast of Greenland. Entering the ice-fields on July 14, the travellers took ten days to reach the foot of the range, the loose snow, the uneven surface of the ice, and the numerous crevasses making their progress slow and dangerous, while they were still further hindered by storms and fogs. For six days the party were prevented by the fog from ascending the mountains; but on July 31st the weather moderated, and they were able to climb the highest peak of the range, estimated to be some five thousand feet above the sea-level. On the other side of the ridge, ice-fields were visible as far as eye could reach, the plateau apparently rising higher and higher, and these observations clearly prove that the Greenland coast is not terminated, as had been supposed, by the mountain range.

The Clock at the New Law Courts.——In reference to a statement in our last issue Mr. J. P. Young writes that the dial of the Law Courts Clock is not the second largest in London, the dial of St. Paul's Clock being 57 feet in circumference, or over 18 feet in diameter, that is, more than double the 9 feet diameter of the Law Courts Clock. In fact, the minute hand is as long as the diameter in question.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett.

"While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.

Topics of the Week

The Bank Failure.——The failure of the City of Glasgow Bank may not, perhaps, cause quite so much distress as was at first feared, but under the most favourable conditions it must lead to wide-spread misery. Thousands of unfortunate people will suffer heavy loss, while a large number, including many widows and minors, will be utterly ruined. The more the affairs of the Bank are examined, the clearer it becomes that the disaster is due solely to the incompetence and rashness of the directors. In order to gain an advantage over its rivals, the Bank gave unusually high interest on deposits, and this involved the necessity of extensive speculation. Loans were granted on the most worthless securities, and schemes were supported, the hollowness of which ought to have been obvious to the feeblest business intelligence. By dexterous management the public were led to believe that the Bank was thoroughly sound, while the high dividends induced scores of people who love rapid gains to become shareholders. We do not think any language can be too strong for the condemnation of those who have thus trifled with a most serious trust. It may not be possible to bring any of them to book for their misdeeds; but they are morally responsible for the whole of the havoc and wretchedness the stoppage of the Bank will entail. It is to be hoped that the directors of other Banks will take to heart the obvious lessons of the failure. The public are beginning to question whether the custom of giving interest on deposits is not altogether a mistake; but in any case the interest ought evidently to be so far limited that there shall be no necessity for other than safe business transactions. If investors do not profit by what has happened, we may confidently say that they will profit by nothing. It has once more been revealed to them with startling vividness that large dividends, if attractive, are also dangerous, and should excite, not lull, suspicion. Nowadays, however, people are so eager to be rich that after a very short time the warning will in many instances lose its force, and probably even some of those who are now suffering will be as anxious as ever to make money quickly rather than by the slow, but sure, methods that were popular with our forefathers.

Free Trade and War.——Mr. Bright's letter to the Bologna Professor comes with especial opportuneness at the present time, when the nations of the Continent are groaning under heavier military burdens than they have endured since the days of the First Napoleon. If Free Trade is a little out of favour in this country just now, it is not because Englishmen think it less admirable in principle than they did thirty years ago, but because so few other nations (our Transatlantic and Antipodal cousins not excepted) show any signs of following England's example. We fully agree with Mr. Bright that universal Free Trade would in all probability prevent for the future such wars as those with which the present generation is familiar; but the question remains whether there is any chance of our getting universal Free Trade while the sentiment of Nationality, Patriotism, or whatever we please to call it, remains as powerful as it now is. If men born and bred in these islands, and still united nominally to the British Empire, erect hostile tariffs against us, for the sake of building up an Australian or a Canadian Nationality, what can we expect from two such countries as France and Germany, which are still animated with mutual feelings of suspicion and revenge? Yet, of all the countries in the world, they are the two which ought chiefly to take Mr. Bright's lecture to heart, for they are both staggering under burdens which—in Germany, especially—are almost too grievous to bear. Why should they not try Mr. Bright's recipe? It would be a glorious experiment, and would confer far more happiness on the world than any number of military triumphs. They need not even aim at universal Free Trade; it will suffice, as each country needs many of the other's commodities, to form a Customs' Union between themselves,—it would be, in fact, merely the admission of another province to the German Zollverein. All sorts of excellent results would follow; the Alsace-Lorraine annexation would cease to be a cause of bitterness, Prince Bismarck's bugbear, Socialism, would assume a milder form, and before long the vast armies which now suck the blood and empty the pockets both of Jacques Bonhomme and Hans Sauerkraut would be found to be anachronisms, and would be quietly disbanded. The giants having thus put off their armour, the dwarfs (that is, the smaller surrounding nations) would only too readily follow their example, and bit by bit, the Customs' Union might be extended, until at last the nations realised, at least commercially, Victor Hugo's vision of "the United States of Europe."

Russian Intrigues.——Russia seems to have her hands pretty full at present, if we may trust half the statements that are made with an air of authority about her. There can be no sort of doubt as to her intrigues at Cabul; and she seems lately to have been equally busy at Constantinople. In Berlin, at any rate, the charges of the Porte with regard to the cruelty of Austrian troops in Bosnia are attributed wholly to Russian influence, nor is there any reason to question that this view is correct. The Russians would like nothing better than to compel Austria, notwithstanding the objections of Hungary, to go on adding to her difficulties; and this object could not be more readily obtained than by wounding her honour by false accusations. Were Austria to violate, even in unimportant matters, the Treaty of Berlin, Russia would then have an excellent excuse for following her example. Russian troops would be kept long past the proper time on Turkish soil; and an attempt would be made to secure the virtual union of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia. This is probably the real explanation of the trouble we are now having in Afghanistan. So long as our attention is kept away from Europe, the advisers of the Czar hope that they may act in Turkey very much as they please. Hence the influence they have exerted to induce the Ameer to flout us before the world. Englishmen, however, will he intensely surprised if these tolerably simple tactics are allowed to succeed. After all, our power in Asia is not quite so shaky as Russia imagines. We shall be fully able to look after Shere Ali, to maintain our position in India, and at the same time to see that no injury is done to us in Europe. It is true that we are passing through a time of considerable depression in trade; but the country is still prosperous, and resolved to allow no other nation to trench upon its rights. On the other hand, Russia has rarely been weaker than she is now, and would not dream of doing anything that would inevitably lead to war. We may hope, then, that as she becomes more enlightened with respect to English opinion she will find it safer to be content with the Treaty of Berlin, and to cultivate friendly relations with the only Power which she has in the mean time any real reason to fear.

Sewage Poisoning.——The annual seaside holiday—which was almost unknown to our ancestors, but which is now regarded by the middle classes as a necessity rather than a luxury—is not without its risks to health. Young persons are especially susceptible to malarious influences, and, as our sea-coast towns are naturally resorted to by convalescents from scarlet fever, small-pox, and other infectious complaints, it is common enough to hear of children who have brought home with them from the seaside the seeds of one or other of these maladies. It is to be feared that lodging-house keepers too often let apartments which have only just been vacated by infection-bearing invalids, trusting to luck that no ill-consequences will ensue to the new comers. Indeed, we were recently told of a case where, although the landlady had been paid an extra month's rent by the friends of a person who had died in her apartments of scarlet fever, she put up a bill as soon as they had departed, announcing that these very lodgings were to let. But besides these risks, the danger of defective drainage is quite as great at the seaside as anywhere else. A sad case has just occurred at Ramsgate, where three out of six children (all perfectly robust on their arrival) have fallen victims to diphtheria, clearly produced, it is alleged, by sewer exhalations. Our present plan of disposing of our sewage is, perhaps, on the whole preferable to the primitive method of our forefathers, but it brings with it special evils of its own. The fault of the old system was that the cesspools were rarely emptied, and that in process of time they leaked into the springs from whence the household drew its water supply. But, at all events, at that epoch there was little likelihood of a family being poisoned by sewer gases artificially brought from a distance. The other day a case was reported of a household whose health was good as long as their sewers were insulated, but as soon as they were connected with the main drainage illness supervened, and several deaths occurred. There, is, of course, a remedy against this evil. All drain-pipes leading to the sewers should be ventilated by an upright pipe leading to the roof. But it is hard that tenants—whose occupancy is often very brief—should be put to the expense of this somewhat costly improvement, and landlords will rarely do it, unless they are compelled. Such compulsion ought to be exercised, otherwise the extension of our present sewage system is likely to prove a curse rather than a blessing. At some future date, perhaps, instead of diluting our sewage so as to make it almost useless as a fertilising agent, we may employ our elaborate net-work of sewers merely for carrying away storm-waters, and trust to earth as a deodoriser, accompanied by frequent and systematic removal of all refuse matter.

The Difficulties of Austria.——The Emperor of Austria finds himself at present in an extremely awkward and dangerous position. The Turks absolutely refuse to sanction his occupation of Bosnia; and, what is far more important, the Hungarians are murmuring so loudly against the policy of Count Andrassy that the Hungarian Ministry has been compelled to resign. The alternative the Emperor has before him, therefore, is to stop short in the undertaking he has begun, or to complete it at the risk of permanently alienating the Hungarians. For the latter are thoroughly in earnest. They have all along sided with the Turks, and they side with them more vehemently than ever now that the inevitable consequences of annexing Bosnia are becoming clearer. If the Slav element in the Empire is added to, Austria will more and more have to cultivate the friendship of Russia; and Hungary will play a much less important part than it thinks itself entitled to play, and than it has been playing since the establishment of the dual system. The Slavs will, in short, control the whole policy of the State. We do not believe that the Emperor can afford to stir up the passions which would be thus aroused. His earliest experiences in public life were in connection with Hungarian resistance to tyranny; and he is never likely to have other than a vivid impression of the complete surrender he had to make to Deak after the battle of Königgrätz. He knows very well that Hungary can still make herself troublesome; that, perhaps, if the worst came to the worst, she might bring ruin upon him and his dynasty. By accepting a compromise he will not, unfortunately, make an end of his troubles. The Hungarians will still be offended, and, on the other hand, he will have obtained far too slight a hold of Bosnia to make his tenure of the province either honourable or secure. It is not all improbable that, notwithstanding his ambition and the hardships his army has endured, he may ultimately be forced to act as the Turks and the Hungarians wish: rule Bosnia for a time, and then hand it over again to the Sultan. This was the nominal intention of the Congress, but nobody supposed at the time that its nominal and its real intention had any genuine resemblance. Events, however, are not going in the direction indicated by the statesmen who would fain have controlled them from Berlin; they are quite unexpectedly—in this matter at least—moving in favour of Turkey. Should they continue to do so, Count Andrassy will be responsible for as pretentious and as futile a policy as any that has been known in the present century.

Electricity versus Gas.——There are still a good many old people alive who can remember when London was lighted by oil lamps, and now—although it is always dangerous to prophesy—it seems not unlikely that the career of carburetted hydrogen gas as an illuminator of our streets and houses is coming to an end. Mr. Edison, of phonograph renown, announces that he can subdivide the new electric light to any extent—the difficulty of such subdivision having been hitherto the great obstacle to its use for the purpose of interior lighting. As regards expense, the statistics supplied by M. Manchon, of the Rouen cloth factory, show that the electric light is, in France, some twenty per cent. cheaper than gas. In this country, however, where gas is much lower in price, the balance of cost would apparently be against the electric light. The work-people in M. Manchon's factory speak favourably of the new illuminator, on account of the whiteness of the light, and the absence of heat, which latter quality is such an unpleasant characteristic of gas. Judging from our own observation of the new light outside the Gaiety Theatre, it resembles in softness and tint the moonlight of the tropics, only still more powerful, and the adjacent gas-jets look by contrast almost orange-coloured. Time will show whether the electric light will conquer its yellow rival. As we have said above, we shrink from prophesying, but, at the same time, we feel no strong desire just now to invest in gas-shares.

Italy and Count Corti.——It appears likely that Count Corti will be able to retain his position in the Italian Cabinet, but he cannot do so without some hesitation. The fact is not creditable to the Italian people. For he has been guilty of no real offence; he simply refrained from entering upon an enterprise in which he could only have met with ignominious failure. The Italian people have been so much accustomed to getting benefit out of every European trouble that they felt sure they would secure something very large indeed after a Russo-Turkish War. If Austria was to receive Bosnia, they had an absolute right, they fancied, to that "unredeemed Italy" about which they talk so vaguely and so largely. But suppose Count Corti had raised the question at the Congress? How grimly Prince Bismarck would have reminded him of the objects for which it had been summoned! And we may be sure that Count Andrassy would not have failed to throw out some ominous hints as to the possible action of his country. All this ought to be perfectly clear to the Italians, but unfortunately they prefer to pose as an injured people, and poor Count Corti is made responsible for their fancied wrongs. The truth is that Italy is not at present in so healthy a condition as her friends could wish. She has all sorts of restless longings, and cannot even see an Englishman and a Frenchman take office in Egypt without demanding that the Khedive shall have an Italian Minister also. And while the priests are busy, the revolutionary clubs are agitating with a fervour that gives promise of a good deal of serious trouble. It would almost seem as if the death of the rough but vigorous and kind-hearted King Emanuel had made a profound difference in the conditions of Italian political life. He so impressed the popular imagination that his indirect influence kept in check irregular impulses and vain aspirations. It will be a grave disaster if the statesmen now in power are unable to win the nation back to its old paths. The Italians have so much to do before they can regard themselves as a genuinely united and prosperous people that they can ill-afford to waste their strength in foolish projects.

DISTINGUISHING MARKS ON OMNIBUSES.——Everybody who travels outside these useful vehicles is familiar with the would-be passenger (usually a woman), who hails the omnibus, and then discovers that it is not the one she wants. The driver growls because his omnibus has been stopped for nothing, and often adds some remark disparaging to the fair sex in general. Such an experience as this is probably encountered by every omnibus driver in London at least a dozen times a day. But now we would ask: "Is the typical omnibus-seeking old lady always to blame in such cases?" Of course there are stupid or purblind people who would hail a police van or a hearse, but is it not just possible that our omnibuses are less clearly marked than they might be? A lesson in this respect may be learnt from Paris, the parent city of omnibuses. But, as we Londoners are, of all townsfolk, perhaps the most obstinately addicted to old fashions, we would not venture upon any very revolutionary changes. We would keep the old names, the Waterloos, the Favourites, and the Royal Blues; and we would leave the colours of the vehicles, the reds, the yellows, the browns, and the greens, exactly as they now are. But we would make the subsidiary distinctions more clear. For example, you see a yellow omnibus in Tottenham Court Road; but, unless you are close to it, it is difficult to tell, especially after dark, whither it is bound. It may be going to Hampstead, to Highgate, to the Adelaide, to the Mother Shipton, or to the Bull and Gate. Why should not the present system of scattering names at random all over the omnibus be altered; and the next terminus of the vehicle be displayed in conspicuous letters on moveable boards upon both sides and at the back? At night a simple arrangement of coloured lamps would at once indicate each of the five possible destinations towards which a yellow omnibus may be travelling. We have observed that when anything special is going on, such as the Islington Cattle Show, the omnibus proprietors plaster their vehicles in the most spirited manner with staring placards. Why can't they give equal publicity to their ordinary daily journeys?

SKETCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA

CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE IN A FINGO KRAAL

"NEAR Mr. Hall's Fort," writes our artist, "I had the opportunity of seeing a Christian marriage in a Fingo Kraal. The ceremony took place in the open, the clergyman addressing the happy pair in their own language before going through the service, which was likewise in Kaffir. It was amusing to witness the women watch the event, evidently with the same zest as fairer ladies do a similar one, in Great Britain. Bride, bridegroom, and their followers were attired in the "height of fashion," a strange contrast to the women in native costume on the right, who eyed the proceedings with wonder. The gentleman in the military overcoat on the left was holding the ink-bottle for the clergyman, who must have found the native bench he was writing on far from steady."

A PARTY OF FINGO LEVIES WAITING OUTSIDE THE COMMISSARIAT IN KING WILLIAM'S TOWN

"SOME of the Fingo levies," continues our artist, "are armed with the Snider, others with the Enfield rifle, while many still possess muzzle-loading weapons of different patterns. The Fingoes, like all African tribes, are fond of personal ornament, and decorate their hats with ostrich and other feathers, and cast-off uniforms are in great request among them. They wear all sorts of clothing and present a motley appearance. The man sitting with the pipe in his mouth has a fur cap made from the skin of two or three animals, making up a very curious head-dress. The woman on the right is carrying a basket of native manufacture on her head. The men I have represented are armed with muzzle-loaders, as the powder-flask indicates, and when they have these they also retain their native weapon the assegai."

A STOOL-BALL MATCH AT HORSHAM PARK

IN our issue of September 20th we gave some account of the ancient national woman's game of "Stool-ball, or "tuts," from which cricket probably is derived. It is now being revived in Sussex, the initiative being taken by ladies' clubs, composed of members of the principal county families in the neighbourhood of Horsham. The game very much resembles cricket; a small wooden bat is used, shaped like a fives' racket, and the wickets consist of two boards fixed on supports four feet high, placed at a distance of thirteen yards from each other. Runs are scored, catches made, and the "fields" are placed in the same positions as in cricket. Balls must be bowled underhand and full pitch. The ball used is a full-sized tennis ball.

Our illustration represents a match recently played at Horsham Park, the seat of R. H. Hurst, Esq., between two of the county clubs, i.e., the "Foresters," of which Miss Cureton was captain, and the Horsham Park Eleven, under Miss Hurst. Play began at eleven o'clock, the "Foresters," having won the toss, went in first, and were all out with 109 runs by half-past one.

The two elevens then proceeded to a tent pitched in the park, where lunch was prepared for them. Play was resumed at half-past two, when the Horsham Park Eleven went in and made 60 runs; the fielding and bowling of the "Foresters" was exceedingly good.

The "Foresters" then went in and made 136 runs; afterwards the Horsham Park Eleven had their second innings, which only added 16 runs to their previous score. This result was mainly owing to the light failing, and the eleven being quite tired out by having fielded for so long. The "Foresters" thus won by 169 runs.

The two elevens were dressed in picturesque uniforms of light blue and pink, and the beautiful grounds adjoining the house were gaily decorated with flags. The whole formed a most striking scene.

THE ABERCARNE EXPLOSION—MR. SIMPSON'S BOWL

THIS contrivance has become quite an institution in Liverpool; and, indeed, is well known in many surrounding towns. Mr. Simpson, some time ago, hit upon the idea of placing a bowl upon a table before the refreshment rooms on the Liverpool landing-stage. So successful was this bowl, that it quite astonished every one, and aided materially in swelling the contributions to the various charities for which it has from time to time been put into requisition. A list of the amounts dropped into the bowl, and the names of the charities for which contributions were asked, will be found below.

Mr. Simpson has, by his untiring energy in the cause of suffering humanity, earned for himself a name which will long be remembered with gratitude.

AFGHANISTAN—THE UMBALLA DURBAR

THIS Durbar, which was held in grand State by Lord Mayo in March, 1869, at Umballa, is especially noticeable as the last occasion on which Shere Ali had a personal interview with an English Viceroy. Shere Ali had then been in peaceful possession of his throne for nearly a year, and had received valuable presents of both money and arms from Sir John (now Lord) Lawrence. When Lord Lawrence was succeeded by Lord Mayo, the latter continued to pursue the conciliatory policy of his predecessor, and, as we have said, met Shere Ali in a Durbar held with considerable ceremony at Umballa, where Lord Mayo assured the Ameer that Her Majesty's Government had no desire to interfere with the affairs of Afghanistan except to check civil war, and by so doing to secure the peace and prosperity of the country.

The chief object, however, of Shere Ali's visit to British territory was to secure the Viceroy's consent to the succession of his youngest son, Abdullah Jan (since dead), to the musnud of Afghanistan (this youth appears on Lord Mayo's left in the photograph), and to receive a handsome present from the Indian Government of money and arms. As it is well known that he received several thousand stand of Enfield rifles and at least 10,000 rupees, besides a battery of smooth-bore cannon, we shall in all probability shortly have the pleasure of being "hoist with our own petard." There were paraded for his inspection a few of our crack regiments (European), infantry and cavalry, and a mountain battery of artillery. With the exception of the 92nd or 42nd Highlanders, he did not seem to think much of our troops. The stalwart Scotchmen were the only specimens who could compare in physique with his own countrymen, and he expressed an opinion that they might hold their own with his soldiers. As to the Poorbeah Sepoys, he only counted them fit to feed the eagles or manure the soil. He reckoned their fighting power in his country at zero. He would have purchased the mountain battery of artillery, and was willing to give a lac of rupees for it; but the Viceroy was firm, and would not sell the only sort of artillery capable of doing good service in mountainous Afghanistan.

Shere Ali was also unable to secure the recognition by the British Government of his son, Abdullah Jan, as heir to the throne in the place of his elder brother, the brave Yakoob Khan, through whose prowess the Ameer had mainly regained his throne. From this time a coolness seemed to spring up between the Ameer and the British Government, which always faithfully supported the claim of Yakoob Khan; and, when the latter was imprisoned by his father, Lord Northbrook again offended the Ameer by remonstrating with him for incarcerating the son to whom he owed his throne.

The Afghans are genuine mountaineers, and from the cradle to the grave are trained fighters. They are skilful marksmen and superb swordsmen, and man for man put our soldiers—white, black, or brown—in the shade in point of physique and training to the hardships incidental to warfare. They are now mostly armed with breech-loading rifles; and, bearing in mind how a division of Turks held the Russian army in check at Plevna, we must not underrate the foe we are about to meet on his own

CHARLES RIVERS WILSON, ESQ., C.B.

Charles Rivers Wilson, Esq., C.B., who has lately accepted the post of Finance Minister of Egypt, was educated at Eton and at Baliol College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1853, passed a competitive examination, and was appointed a Clerk in the Treasury, February, 1856; was Private Secretary to the Financial Secretary from 1856 till 1858—to the Permanent Secretary from 1858 till December, 1868, and was Acting Private Secretary to Mr. Disraeli (now Lord Beaconsfield) from August, 1867, till July, 1868; was appointed British Representative of the International Coinage Commission in Paris in 1867, and Secretary to the Royal Commission on International Coinage in 1868; was Private Secretary to the Right Hon. R. Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer, from December, 1868, till 1873, when, for special services, he was appointed Comptroller-General of the National Debt Office; was made a C.B., March 3, 1876; was recommended by Her Majesty's Government, at the Khedive's request, for a financial post under the Egyptian Government, and proceeded to Egypt in March, 1876, but returned to England in the following June and resumed his duties at the National Debt Office; was appointed one of the Representatives of Great Britain on the Council of the Suez Canal Company, July 29, 1876; was appointed a Royal Commissioner for the Paris Exhibition of 1878, Jan. 22, 1877.

THE GLASGOW BANK FAILURE

The stoppage of the City of Glasgow Bank has produced great excitement both north and south of the Tweed, and much severe comment upon the conduct of the directors has appeared in the various Scotch and English newspapers. Messrs. Smith, Fleming, and Co., who failed last week, owe the Bank 1,700,000*l.*; another firm owes 1,200,000*l.*, and an Australian house nearly two millions. One of the Directors of the Bank, whose firm has stopped payment, has individually obtained advances to the amount, it is said, of 180,000*l.* Three other Directors owe respectively 500,000*l.*, 170,000*l.*, and 100,000*l.*, and three persons connected by family ties with members of the Board are debtors for 153,000*l.*, 100,000*l.*, and 85,000*l.* The capital of the Bank was 1,000,000*l.*, and the reserve fund 450,000*l.* There are, it is said, 1,200 shareholders, chiefly small capitalists, and the deficit which they will have to make good to the last penny of their possessions, is stated at 2,000,000*l.* The Bank stopped payment in 1857, but resumed business in a short time, and though it has never thoroughly recovered from the blow it then received, its reputation had been maintained and defended publicly with such success that only a week before its collapse its 100*l.* shares were quoted at 243. On Sunday last the subject was alluded to by various preachers in the churches and chapels of Glasgow and Edinburgh. Professor Craig of Glasgow in his sermon asked what was to be thought of a company who in July last declared a dividend of 12 per cent. when they had unbalanced liabilities amounting to millions. The action of such persons seemed to him worse than that of highwaymen of the olden time, who risked their own necks in their trade, but only took what a man had in his possession.

"THE LOVERS," BY CHARLES GUSSOW

This artist commenced his studies at the Saxe-Weimar Academy in 1862, where, after attaining high honours, he subsequently, at the age of twenty-six, became Professor. Four years later he was appointed Professor of Figure Painting at the Ducal Academy in Carlsruhe, Baden. During his two years' stay here he produced several of his most remarkable pictures. "Spectators," exhibited in the London International Exhibition of 1874, and engraved in our number of the 24th October of that year, was the first, followed, amongst others, by "Autumn Flowers," "Town Flowers," and the "Artilleryman's Story of the Battle" this latter (being purchased last year by the Belgian Government), is now in the Museum at Ghent. Early in 1876, at the age of thirty-two, having already gained the Gold Medal of the Royal Berlin Academy, he was called to the Professorship there, the highest distinction that can be conferred upon a German artist; where, with Von Werner and Knaus as his colleagues, he has remained to the present day.

The picture from which our engraving is taken was exhibited this year at the Belgian Gallery, Old Bond Street. It is a forcible specimen of the artist's power and aims; a picture made up of the homeliest materials, yet striking in its truth and realism. It is a perfect little comedy in colours.

Other pictures produced since his residence in Berlin are the "Old Man's Treasure" and the "Widow," the latter gaining the Gold Medal in the Amsterdam International Exhibition last year. And more recently still, his remarkable work, "The Welcome Home," exhibited in the same Exhibition, with "The Lovers," this season. Three of Professor Gussow's works were specially selected by the German Emperor for the present Universal Exhibition in Paris.

"A TIFF"

What is it all about? How comes it that on this lovely summer evening, when Strephon and Chloe ought to be walking together in close companionship, his arm entwining her waist, and perhaps her hand resting unresistingly in his, how comes it that this loving pair are parted asunder, that there is a tearful look on Chloe's fair face as she hurries down the hill, and that Strephon leans disconsolately against the gate, making quite an ugly black blot on the golden radiance of the sky? What is it all about? Faithful Ponto would like to know. Though following Chloe, he is looking back wistfully after Strephon, wondering in his simple doggish mind how it comes to pass that this pair of Siamese twins, as they seemed to be, are no longer together. We can guess the cause of the trouble. There is probably a he or a she in it, perhaps both. Strephon has been paying too marked attention to Phyllis, and then possibly Chloe, just out of pure pique, has had a hot flirtation with Colin. Heaven forbid that the "tiff" should harden into a downright quarrel! Twenty-four hours later, it is to be hoped, they will have kissed, and forgiven each other.

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE IN THE HOLY LAND,
VIII.

Of all the holy places round Jerusalem, the Mount of Olives is held to be the holiest. The Mount still merits its name. The slopes are cultivated, but the vegetation is not luxuriant. The principal trees are the olive, fig, and carob; and here and there a few apricot, almond, terebinth, and hawthorn trees. The view of the city from the summit is very fine, and is thus described by Dean Stanley:—"A few moments, and the path mounts again; it climbs a rugged ascent, it reaches a ledge of smooth rock, and in an instant the whole city bursts into view. As now the dome of the Mosque El-Aksa rises like a ghost from the earth before the traveller, so in Our Lord's time must have risen the Temple tower; as now the vast enclosure of the Mussulman sanctuary, so then must have spread the Temple courts; as now the grey town on its broken hills, so then the magnificent city, with its background—long since vanished away—of gardens and suburbs."

Near the Kidron Valley is the Chapel of the Tomb of the Virgin, where, according to the legend, she was interred by the Apostles, and where she lay till her "Assumption." A church stood over the traditional tomb as early as the fifth century. The existing edifice dates from the twelfth century. The only part of the church above ground is the porch. The principal façade is on the south side, which is flanked by two flying buttresses, and has a portal in the middle, with a beautiful pointed arch, into which a wall with a small door has been built. The arches rest on four marble columns.

Upon Mount Zion, eastward of the citadel, or "City of David," which consists of an irregular group of five square towers, is Christ's Church, belonging to the English Jewish Mission. English Service is performed here every Sunday at ten o'clock, frequently by the Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem.

The Tomb of Rachel lies near the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, close to the latter town. The dome of the tomb closely resembles those of the innumerable Muslim welies (mausoleums of saints), and the whitened sarcophagus is apparently modern. The tomb is revered by Muslims, Christians, and Jews, and is much visited by pilgrims. The walls are covered with the names of devotees. The tradition appears to agree with the Bible narrative, which states that Rachel died on the route to Ephratah (Bethlehem) in giving birth to Benjamin, and was buried "in the way." Some maintain, however, that Rachel's Tomb really lies on the north side of Jerusalem, as it is described (1 Sam. x. 2) as being "in the border of Benjamin."

Another of our engravings affords some idea of the magnificent ruins of Palmyra, or Tadmor in the Desert. The best critics agree that the letter d in the Tadmor mentioned in the Books of Kings and Chronicles is wrongly inserted, and that the city, Tamor or Tamar, built by Solomon was quite in a different locality. The remains of the Temple of the Sun (which was dedicated to Baal), and of the surrounding edifices, indicate the magnificent aspect of Palmyra during its prosperity, which attained its height in the third century of our era.

Baalbec is undoubtedly the Heliopolis of Græco-Roman authors, and the Greek name suggests that the place was connected with the worship of the sun, Baal being nearly identical with the god of that luminary. The ruins depicted in our engraving are those of a large temple, said to have been erected to Jupiter by Antoninus Pius. Venus was also specially revered at Heliopolis; but the worship of these deities was suppressed by the Emperor Constantine, who erected a Basilica here.

Damascus is certainly a very ancient city, although its mention in the Book of Genesis (xv. 2) gives no clue to the date of its foundation. It attained its greatest splendour under the Omayyades, who were unquestionably the greatest princes ever produced by Arabia. Merely to tell the history of this famous city briefly would occupy a column, we will therefore here only allude to the massacre of 1860, when the whole Christian quarter was converted into a heap of ruins, and numbers weer slaughtered. The population is about 110,000. Since the massacre the number of Christians has again risen considerably; but the great bulk of the inhabitants are Mussulmans.—Our views are from photographs by Mr. Frank Mason Good.

THE CHURCH OF ST. SOPHIA

We have already illustrated and described the grand old Cathedral of Famagusta, and our present engraving depicts the ruins of Saint Sophia, another of the ancient churches of that once flourishing seaport. St. Sophia is a much earlier building than the Cathedral, and is in the Romanesque style of architecture, somewhat similar to our Norman style, only more plain. It seems to have followed the usual plan of Basilican churches of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and consisted of a nave and aisles, with a semicircular apse for the high altar; the windows were long and narrow. Probably this church was built soon after the accession of Guy de Lusignan; for, although it looks earlier, yet its arrangement is rather that of a Latin than of a Greek church. The building, however, is so much mutilated and injured, that it is difficult to decide exactly for which "rite" it was erected. If it is a Greek building, it could only have been built a very short time before Richard's conquest, which is not very likely, as the island seems to have been in rather too unsettled a state during the reigns of Isaac the Usurper and his predecessor for church building.

VENETIAN CANNON AT FAMAGUSTA

Here we have another relic of the ancient prosperity of Famagusta—a heap of old Venetian cannon, now dismounted and lying inside the ramparts, grim witnesses of the decay of the fortress and town which they once so bravely defended. They still bear the lion of St. Mark, and the date 1569 is plainly visible upon them, so that Mr. Forbes is doubtless right in his surmise that they had been cast in anticipation of the Turkish invasion which occurred in the following year. Moreover, their worn touch-holes show that they had done strenuous but unavailing service in the protracted and gallant defence.

Our engravings are from photographs by Mr. T. R. Dumas, of Beyrouth.

WORK IN A COAL-MINE, IV.

"Screening."——The trams, on being landed at the bank, are wheeled over the weighing-tables to the "screen." At the top of each screen is a "tippler," upon which the full tram is wheeled and fixed, and then the movement of a lever inverts the tippler, and the coal is shot out upon the screen below. In the sketch the girl at the top, on the left hand, is greasing the wheels of the tram, and pressing with her foot upon the break, which keeps the tippler in its inverted position. When she removes her foot the machine will right itself, and the empty truck will be drawn off and taken back to the pit for a fresh load. The "duck" or small coal passes through the bars of the screen into an iron shoot beneath, which conducts it to a waggon, the end of which is just visible in the sketch; whilst the "round" coal slides down the screen itself into another waggon, the run of coal down the screen being regulated by the heavy shutter and lever which the woman on the left is using. Any dirt or stone that may be mixed with the coal is picked out by hand at the foot of the screen.

"Early Morning—Giving out the Lamps."—Each lamp is stamped with a number, and reserved for the special use of one particular workman, against whose name the number is registered in a book. At the conclusion of the day's work the men take the top portion and gauze of their lamps away with them to clean at home, leaving the reservoirs in the lamp-cabin to be re-filled and trimmed by the man in charge. When they return to work the lamps are all ready upon shelves, upon which are painted their corresponding numbers. The fireman carefully examines each lamp, screws it together, and locks it, so that it cannot be reopened until the men leave the pit. If a lamp goes out during the time the man is at work, it can only be relit at certain appointed places in the mine, and by specially appointed men. The old man in the foreground of the sketch, who has just brought his picks from his shoulder to the ground, has around his neck a coil of safety fuse for the day's use. The large tin in his pocket, and those carried by some of the other men, contain cartridges.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The Cabinet Council on Saturday was attended by all the Ministers with the exception of Lord John Manners, who was detained in Scotland through an attack of gout.—Speaking at Portsmouth, Mr. Cowper-Temple, M.P., said that he trusted that the wisdom, experience, and skill of the Indian Government, the courage of our soldiers, and the resources of our Empire would soon overcome that blind, wilful, barbarous chieftain, Shere Ali. Mr. T. C. Bruce, M.P., said the public insult upon England was the outcome of a long-cherished feeling on the part of the Ameer, who had been hostile towards us for many years, and had, either by the Russians or by the reports which had reached him, been impressed with the idea that he had an opportunity of bearding the English, and it was for them to teach Shere Ali that he was mistaken.—Responding for the Army at a public dinner at Maidenhead, Col. Loyd Lindsay, M.P., said that he was astonished at the moderation of the Emperor of Russia and his armies in not entering Constantinople when they had their hereditary enemy at their feet. He felt equally grateful to the British fleet for the part which it had taken, and especially that its object had been accomplished without the loss of a single blue-jacket. The respect which had been paid our Plenipotentiaries at the Congress was no doubt in a large measure due to the fact of our extensive preparations, and he believed that the same success would follow us in an Afghan war.—Sir Henry Havelock, M.P., presided over a missionary meeting at Leeds, and referring to the Afghan difficulty, declared that our dispute was not with a half-savage ruler, but with a Power behind, which if it prevailed to break down our rule in India, certainly would not advance the cause of true religion. If we were about merely to avenge an insult, he would not countenance it, for it was no Christian duty to take up arms for revenge; but it was our duty to maintain the tranquillity of the British rule.—Colonel Stanley, M.P., was present at the opening of a new Conservative Club at Blackpool on Wednesday. He said that in spite of desponding views which were taken of it, there was no reason to be dissatisfied with the British occupation of Cyprus; and as to Afghanistan, though he had no wish for aggression or conquest, we must preserve our power of doing our business in our own way.—Mr. Yeaman, M.P., at a dinner in Dundee on Wednesday, defended himself from the charges made against him of systematically voting with the Tory party while holding his seat as a Liberal. After praising the policy of Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Yeaman said he had simply been disgusted with suggestions about party. There was no party question as regarded the fight by this country against the ruthless conqueror of Poland. He often felt that he must give his vote for his country rather than his party, and he would certainly say to them that when questions of dealing with an astute and unscrupulous foreign potentate came up, he made up his mind to vote for his country, and let party go to Hong Kong.—Mr. H. B. Samuelson, M.P., at the annual soirée of the Frome Liberal Association, spoke at some length concerning Cyprus, which he had recently visited. He was of opinion that it was not likely to be a field for British enterprise, nor valuable in a military or strategic point of view, and he endorsed the statement of Mr. Forbes as to the weakening and enervating effects of the Cyprus fever, and the number of troops who suffered from its attacks.—The Executive of the Home Rule Confederation has announced the course it intends to take in the present complications of the Home Rule party. They have decided to hold a Conference in Dublin on the 21st inst., and a kind of International Convention on the 22nd and 23rd, "between the members of the federation and the more active spirits in Ireland." Representatives of the Farmers' Clubs, Tenant Right associations, and Home Rule organisations are to be invited. Active opposition is anticipated from the Irish League, as Mr. Butt positively declines to call a National Conference.

Miscellaneous.—Waterloo and Charing Cross Bridges were made toll-free on Saturday about noon, Mr. D. Rogers, of the Board of Works, receiving the keys, and making a short speech at each place before the gates were thrown open. The traffic has wonderfully increased, especially at Waterloo Bridge, and the Strand has in consequence become more crowded than ever.—The Princess Alice inquest has been adjourned until the 18th inst. Much of the evidence already taken seems to be of a hearsay character. The Board of Trade inquiry was to have commenced on Thursday. The total number of bodies rescued is now stated as 590, the former statement of 631 being explained by the fact that in several cases double inquests were held.—Last week three youths were buried in a cave at Bournemouth by the sudden collapse of the cliff above. They were immediately dug out, two being found dead, while the third was but slightly injured.—The Thornton colliery, in Fifeshire, is on fire, and all other plans having failed, an attempt is being made to smother the flames by building stoppings in the workings. It is supposed the flame has been communicated by an adjoining pit, which has been on fire for twenty years.—Much damage has been done on the west and south-west coasts by the stormy weather which prevailed on Sunday and Monday.—On Wednesday an alarming telegram was received from Plymouth to the effect that a heavy gale was still blowing, and that some accident had befallen the Eddystone Lighthouse, for although the horizon was occasionally clear no light was visible from Plymouth Hoe or Penlee Point.—The Duke of Norfolk has presented three recreation grounds to the town of Sheffield. The land is situated at Brightside and Attercliffe, two crowded suburbs, and comprises twenty-six acres.—The deaths of several well-known public men are this week announced. Lord Chelmsford, who was twice Lord Chancellor, died on Saturday in his eighty-fifth year, and on the same day Sir Francis Grant, the President of the Royal Academy, breathed his last. On Monday Mr. Whalley, the member for Peterborough, and George Thompson, the veteran anti-slavery agitator, died. As we shall probably publish portraits of all these gentlemen, we reserve our biographical notices of them.—On Thursday last week the remains of Mr. Justice Keogh were interred in the Roman Catholic cemetery at Bonn. The mourners were his widow and his daughter, with her husband, Mr. J. Murphy, Q.C., and the valet of the deceased, whom he assaulted whilst in a state of delirium.

THEATRES

TAKING a hint possibly from a now-forgotten skit, entitled Box and Cox Married and Settled, Mr. Herman Merivale has attempted to produce a little harmless fun upon the stage of the GAIETY, by following up the career of the late Lord Lytton's Claude Melnotte and Pauline, and exhibiting that romantic hero and haughty heroine under the new condition of married life. The notion, as Mr. Merivale has pointed out, is similar to that which inspired Thackeray's Rebecca and Rowena, and it may be conceded that trifling of this kind involves no necessary disrespect towards a work of genius. The Lady of Lyons Married and Settled, however, did not unfortunately give any great satisfaction to the audience assembled at the Gaiety on Saturday afternoon. The spectators, perhaps, missed the capers and "the break-downs," the "topical" songs, and comic ballads, which they have been taught to expect in a piece with a title so suggestive of burlesque. Though Mr. Merivale's trifle has the merit of design, and is not destitute of humour of a mild kind, it was received somewhat coldly; nor did even the excellent parody of Miss Farren's Pauline, or the humorous dolefulness of Mr. Terry as her husband, console them apparently for the lack of that wild abandonment, and general license to be meaningless and absurd, which are the recognised features of modern extravaganza.

Mr. J. S. Clarke's return to England and reappearance at the HAYMARKET have occasioned the revival of The Rivals, in which Mr. Clarke once more represents Bob Acres before a London audience. The comedy is well acted—Miss Pateman appearing as Lydia Languish, Mr. Howe as Sir Anthony Absolute, Mr. Terriss as Captain Absolute, and Mr. Charles Kelly as Faulkland.

The STRAND Theatre has reopened for the winter season with a revival of Mr. Burnand's comedy, Our Club, and Mr. Farnie's Nemesis. The company has been strengthened by the engagement of Mr. Loredan and Miss Violet Cameron.—The ROYALTY Theatre will reopen this evening with an adaptation of La Jolie Parfumeuse.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——No one can complain of the lack of interesting racing at the Second October Meeting at Newmarket. Provided the weather be fine, or moderately so, there is not a Turf week in the whole season more enjoyable than that which has just come to a close. It is racing pure and simple that one gets at Newmarket during the Autumn Meetings, and for two-year-old contests, handicaps, and weight-for-age races, there is no racing that can compare with that on the grand broad course of "the little town in Cambridgeshire." Of course the Monday's programme was not a particularly attractive one, and in the opinion of very many of the strongest upholders of Newmarket four days' consecutive racing are quite sufficient for all practical purposes. The Clearwell Stakes, however, had been pushed forward into the bill of fare; but only Rayon d'Or of this year's crack three-year-olds was among the competitors. He was made favourite, of course, and won, though he ran rather ungenerously in the earlier part of the race. In a Plate of 100 sovs. for two-year-olds, the talent insisted on laying 4 to 1 on the Modena filly; but Count Lagrange, who seems more than ever to delight in surprises, or at least to produce them, supplied the winner in Prologue. Tuesday was big with the fate of the Cesarewitch. As it stood with the weights and acceptances from the first, and the after running of several of the horses to take part in it, it is seldom that a more interesting handicap has been before the racing public. With Sefton, the Derby winner, in at 8st., Master Kildare, the third in the St. Leger, at 7st. 4lb., and Insulaire with a few pounds more, and Lady Golightly, a four-year-old, at 8st. 2lb., there was abundant matter for speculation, to say nothing of the lightly-weighted four and five-year-olds, such as Harbinger, Snail, and Jester, who had strong adherents. Sefton, since his hollow defeat of Childeric, Insulaire, and others at the previous Newmarket Meeting, had been a strong favourite, and his position was only threatened or affected by the doubt whether his owner would start him; when, however, it was clear he would do battle, there was an immense run on him, and he started in a field of twenty, as first favourite, with only 3 to 1 against him, Harbinger, Master Kildare, and Lady Golightly being next in demand, in the order named. On paper and by all legitimate Turf reasoning the Derby winner was fully entitled to his position, as on no previous occasion had an Epsom hero been handicapped at so low a weight; and his recent performance had apparently shown that he was many pounds ahead of the Leger horses who would oppose him. The fact that Faugh-a-Ballagh, the Leger winner in 1844, won the race with 8st., and that Corisande, a three-year-old, won it in 1871 with 7st. 12lbs., seemed sufficient to demonstrate the immense chance Sefton had; while Julius, who ran third in the Leger of 1867, winning with 8st., seemed to make the race almost a certainty for Master Kildare, who occupied a similar position last month, and had only 7st. 4lbs. to carry on this occasion. However, the result of the race upset all calculations. The prophets were wrong to a man, though one or two timidly suggested the winner as a possibility; and the public were equally at fault. Tuesday's race will remain on record as one of the most remarkable ever run for the complete upsetting of favourites, not one of the first seven in the betting managing to get a place. Master Kildare was the only one of the three-year-olds anywhere handy at the finish, coming in sixth. From this it would seem that the horses of this age for this season are far below the average; but at the same time it must be remembered that the two St. Leger runners and Sefton were giving a year and two years and weight also to the five-year-old Jester, who won, and the four-year-olds, Start and Shillelagh, who ran second and third. The winner stood at 20, and the two next at 50 and 66 to 1 at the start. Mr. Naylor, the owner of Jester, won this race in 1869 with Chérie, who, curiously enough, started at exactly the same price as yesterday's winner, and, with the exception of Mr. Smith, who won the race with Hartington in 1862 and Rosebery the year before last, he is the only owner who has secured the race twice. The Middle Park Plate, so often called the Two-Year-Old Derby, was moved forward a day, and run on the Wednesday. It lost some of its interest in consequence of Lord Falmouth not starting Wheel of Fortune, a filly which has carried all before her this season in a most marked manner, and bid fair to break the charm of no animal carrying the highest penalty winning the Middle Park, especially as not very long ago she beat Peter, Wednesday's winner, with ease. Peter, however, must have the credit of having carried to victory the highest weight, viz., 9st., yet borne by a Middle Park winner. The second horse, Victor Chief, started at the outside price of 20 to 1, and was only beaten after a close race by a neck. If he had enjoyed the "maiden" allowance, which has been one of the conditions of the race till this year, it is not by any means improbable that he would have beaten Peter. General Peel, one of the veterans of the Turf, must be congratulated on the possession of so good an animal as Peter, who will doubtless be a very strong Derby favourite if he continues sound.

CRICKET.——News has come to hand that the match between the Australian Eleven and the Eleven of Philadelphia was drawn, but in favour of the former.

FOOTBALL.——The season for this game seems to have set in very suddenly, and matches are being played in all directions. At the Oval on Saturday, the Old Harrovians beat the Wanderers, but the game was not one of the Association Challenge Cup Series. The entries for this contest are numerous, and the competition is likely to be one of the best we have yet seen.

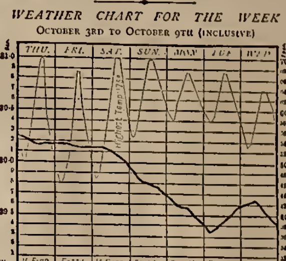
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

OCTOBER 3RD TO OCTOBER 9TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The record for this period shows a very decided change in the weather over our islands, and, indeed, over the whole of north-western Europe. Thursday (3rd), Friday (4th), and Saturday (5th) were exceedingly fine and warm in England, but rather showery in Ireland and Scotland. Fogs were observed in many places during the early mornings, but these dispersed, as usual, before noon, and the air became very warm during the midday hours. On Saturday, the 5th instant, however, the barometer began to fall decidedly, and the clouds looked unsettled, although the day was very fine. On Sunday, the 6th instant, the southerly wind became very strong in the west, and on Monday, the 7th instant, a severe south-easterly to southerly gale set in on our south western coasts, and subsequently extended to the other parts of the kingdom, accompanied by rain. The weather on Wednesday, the 9th instant, was entirely broken up, and appeared likely to remain unsettled for a long time to come. The barometer was highest (30.27 inches) at the beginning of the period; lowest (29·15 inches) on Tuesday morning, the 8th instant; range, 0·92 inches. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (75°) on Saturday, the 5th instant; lowest (46°) on Friday, the 4th instant; range, 29°. Rainfall. Total fall, 0·15 inches, on four days; maximum fall in one day, 0·05 inches, on Monday (7th), and Wednesday (9th). On Thursday morning, the 10th instant, the barometer was still falling, and squally showery weather prevailed, with strong south south-westerly breezes.

Scraps

A MUSCOVITE EXHIBITION of Russian produce is to be held in the Kremlin Gardens at Moscow in 1880.

THE SCOTTISH CORPORATION will hold its 214th Anniversary Festival on St. Andrew's Day, Nov. 30th, when the Duke of Richmond and Gordon willl preside.

A WALKING AND DINING CLUB has been formed in New York, the members pledging themselves to a weekly tramp of fifteen or twenty miles. The amount of dinners they are to consume afterwards is not stated.

GAS-LIGHTING COMES CHEAP to the inhabitants of Fredonia, in Chautanqua County, New York, for the town has been supplied during the past fifty-two years with natural gas, which finds its source between two large coal measures.

THE INVENTION OF THE TELEPHONE is now claimed by the Celestials. A Chinese writer in the Pekin Gazette declares that Kung Foo Whing, a distinguished philosopher, who flourished at the close of the tenth century, invented the telephone in 968. The instrument is known in China as "Thumthsein."

GENERAL GARIBALDI is now living quietly at Caprera with his daughter Teresita and her husband, Colonel Canzio. The general spends the morning on the seashore; in the evening his daughter plays and sings old American songs taught her by her father, while Garibaldi himself frequently joins in the songs, his voice being still fresh and young. The whole party will adjourn for the winter to a villa near Genoa.

AN IMPROVED HORSESHOE has been invented by an ingenious Swiss gentleman, Dr. J. Hirsiger, which bids fair to be a great boon to the equine race, insomuch as it contains no nails, the shoe being secured to the hoof by three clamps, which are set by a spring and a couple of inoffensive screws. The invention is now being tried at the Horseguards, and if successful will doubtless be instrumental in saving many a valuable animal from lameness and more serious diseases.

COMPETITION FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT is keener than ever, to judge from an anecdote in the Times of India. At a Lahore office a Hindoo clerk recently fell down suddenly in a fit. Some of his fellow workers ran at once to help him, but found that the unfortunate man had expired. "Now's the time for promotion," whispered one of the lot, and all rushed off in a body to lay their respective claims for the vacant post before their chief.

A SERIES OF FREE POPULAR LECTURES FOR MEN AND WOMEN is to be inaugurated this week at the Working Men's College, Great Ormond Street. These lectures will take place on Thursday evenings, are to be on literary and scientific subjects, and are intended to attract the public to the College so that people may become aware of the advantages offered by the Institution. Founded by the late Professor Maurice in 1854, the college, now under the direction of Mr. Thomas Hughes, has always maintained that the end and function of all learning is the making of good citizens, and has kept the teaching subordinate to that end.

MONKEYS ARE FAMED AS ADEPTS IN MIMICRY, and a British doctor in Java recently received an unpleasant proof of their imitative propensities. The doctor had a large monkey, tame and very clever, which was generally its master's companion in the dissecting-room whilst he pursued his anatomical studies. Jacko used always to watch the proceedings attentively, and one day, when alone with its master, seized the unlucky doctor, popped him upon the dissecting-table, and was just going to put its lessons to practical use, when the doctor's cries brought the people of the house to the spot just in time to save the doctor from immediate vivisection.

ENGLISH OCCUPATION IN CYPRUS has so altered the character of the place that anyone landing in Larnaca now, declares the Cyprus newspaper, Κύπρος, would find it hard to recognise the sleepy place of two months since. When the English entered Larnaca there was not a single hotel, but only one wretched eating-house, while 50*l.* would have nearly bought up the contents of all the European shops in the town. Now new banks have established themselves, houses have been converted into shops, and almost anything to be found in an ordinary English town can be bought at Larnaca. The latest addition is an International Club, which is shortly to be opened in the Marina.

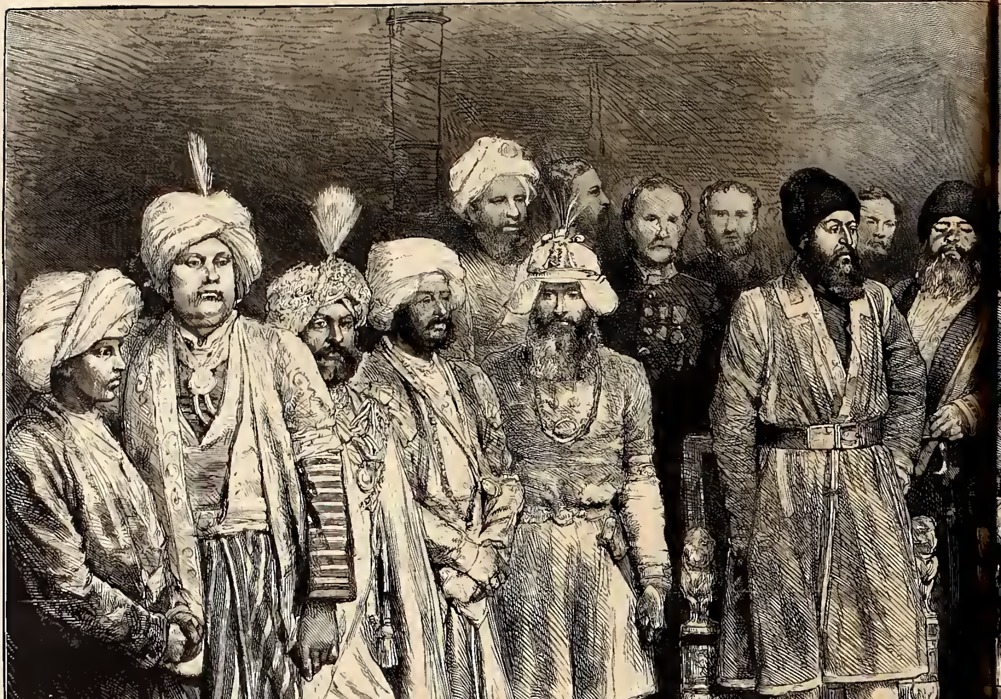
"THE WILDS OF KERRY."——With reference to the articles which we recently published under this heading, a correspondent at Dingle informs us that "Minard Castle is not 'a ruined castle of the Husseys,' but of the Geraldines—an old Anglo-Norman family which has been associated with this country since the thirteenth century of the Christian era. Minard Castle, which stands on the north shore of Dingle, was formerly a stronghold of the once famous and illustrious Earls of Desmond, and was blown up with powder by Cromwell's soldiers; and the violent effect of the explosion is still evident in the dilapidated remains of the said fortress. Many a human skeleton has since—even in our own time—been found buried under its crumbling ruins."

LONDON MORTALITY numbered the same last week as in the previous seven days, 1,355 deaths being registered. There were 4 from small-pox (an increase of 2), 19 from measles (an increase of 13), 34 from scarlet fever (an increase of 4), 20 from diphtheria (an increase of 7, exceeding the average by 11), 40 from whooping-cough (a decline of 13), 28 from different forms of fever, and 45 from diarrhœa (a decline of 16, being 17 below the average). There were 247 deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs (an increase of 31), of which 155 resulted from bronchitis, and 61 from pneumonia. There were 2,429 births registered against 2,494 during the previous week. The mean temperature was 55·8 deg., or 1·9 deg. above the average. There were 41·0 hours of sunshine, the sun being 80·5 hours above the horizon.

THE LIGHTHOUSE NEAR THE ISLE OF SEIN on the Breton coast, now being built, presented great difficulties of construction at the beginning, according to Engineering. The lighthouse was to be built on a hard gneiss rock from 40 to 50 feet long and 25 feet wide, and the preliminary works could only be executed by the neighbouring fishermen, familiar with the waters. Accordingly, when the weather was favourable, two men wearing cork belts got out of their boats and lay on the rock, clutching the ground with one hand while they made holes at intervals of 3 feet with the other. While doing this they were covered with spray, and were often swept off by the waves. In 1867 only eight hours' work could be accomplished on the rock and only fifteen holes were made, but forty holes were finished in the following year, and in 1869 the building itself was commenced. Now the lighthouse is 40 feet above the highest tides, and when finished will be 90 feet above.

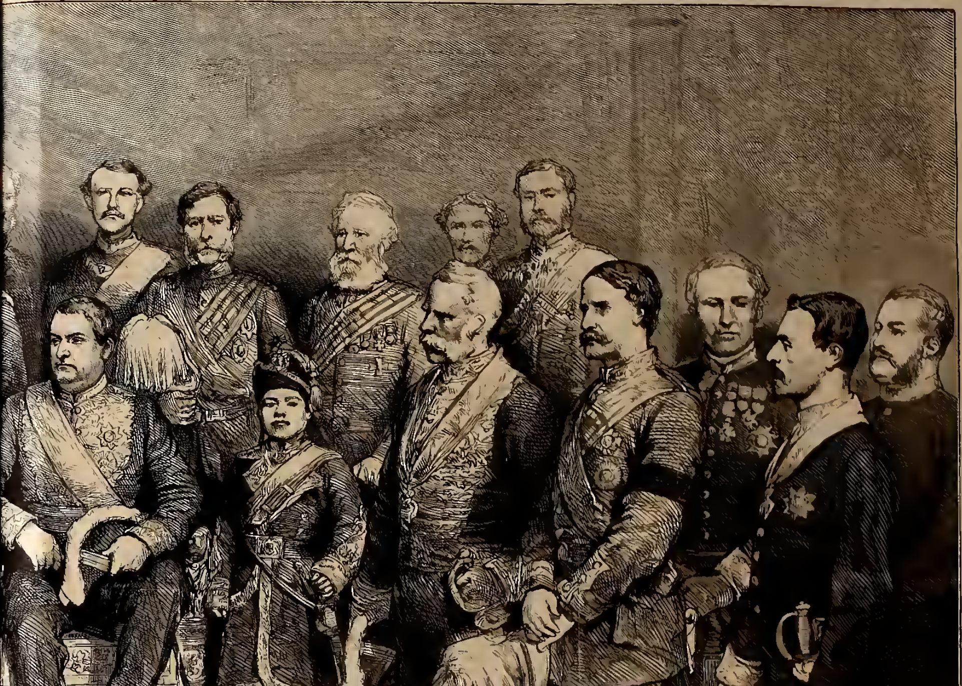
THE THIRD ANNUAL DAIRY SHOW, held by the British Dairy Farmers' Association, opened at the Agricultural Hall on Thursday. It includes all matters that appertain to dairy farming, from the animals themselves down to their produce and the various apparatus which are used in the manufacture of butter and cheese. The entries included 233 cows, heifers, and bulls, and 100 specimens of that useful but little used animal, the goat, while butter appears from every county in England, including the Royal Farm at Windsor. There is a very large trophy of Stilton cheese, some fifty feet high, flanked by two gigantic Transatlantic contributions of 15 cwt. each. Dairy maids are to be seen at work, while models and plans of dairy homesteads form not the least interesting part of the Exhibition. A poultry and pigeon show is held in the gallery, there being a special "flying" class of the homings. Amongst the cattle exhibitors are Her Majesty and the Baroness Burdett Coutts.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT has at last been adapted to domestic purposes by that well known inventor, Mr. Edison, whose agent, Mr. Adams, writes that that gentleman expresses perfect confidence in having solved the difficulty of electric lighting. He believes that he has achieved the means of subdividing the electric current at 1,000 or 10,000 different points from the same machine. The American papers print a statement of Mr. Edison's, in which he says: "When the brilliancy and cheapness of the lights are made known to the public—which will be in a few weeks, or just as soon as I can thoroughly patent the process—illumination by carburetted hydrogen gas will be discarded. With fifteen or twenty of these dynamo-electric machines, recently perfected by Mr. Wallace, I can light the entire lower part of New York City, using a 500-horse power engine. I purpose to establish one of these light centres in Nassau Street, whence wires can be run up town as far as the Cooper Institute, down to the Battery, and across both rivers. These wires must be insulated, and laid in the ground in the same manner as gas-pipes. I also propose to utilise the gas burners and chandeliers now in use. In each house I can place a light meter, whence these wires will pass through the house, tapping small metallic contrivances that may be placed over each burner. Then housekeepers may turn off their gas and send the meters back to the companies whence they came. Whenever it is desired to light a jet it will only be necessary to touch a little spring near it. No matches are required." The expense for light equal to 1,000 feet of gas is calculated at 7½*d.*



AFGHANISTAN—THE LAST INTERVIEW OF SHERE A

DURBAR,



I WITH AN ENGLISH VICEROY AT THE UMBALLAH
MARCH 27, 1869

FOREIGN

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina is now an accomplished fact; the last place of any noteworthy importance—Visegrad—was entered at the close of last week, and although on Sunday there was sharp fighting between General Reinlander's detachment and some strong bodies of insurgents at Peci, close to the Dalmatian frontier, all systematic resistance has been quelled for the present, and the Austrian authorities are now busy organising the government of the country. As the hope of any really valuable co-operation of the Turkish Government in this task is now all but out of the question, Commissions are now sitting both at Vienna and at Serajevo to consider the subject, and it seems probable that the plan of administration will be much the same as at Cyprus, namely, that the existing system, which is good enough in theory, will be efficiently carried out—of course, with certain alterations and reforms. The financial problem, by which the provinces are to be made self-supporting, presents the greatest labour; and next comes the land question, as it will be exceedingly difficult to break down the present Mahomedan monopoly for land, for hitherto no Christian has dared to become a freehold purchaser of the soil. Nor are these difficulties lessened by the action of the Porte, as the Sultan has just definitively rejected all idea of an Austro-Turkish Convention—even though his sovereignty and the temporary nature of the occupation are acknowledged—for as head of the Mahomedan religion he could not in any way appear to sanction the recent "inhuman" proceedings of the Austrian troops, and thus become a partaker in the destruction of Mahomedans. Still, in a Note to the Austrian Government, the Sultan lays great stress upon the maintenance of cordial relations with Austria, and declares that he will neither send arms nor men to the insurgents, nor in any way encourage resistance to the occupation. He hopes, however, that the Austrian Government will act in the same conciliatory spirit, and that the occupation of Novi Bazar will not be insisted on for the present, in view of the excited state of the population. This step of the Sultan is evidently prompted by the discontent in Albania and the West, which is manifestly on the increase, as the Albanians, both Mahomedan and Christian, have suddenly developed a nationality, and emulating the Montenegrins, Servians, and latterly the Bulgarians, are violently opposed to all idea of annexation, and now wish to organise a Principality of their own. Thus, not content with murdering poor Mehemet Ali, they have now assassinated Saaddetden Pasha, on his making known that he had come to surrender Podgoritza to the Montenegrins. Of course, in many quarters, and amongst others at Berlin, the rejection of the Convention is attributed to the influence of the Russians, who wish to advance the argument that as Austria has exceeded the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty by her conduct in Bosnia, so Russia will be justified in prolonging indefinitely the occupation of Eastern Roumelia. This may be the case, though it is difficult to see how two wrongs will make a right. To return to Austria, her hands are still further tied with regard to the Bosnian occupation by home political complications. The resignation of both the Austrian and Hungarian Ministries has been accepted by the Emperor, and as yet no new Cabinets have been formed.

In CONSTANTINOPLE continual Cabinet Councils are discussing the British proposal for reforms in Asia Minor, and the Porte has presented a counter-scheme slightly modifying three points in the British demands, modifications which are not unlikely to be accepted. The Porte is also said to have addressed a Circular to the Powers complaining of the conduct of Austria in Bosnia, and stating that she ought to stop the advance of her troops and put an end to their excesses until the Powers decide whether she is acting in accordance with the declaration made by her Plenipotentiaries at the Congress. The Eastern Roumelian Commission is continuing its sittings, but the Russians as usual are raising complications, and now declare that they will administer Roumelia in accordance with the Treaty of San Stefano, and not the Treaty of Berlin. General Totleben was warmly welcomed by the Christian inhabitants of Adrianople on the 2nd inst., and telegraphs to the Czar that "extraordinary enthusiasm prevails through the province," that the towns are decked with flags, and that many Bulgarian families are following the departing Russian troops. On account of this and certain outrages alleged to have been committed by the Mahomedan population after the withdrawal of the Russian troops, the latter will cease retreating for the present, and halt at the line of Tchataldja. Russia is now disarming her Black Sea harbours and taking up the torpedoes laid down during the war. There is still great distress at Constantinople amongst the refugees, who still number 70,000, and it is proposed to transport them to Asia Minor, near Ismid. The question of the caimés or paper money is still greatly agitating the capital. The Minister of Finance has declared himself unable to draw up a scheme for their redemption, and in the mean time the notes are becoming greatly depreciated, and there is a fear that the bankers and tradespeople will refuse them, and so bring about serious disturbances.

FRANCE.——There has been much discussion concerning the date of the forthcoming Senatorial election, when seventy-five of the 225 Senators elected by the Provincial delegations will have to offer themselves for re-election. The Conservative members, knowing what little chance they have of being returned, wished to postpone the evil day as long as possible, and argued that their time was not legally up until March, but the Government has fixed the date at January 5th, while the electoral delegates are to be chosen as early as the 27th inst. There is no other political news, save the election as a Municipal Councillor for Paris of M. Maret, an Extreme Radical, who beat the Moderate Gambettist candidate by a considerable majority. Indeed, the action of the Extreme Radical party, which is once more raising its head, is not unlikely to embarrass the Cabinet seriously during the ensuing Session, more especially as Church and State questions are not unlikely to form the chief subjects for contention, and the Conservatives are hoping that MM. Dufaure and de Marcère may ultimately be compelled to take refuge in their arms, more particularly since the late utterances of M. Gambetta have proved that the Radical leader has much of the old Irreconcileable leaven left in him still. The rumour, however, that any "misunderstanding" whatever exists between the Ministry and M. Gambetta has been semi-officially denied.

Paris is preparing for the great fêtes of the 21st and 22nd, on which latter day Marshal MacMahon will officially entertain the various Royal guests who may attend the ceremony of the preceding day. There will be a grand dinner and fête at Versailles, and the Park will be lit up by the electric light.—Although there are still large numbers of arrivals, the tale of visitors is somewhat decreasing, and people are beginning to feel that the end is drawing nigh. Large numbers of provincials are now coming in to see the Exhibition, while the Government is organising trips for several thousand working men from the provinces, with the proceeds of the National Lottery, which has proved an enormous success. No less than 240,000*l*. worth of tickets are to be issued, and so great is the demand, that they can hardly be printed sufficiently rapidly.—There have been two great theatrical events, the revival of Offenbach's Grand Duchess—which it may be remembered was produced during the 1867 Exhibition—Mdlle. Paola Marie now taking the famous part of Madame Schneider; and the production of M. Gounod's long looked-for opera, Polyeucte (founded, like Donizetti's Polinto, on Corneille's Polyeucte), at the Grand Opera House. The opera will be fully treated of on a future occasion, but we may mention that the first representation was crowded to excess, and that to all appearance the success was unqualified, both as regards the music and the mise-en-scène.—A musical and dramatic performance, in which the best artists of the capital will take part, is to be given next week at the Trocadéro Palace, in aid of the sufferers from yellow fever across the Atlantic.—There has been a duel between M. Georges Duval of the Événement, and M. Jouy of the Tintamarre, in which the former, who was the challenger, was wounded in the hand; and another brutal murder is reported, a young man, named Parrot, having, together with a companion, paid a visit to his grandparents at Auxerre, and there and then murdered them in cold blood during the night, for the sake of what money he could find in the house.

GERMANY.——The Anti-Socialist Bill was read for a second time in the Reichsrath on Wednesday, when Prince Bismarck made an angry speech accusing Herr Sonnemann, the editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung, who criticised the Bill somewhat sharply, of having relations with the French Government, and excusing himself for having written to The Times during the Congress on the plea that "The Times, being a powerful organ, he applied to it to secure the preservation of peace. He always turned to those who were influential when he wanted to secure an object, and in the case of The Times he applied to the only quarter likely to help him under the circumstances." Respecting the Anti-Socialist Bill, he roundly denounced the German Socialist Press, and declared that he was grateful to the Crown Prince for "not allowing mercy to supersede justice." In the mean while the Crown Prince, the Emperor, and Prince Bismarck are overwhelmed with letters threatening assassination, and great apprehensions are expressed for the future safety of the Emperor, who, although his nervous system is much shaken, and he now no longer laughs at the threats of the Socialists, refuses to go about with a military escort, or to allow any special police precautions to be taken when he drives out. At present he remains at Wiesbaden, but it is thought likely that he will return to Berlin, and reassume the reins of Government on the passing of the Anti-Socialist Bill.

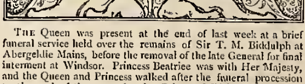
The case of Prince Bismarck against Herr Loe for violently denouncing the former's assertion that when it was proposed to appoint Count Arnim as Ambassador to London that diplomatist was objected to on the score of being a "notorious liar," has ended in the Superior Court re-affirming the original sentence, notwithstanding that Herr Loe was anxious to have the testimony of Prince Bismarck, who declined to appear, pleading official privilege.

INDIA AND AFGHANISTAN.——Both the Ameer and the Indian Government are vigorously preparing for hostilities, and, according to the assertion of the well-informed Times correspondent, the Viceroy's plan of operations appears to be to endeavour to coerce the Ameer to yield an unqualified submission by a strong military demonstration on his frontier, and so prove to him that the Government has both the power and the will to occupy, and if necessary to annex, his territory in the event of his proving unsubmissive. Much also is hoped from internal dissension in Afghanistan, as it is said that a great number of the Sirdars are hostile to the Ameer, while it is thought that when the Afghans see the British are determined upon war they will dethrone the Ameer in preference to agreeing to the other alternative—a Russian alliance. In the mean time the Indian Government is losing no time. The native regiments are being heavily-reinforced, all officers on furlough have been recalled, and troops are being pushed forward to the frontier with all possible speed, the deficiencies of the Commissariat Department being, as usual, the chief hindrance. Every endeavour will be made to avoid a winter campaign, if possible. The exact plan of operations is, of course, kept carefully secret, but it seems certain that a large force will be despatched to Quettah, and that the debouches of both the Bolan and the Khyber Passes will be occupied with a view to an immediate march in the beginning of spring upon Cabul and Candahar, in which case it is said that the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Frederick Haines, will command in person. At present, however, the occupation of the Kuroom Valley is the great question, as this valley turns the Khyber Pass, and stretches almost to Cabul, while the inhabitants are said to be well disposed towards the British, as they are Mohammedans of the Shia sect, while the Afghans are mainly Sunnees. It is, therefore, proposed to locate a force in the centre of the Kuroom Valley, which would be only nine marches (119 miles) from Cabul, and would give us possession of the Peiwar and Shutargurdan Passes, while this route is described as possibly the best of all roads between Afghanistan and the Punjaub, owing to the existence of roads, and the abundance of water, fuel, grazing, and procurable supplies. With a military force therefore located at Thall, the whole valley under military dominion, and the Khyber, it is thought that military operations might be commenced in the spring under the most favourable circumstances. Jamrood, a small village situated about five miles from the Khyber Pass, has already been occupied by our troops, a step of which the importance may be gathered by the fact that the Ameer has heavily reinforced his garrison at Ali Musjid. Indeed, the Ameer is in no way idle, and, besides summoning the frontier tribes to his assistance, has entered into an alliance with the Mommunds, which will render great vigilance necessary on the part of the officer commanding the Peshawur Valley, as one or two successful raids into our territory will set an example which the other border tribes will not be slow to follow. On the other hand, several tribes, including those of the Kuroom Valley, will probably throw in their lot with us; and, according to a Bombay telegram the Khyberees have already declared in favour of the British. The total strength of our forces on the immediate frontier, from the sea to Abbottabad, at present amounts to 800 British and 7,000 native cavalry, 12,000 British and 21,000 native infantry, with 102 guns. The greatest enthusiasm, however, is displayed throughout India at the prospect of the war, and both native and European troops vie with each other in their eagerness for service.

In RUSSIA, while in official circles a strong desire for peace is manifested, the semi-official organs are allowed to inveigh against England to their hearts' content, and to declare that Russia will allow her officers to fight in the Afghan ranks, as the British Government permitted its subjects to serve with the Turks in the late war. The Golos is especially rabid, and after referring to the hostility of the Afghans towards England, declares that "England is intent upon attacking Afghanistan, imitating Reynard the fox when charging the innocent rabbit with beginning the feud; but the world knows the rights of the case, and will not be deceived by these fraudulent tactics."

Whichever way the issue of the conflict turns the Russians intend to push forward their frontier. If England is victorious they will occupy Merv and Balkh, while, should Shere Ali triumph, Russia will equally advance to prevent a Mahomedan revival in her own dominions. In any case the fiction of a neutral zone between the two nations will be a thing of the past.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In the UNITED STATES the yellow fever is declining in the large towns, but is greatly on the increase in the country districts. President Hayes has received the Fenian Condon, who thanked him for the interest he has taken in his case. O'Leary is again a victor in the pedestrian match, having walked 403 miles, his antagonist having only accomplished 310. An excursion train ran off the line near Boston on Tuesday evening. Twenty-five persons were killed and 150 injured.—There has been a serious negro rising in the Danish island of SANTA CRUZ. Before it could be quelled the insurgents burnt down the town of Frederiksted and murdered several leading planters. Fifty estates have been burnt and only twenty have escaped destruction. A French frigate has visited the island, and has landed troops, carrying off fugitive women and children to St. Thomas, and American and British cruisers are expected there.—In CANADA Lord Dufferin has received the resignation of the Ottawa Ministry, and Sir John Macdonald is to be called on to form a Cabinet immediately. After the change of Government Lord Dufferin leaves for England, when Sir Patrick Macdougall, Commander of the Forces in British North America, who has just arrived in Quebec, will act as Administrator till the arrival of the Marquis of Lorne.—In NEW ZEALAND five Wesleyan missionaries are said by a New York paper to have been eaten by bush natives, eighty of whom were subsequently killed in retaliation by the traders and coast natives.



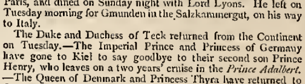
THE COURT

THE Queen was present at the end of last week at a brief funeral service held over the remains of Sir T. M. Biddulph at Abergeldie Mains, before the removal of the late General for final interment at Windsor. Princess Beatrice was with Her Majesty, and the Queen and Princess walked after the funeral procession to the end of the grounds, the Prince of Wales following the hearse to the station. The Countess of Dufferin arrived at Balmoral on Saturday, and Sir Stafford Northcote also arrived as Minister in Attendance. On Sunday the Queen and the Princess Beatrice attended Divine Service at Crathie Church, when the Rev. Dr. Lees officiated, and in the evening Sir Stafford Northcote and Dr. Lees dined with Her Majesty.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their three daughters are expected in town on Tuesday next, and the Prince will leave for Paris on Thursday. Meanwhile, the Prince and Princess continue at Abergeldie, and at the end of last week they visited Col. Farquharson at Invercauld to join in a deer drive in the forest. The Prince brought down several stags, and the party afterwards had lunch in a tent erected in the grounds. During his stay in Paris the Prince will be present at a fête offered him by the French Freemasons.

The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne leave for Canada on November 14th, and will thus arrive in midwinter in Nova Scotia. They will travel not in the Northampton, as had been arranged, but in the Allan Steamer Sarmatian, which conveyed some of the troops in the Ashantee War. Next Wednesday the Princess will inaugurate the Leaf Memorial Wing of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools at Russell Hill, near Croydon, her husband presiding at the subsequent déjeûner.—The Duke of Connaught was present last week at the first meeting in Woolwich of the Regimental Temperance Society, of which Association he is patron. On Monday he attended Sir T. M. Biddulph's funeral at Windsor, and last night (Friday) he was to distribute prizes at the Guildhall to the successful students attending Mr. Busbridge's drawing classes. The Royal yacht Osborne is being fitted up for the Duke's use next spring, and is to be ready by March 1st.—Prince Leopold has been staying in Paris, and dined on Sunday night with Lord Lyons. He left on Tuesday morning for Gmunden in the Salzkammergut, on his way to Italy.

The Duke and Duchess of Teck returned from the Continent on Tuesday.—The Imperial Prince and Princess of Germany have gone to Kiel to say goodbye to their second son Prince Henry, who leaves on a two years' cruise in the Prince Adalbert.—The Queen of Denmark and Princess Thyra have returned to Copenhagen from staying with the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse at Rumpenheim, and the Crown Prince and Princess of Denmark leave immediately for Paris to be present at the distribution of the Exhibition prizes.



CHURCH NEWS

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.——On Thursday last week the sittings of the Church Congress at Sheffield were continued, the first subject discussed being "The Relation of the Church to Literature and the Drama." The Rev. Boyd Carpenter said that, owing to the pressure of modern life, the middle classes seldom read anything but the lightest literature, and were in danger of being "drugged into mental imbecility." The Rev. C. Bullock and Rev. G. Everard spoke in terms of severe condemnation of the stage, the former remarking that when a young man he had discovered that he must either give up the theatre or give up Christ; and the latter suggesting the formation of a Recreation Society for the promotion of harmless amusement. The Rev. Brownlow Maitland and the Bishop of Manchester, however, defended the stage, Dr. Fraser saying that it rested with society rather than with theatrical managers to elevate the drama. The Rev. H. Jones recommended the elimination of the "goody" element from the publications of Religious Societies. On the same day there was a lively discussion on "Women's Work," Mr. Berdmore Compton's advocacy of "Sisterhoods" leading to a scene, which increased when the Rev. G. Weldon, who opposed him, said that he wished half the clergy preached as wisely as he had heard some women preach, and went on to allege that he knew of a whole community of "Sisters" who had gone over in a body to the Church of Rome. On Friday the Congress was brought to a close. Amongst the subjects discussed were "Spiritual Life," "Cathedrals," and "Sunday Schools." A working men's meeting was held, and in the evening a conversazione, at which some sacred music was rendered by the choir of the parish church, and votes of thanks to the President, readers, and speakers were unanimously adopted. Next year the Congress meets at Sheffield.

The Baptist Union.——The autumnal session of the Baptist Union has been held this week at Leeds, under the presidency of the Rev. H. Stowell Brown, of Liverpool. On Monday there was n special service at the South Parade Chapel, the preacher being the Rev. G. Gould, of Norwich, Vice-President of the Union; and a temperance meeting was held in the Albert Hall. On Tuesday morning a missionary service was held in Blenheim Chapel, when the Rev. R. Glover, of Bristol, preached a sermon to the young. In the afternoon a presentation of a silver tea-service was made to the Rev. C. B. Lewis, who has just returned from Calcutta, broken in health after thirty years' labour as a missionary; and a meeting was held to take leave of the Rov. Mr. James, of Llangynidr, missionary elect to India. In the evening a public missionary meeting was held in the Town Hall, Sir H. Havelock presiding. Amongst the speakers were the Rev. S. E. Johnson, formerly a slave, and now missionary elect to Central Africa. On Wednesday the public session of the Union was opened at East Parade Chapel, when the President delivered his address, making a fervent appeal to the well-educated and well-circumstanced young men of the denomination to devote themselves to the ministry, which was greatly in need of recruits. Many poor students entered the ministry under educational disadvantages, which they never overcame, and which, indeed, some of them were not all sensible of. He regarded character as of far greater importance than intellectual power or scholastic acquirments, yet, in these days of freethought and bold inquiry it was more than ever needful that the Christian ministry should be up to the mark in an intellectual as well as a moral point of view. Deputations from the Congregational Union, the Leeds Nonconformist Union, and the Leeds Women's Christian Temperance Union were subsequently received, and in the afternoon the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon preached to n large congregation at the Oxford Place Chapel, which belongs to the Wesleyan denomination. On Thursday the session was resumed, amongst the subjects discussed being "Forms of Worldliness prevalent in the Christian Church," and "Home and Irish Missions." In the evening sermons on special topics were preached at various places of worship in the town.

Various.——On Tuesday, a special mission for young men and others was commenced at Exeter Hall, and will continue at the hall and other places until the 7th of next month. At St. Margaret's Church, Lothbury, there will be services in connection with the mission daily, except Sundays. At Devonshire House, Bishopsgate Street, there will be an evening service on the 11th inst., and the Lord Mayor has promised to preside at special services to be held at the Guildhall on the evenings of the 15th, 18th, and 25th inst.—On Friday last the Bishop of Sodor and Man presided at a meeting at Sheffield, at which it was resolved to form a Church of England Funeral and Mourning Reform Association, the object being "to encourage the adoption of such observances only as are consistent with a hope of resurrection to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord; and to discourage feasting and treating on the day of burial, and all useless or extravagant expenditure on the coffin and its furniture on the occasion of the funeral, and in the wearing of mourning."—The Rev. J. C. Rost, preaching at Cambridge University on Sunday, urged the desirability of Churchmen making themselves better acquainted with the history and principles of the various Nonconformist bodies, and said that if it could be proved that Disestablishment would promote re-union it would be a potent argument in its favour, but there was no proof that it would do so. There was no relation between Church and State in America, yet the disunion of Christians, as witnessed in the number of different sects, was greater than in this country.—The Bishop of Pennsylvania, preaching last Sunday at a special service in York Minster, said that he rejoiced in the discrepancies between the Bible and "modern science," because modern science was changeable, whilst the Bible was unchangeable.—The Bishop of Chichester, in delivering his Triennial Charge, referred to the recent perversions to Rome of several of his Brighton clergy. Distress and grief at such unfaithfulness had bowed down many hearts, but none more than his own. From one church alone five clergymen had lately passed over to Rome, and they had to the utmost of their power leavened all they could influence with Romish doctrine. Craft, subtlety, and secrecy were the characteristics of the Roman propaganda, and in this instance they had been unsparingly employed. No man could say how far the poison had extended. Such defections betrayed inward unsoundness and unsettlement, and they asked with fear, "Who shall be the next to forsake our communion?" The path towards Rome had been smoothed for their converts by excessive and illegal ritual, and he strongly counselled his clergy to abstain from ceremonials which the English Church had rejected.

Afghanistan.——We have received two maps from Mr. E. Stanford of Charing Cross; one of "Western Asia," which depicts with admirable clearness the relative positions of Afghanistan, Persia, Turkestan, Beloochistan, Asia Minor, and the Russian and Indian frontiers. The other portrays the Indian and Afghan frontiers on a larger scale, and will undoubtedly be extremely useful to all those who wish to follow the movements of the British and Afghan troops during the ensuing campaign.

Charles Mathews' Grave in Kensal Green now bears a marble monument with the inscription, "Sacred to the memory of Charles James Mathews. Born Dec. 26, 1803; died June 24, 1878. O bliss! when all in circle drawn about him. Heart and ear were fed to hear him. How good! how kind! and he is gone! In memoriam." Apropos of monuments, a marble cross, surrounded by emblems of Christian life and hope, executed by Mr. E. J. Physick, has been erected over the grave in Cheam Churchyard of Lieutenant Frank Tabor, who was rescued from the wreck of the Eurydice, but died from the effects of the immersion.

Mr. H. J. Byron's evergreen "Our Boys" has made its home in Scandinavia, apparently much to the disappointment of British tourists, who go to the theatre in the hopes of witnessing specimens of the native drama. Thus Mayfair relates that a recent traveller in Norway entering the theatre at a town with an unpronounceable name, discovered he was listening to a Norwegian translation of the Vaudeville play. Coming down to Stockholm he conscientiously visited the theatre, and had the satisfaction of hearing H. J. Byron's jokes done into Swedish. Travelling into Denmark, and taking a stall at the Copenhagen Theatre, the irrepressible drama was presented to him from a Danish point of view.

Music

Crystal Palace Concerts.——There is little to add to the observations in our last with reference to the programme of the first of these concerts. As had been anticipated, it was a genuine success. The music-hall has seldom been more densely crowded. Wagner's coda for Gluck's overture to Iphigenie in Aulis, notwithstanding some difference of opinion among connoisseurs, seems destined to replace the more brilliant one by Mozart. Mozart's own orchestral prelude to Don Giovanni, in order to fit it for the concert-room, was submitted to similar treatment at the hands of Peter Winter, a composer whose industry far exceeded his genius. Nevertheless, seeing that neither of these overtures were intended as anything more than the introduction to an opera, it might, perhaps, have been more discreet to let both occupy the position originally assigned to them. Wagner's meddling with Gluck is no more to be tolerated than Winter's meddling with Mozart, though the æsthetic reasons put forth by the composer of the Ring des Nibelungen are indisputably worth consideration. M. Brassin, the much-talked-of pianist from Brussels, justified the repute he enjoys abroad by his execution of Beethoven's concerto in E flat (fifth, last, and grandest), and was applauded with a heartiness the sincerity of which could not be questioned. Doubtless we shall hear more of this gentleman, who evidently belongs to the "Higher Development" school, about which some useful hints may be found in the series of papers called "Notes upon Notes" (now appearing in the Musical World), by our own distinguished pianist Mr. W. H. Holmes, first preceptor of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, and others who have made their mark. M. Brassin also played the fantasia on Hungarian melodies (with orchestral accompaniments) which Franz Liszt composed for his son-in-law, Dr. Hans von Bulow. With regard to the second symphony of Herr Johannes Brahms, the performance of which, under the direction of Mr. August Manns, was unanimously pronounced one of the finest ever heard even at the Crystal Palace, we prefer reserving our judgment until another occasion. This will be furnished next month, by Mr. Weist Hill, in St. James's Hall, at the new series of concerts announced by that enterprising and truly music-loving artist, Madame Viard Louis. Some amateurs protest that the symphony in D is an advance upon the symphony in C minor, first introduced to the English public at Cambridge (1877), on the memorable occasion of the installation of Joseph Joachim as "Doctor in Music" at the University. Others hold a different view. All, therefore, we need state for the present is that it was received with the most cordial marks of approval from the entire audience. That the symphony in D is of a less sombre and less severe character than the C minor is by general consent admitted. An arrangement for four hands on the pianoforte, published but lately, has afforded those who wish to know something about whatever Brahms (Schumann's demi-god) produces an occasion of becoming acquainted with it; and thus many went prepared to compare the orchestral effect with that which had impressed them through the medium of the pianoforte version. The result, as we have hinted, was a difference of opinion, not as to the general excellence of the work, but as to its special characteristics and the more or less value to be attached to movement after movement, when placed in comparison with movement after movement in its immediate precursor, which at the time of its production raised a storm of enthusiasm in many quarters, hardly, we think, after mature reflection, commensurate with its absolute bonâ fide merits. About Sterndale Bennett's exquisitely fanciful, melodious, and original overture, the Wood Nymph (first entitled by its regretted composer the Dryades, and intended as a companion tone-picture to his famous Naiades), there can hardly now be two estimates. First performed under the direction of Mendelssohn, at the Gewandhaus in Leipsic, it has lived out nearly forty years, sounds as fresh as though it were only written yesterday, and is by musicians and cultivated amateurs accepted as a masterpiece. The singer at the concert was Miss Emma Thursby, the gifted young American lady who had already won golden opinions among us. In selecting one of Mozart's grand concert "scenas," the "Bird Song" of Taubert, an air from Handel's Rodelinda, she gave convincing proofs not merely of her artistic talent, but of her versatility. The "Bird Song" might have been omitted without loss; but the others were right welcome, and alone sufficed to show that Miss Thursby is a singer of no common pretensions, gifted with an exceptional voice, and thoroughly devoted to her art. The programme of the second concert (to-day) contains a very interesting novelty—that is, novelty for us—in the shape of a concerto in A flat for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniments by Field, the pianist being that most indefatigable of explorers, Madame Arabella Goddard. John Field—"Russian Field," as he used to be styled—the favourite pupil of Muzio Clementi, has been too much neglected among us, taking into consideration how much his successors (and not the least of them Frederic Chopin) are indebted to him.

Waifs.——M. Ambroise Thomas, composer of Hamlet, Mignon, &c., and director in chief at the Paris Conservatory of Music, was married last week to Mdlle. Elvire Rémaury, sister to Madame Montigny Rémaury, the eminent pianist, who but recently won such well-merited laurels by her performances at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts.—Madame Christine Nilsson has begun her tour in the country. At Liverpool, where the accomplished Swedish vocalist had not been heard for some years, she met with a reception so warm and unanimous as to make quite clear the fact that she had not been forgotten.—Signor Schira has returned from Italy, with a large part of his new opera finished. The author of the libretto is Signor Zanardini, the well-known Milanese advocate. The title of the opera is Leonora; enough, however, is known about Signor Schira to make us sure that he is not treading in the footsteps of Beethoven. He is too excellent a musician for that, and too earnest a worshipper of the mighty dead. Paer has a Leonora, Donizetti has a Leonora, in La Favorita, and Verdi another in Il Trovatore, but it may be taken for granted that Signor Schira ignores them all three, Paer especially, whose opera is not only entitled Leonora, but is on the same subject as Fidelio.—The Alhambra National of Brussels, now transformed into a Flemish lyric theatre, opened recently with a new opera, Frans Ackerman, the music by Charles Miry, one of the most productive and popular composers in Belgium.—At the Woltersdorf Theatre in Berlin, a new comic opera has been produced, under the somewhat long spun-out title of Senora Matula Florida, or the Merry Monks of the Convent of St. Just. The author of the libretto of this opera, the composer of the music, and the representative of the principal character are united in the person of Herr Waldmann. If we may credit the Berliner Musikzeitung, the result proved by no means as successful as the thrice endowed author might have wished.—The Worcester Theatre, which, not long since, was burnt to the ground is being diligently replaced by another; in fact the new building, which looks both handsome and commodious (not unlike, by the way, the theatre at York) is in a forward state of completion.—Dr. Hans von Bulow, though he has yielded his place at Glasgow to Herr Tausch of Dusseldorf, has not abandoned England altogether, as will be shortly seen.

Legal

The New Police System.——Mr. Vincent, the chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, has issued a circular to the superintendents of the Metropolitan Police in answer to their complaint that the control of plain-clothes constables had been taken out of their hands. It states that from the 1st prox. the criminal business will be transacted through the several superintendents, as it would be impossible to conduct the police system efficiently if rivalry existed, and that the appointment of plain-clothes constables did not in any way remove responsibility from the uniform men.

A Strange Verdict.—The station-master at Galway, who has been in the employ of the Railway Company for twenty-five years, was the other day placed on his trial for stealing provisions from the goods store. Two Dublin detectives, who had concealed themselves in barrels, which were placed in the stores, saw him come in about one A.M., cut open a hamper, and help himself to some of its contents. They seized him there and then, refusing his request that for the sake of his wife and family the matter might be left to be settled between himself and the manager. The prisoner's counsel made an eloquent appeal to the sympathies of the jury, urging that certain discrepancies in the evidence rendered it doubtful whether his client took the things with a criminal intent, and the Recorder, although in his summing-up he pointed out that these discrepancies only helped to prove the truth of the charge, was so affected at the position of so respectable a man that he burst into tears. The jury, after four hours' deliberation, returned a verdict of Not Guilty, which the Recorder characterised as "monstrous."

Miscellaneous Items.——The Manchester magistrates have decided that the special engagement of a compartment of a railway carriage does not entitle the passengers to do what they like in it during the journey. They have imposed fines of 20*s.* each and costs upon four gentlemen for smoking in a first-class compartment which they had engaged for their sole use. The directors of the Macroom Railway attended before the coroner last week, and were ordered to enter into their own recognisances for a nominal amount to appear at the Assizes, the coroner remarking that he had intended merely to take their word of honour; but he found that he could not legally do that. Their counsel asked that no bail should be imposed, as an application would be made to the Court of Queen's Bench to quash the verdict of the jury, but the coroner replied that he had no option in the matter. The traffic superintendent and the working ganger were also admitted to bail.—The Rev. W. Hooper, of Dorchester, the other day attended before Alderman Knight to make a statement with regard to a cow which he had sold to a butcher, and the carcase of which was subsequently seized and condemned as bad meat. He said that he had parted with the animal because of a fault which rendered her unfit for dairy purposes, but which, according to the opinion of a veterinary surgeon, did not make the flesh unfit for food; and that he had since learned that the meat was handed about from place to place, drawn in a cart eight miles during heavy rain, packed and repacked, and, after several days of intensely hot weather, reached the London market, where it could not, of course, fail to meet the fate it must then have deserved.—Much attention has recently been drawn to the attempted revival of prize-fights under the euphemistic name of "boxing competitions," the combatants wearing thinly-padded gloves, which do not greatly interfere with their power of "punishing" each other. We are now to have an authoritative decision as to the legality of these contests, as some Leicestershire pugilists have been committed for trial for engaging in one.—A chemist in Somers Town has been fined 5*l.* for selling prussic acid without recording particulars of the sale in his books. A second summons for neglecting to place a label on the bottle fell through, as it was shown that no more than one penalty could be enforced for one offence. An objection was also raised that the date of the sale was not proved, while the Act required that it should have taken place within six months. On this point a case for a higher Court was granted.—Mrs. Weldon again appeared at Bow Street Police Court on Monday to ask for summonses against her husband, General Sir H. de Bathe, and Drs. Winslow, Winn, Rudderforth, and Semple, whom she accused of conspiring to put her in a lunatic asylum. Mr. Flowers said it was open to her to draw up a statement of her case, in the form of an information, and to present it before him in the usual way, and if he did not feel able to deal with it, she could take the matter to a higher court. Another heartless swindler has been detected. Provided with printed lists he went round the poorer districts of Brighton, representing himself as authorised by the Mayor to collect subscriptions for the Princess Alice and Abercarne Relief Funds, and he seems to have gathered a good round sum. He has been sentenced to three months' imprisonment.—Much excitement has been created in Manchester by the prosecution of two "Sisters of Mercy" under the Vagrancy Act. The prosecutor, Mr. Rayner Wood, a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant of Lancashire, himself arrested them when they called at his house and asked for a "little charity," and they were detained at the police station all night. When the case came on next day it was at once dismissed, and it is said that an action for false imprisonment will be brought against Mr. Wood, when 1,000*l.* damages will be claimed.—The defalcations of Mr. Marshall, the assistant-secretary of the Curates' Augmentation Fund, are now stated to be upwards of 7,000*l.* The Post Office authorities have undertaken the prosecution of a man named Cooke, who is charged with stealing a number of letters containing cheques and money-orders, and forging the endorsements to them. The man, who is in no way connected with the Post Office, is supposed to have abstracted the letters from door letter-boxes at various places of business in the City.—A young girl aged twenty, rejoicing in no fewer than four aliases, and who seems to have got her living for some time past by obtaining situations as a domestic servant, and then absconding within a few days with whatever valuables she could get hold of, has been convicted on three distinct charges, and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude.—One of the clerks at the Liverpool branch of the Bank of England, has absconded with 15,000*l.* worth of notes. He is said to be a man of good family, the

TWENTY YEARS OLD

MISS WALDERSHARE did not return to England for ten years. Part of that time she spent with her friend very peacefully, even happily; and, when the invalid needed her no more, there were many others who did need her. That sweet, sunny nook of Southern France was always full of sick and sorrowful folk, come to die, or to watch their beloved die, beside the blue Mediterranean. Consequently this rich and kind-hearted English lady, who had no home ties, never wanted—who ever does want?—an object whereon to expend her time, her money, and her sympathies. And this was well. Sad she might sometimes be; but she was never either idle or lonely; as in truth no woman ever is, unless she wishes to be the one, and deserves, by her unloveableness, to be the other.

Miss Waldershare thus lingered on, year after year, in the place whither she had accidentally drifted, until it almost became a second home. She might never have come home at all—that is, to England—had not business called her to the little town where she had happened to be born, but where, nevertheless, she had not a single living tie. And in ten years even her few acquaintances there had so entirely disappeared that there was not a house she cared to go to. She put up at the inn. And in spite of what the cynic writes about the man who, going through life, finds "his warmest welcome at an inn," this well-loved maiden lady was so accustomed to find every door open to her and every face a friendly face, that the inn appeared just a little solitary, even dull.

Having transacted her business, she wandered about, noticing how many new houses had sprung up on the skirts of the old town; but the place itself remained unchanged. There were the same names over the shops in the High Street; the usual market went on just below the Town Hall, from the windows of which Signor Bianchini had taken his memorable tight-rope promenade, watched by herself and the little twins, Dorcas and Cyprian Hall, on the night of the fireworks. The fatal night—how long they must have remembered it! when, on coming home, they got the news of their mother's death.

"Poor little souls!" she thought, recalling that time. Familiar as she was with sorrow, the expression of the children's faces, as she last saw them looking out of the parlour window that Sunday afternoon, had never gone out of her mind. "But they cannot be children now. They must nearly be grown up by this time. I wonder what has become of them."

For though she had faithfully written, and received, at long intervals, several letters in return—not from Cyprian—"he had so little time," his sister said—but from Dorcas, still ten years is a long period to keep up any correspondence, especially a foreign one, and with such very small correspondents. Miss Waldershare was scarcely surprised when it gradually ceased. Two years at least had passed since she had had any tidings of the young Halls.

She was a shy and sensitive person, curiously so for a middle-aged woman of good position, whom nobody would have expected to have any doubt of herself at all. But she had—though circumstances rather than natural temperament had caused this. She never liked to intrude herself upon anybody, especially the young, and was only too ready to accept the fact that people had forgotten her. Therefore, even when she passed the end of the Terrace where the twins used to live, she hesitated, and was some minutes in making up her mind to knock at Miss Moffat's door.

There it was—the brass plate with "The Misses Moffat"—who had begun by keeping a school—staring her in the face. She lingered, looked round, might even have gone back again, but that a lady and gentleman crossed the road to her. He tall, fair, handsome; the girl hanging on his arm (people usually walked arm-in-arm in those days), small, dark, and decidedly plain. Miss Waldershare might have recognised them, had she not forgotten the lapse of time. But they knew her at once, and called her by her name.

"We had no idea you were in England. When did you come? Why did you not let us know?" said the young man impulsively; and in spite of the incipient beard she recalled at once the pretty boy-face of Cyprian Hall. His sister—yes, of course, it was his sister—his "little mother" that used to be. She looked like it still—being both graver and older in appearance than her twin.

"Then you have not quite forgotten me?" said the lady, pleased, as most middle-aged ladies are, at being recognised after so long a time.

And though Dor scarcely said a word, leaving all the talk to her brother, who seemed to have a great gift that way, the pleasure in her eyes, and the warm grasp of her hand, proved to Miss Waldershare the truth of that character. Yes, Dorcas Hall looked like a person "who never forgot anybody."

"You will come in, of course? It is just tea-time; and Miss Moffat will be glad to see you, or any friend of ours. There is only one Miss Moffat now. The other two are dead; poor old dears! so Dor and I have almost the house to ourselves—except for Mr. Moffat, a nephew of theirs; but he is a great scholar, and as quiet as a tame cat. Bless me! I hope he didn't hear me. There he is."

And Cyprian nodded to a half-bald head, and bright eyes, which had evidently been watching them from the window.

"Very quiet, but a good fellow for all that," continued the youth, with a slightly patronising air. "He and I shall be off to Oxford in two months more, and then Dor will have to make the best of it alone."

Dor smiled, as if quite accustomed to "make the best of it," and they entered the house together.

When she took Miss Waldershare upstairs to arrange her dress a little—for the "old maid" was just a shade "particular" as to her appearance—Dorcas explained, with a look of proud pleasure, that her brother was just going up for his matriculation examination.

"Papa was a long time in consenting; he was never at college himself, and does not see why a young man should go at all, especially one who might be a Calcutta merchant. But Cyprian does not want to be a merchant, and does not care to go out to Calcutta."

"No, indeed," cried Cyprian, meeting them on the staircase, and overhearing; "Papa has married again, and there is a horrid lot of children. I had much rather stop at home with Dor. She makes me work—that is, if anybody could do it. But I'm an idle fellow—I shall never do much anyhow; shall I, Dor?" said he, with that charming frankness and engaging contrition, which in some people seems equivalent to doing what they ought to do. They feel as if confessing a fault were almost as good as amending it.

"You will do more by and bye," said the sister, with a sad expression flitting through her smile. "Cyprian had a great deal to contend against, Miss Waldershare. Papa could not afford to send him to a public school, so he has had to get educated here, and when at last he went to a clergyman to study—he—he came back again."

"Was sent back," laughed the young fellow, with charming candour, which, however, sent the hot blood into his sister's face. "But I am sure if I told the whole story to Miss Waldershare she would agree with me that it was a confounded——"

"Tea is waiting," said Dorcas, hastily, and then introduced the bald-headed man—not such a very old man either—as "Mr. Moffat, from Oxford, who has been so very kind to Cyprian."

"Kindness itself!" added Cyprian. "I am sure, if I pass, it is his coaching I have to thank for it."

"You must pass," said Mr. Moffat, and "He will pass," said Dorcas.

"Oh, don't lecture! I hate lecturing. But I mean to be such a good boy—some day."

That day, however, had been evidently long of coming. Not that he was in the least a "naughty" boy. On the contrary, Miss Waldershare liked him extremely, and could quite understand how everybody liked him too. He had that invincible attractiveness, born of a pleasant inward conviction that he did attract, which makes some people so charming. They throw themselves on you with the simplicity of a child to whom no one has ever said a hard word; they are quite sure of your regard—so sure that you have not the heart to refuse it. Before she had been an hour in the room with him, Miss Waldershare felt a weak consciousness that, were he to ask her, she would do almost anything for young Cyprian Hall.

And his "little mother."

"Yes, I am still his 'little mother,'" Dorcas answered, smiling, to some question which Miss Waldershare put on bidding good-bye—not a farewell at all, for she had been already persuaded by Cyprian to remain in the town a few days longer ("just to comfort poor Dor after I am gone," said he, with a pleasing conviction that she would want comfort, and that nobody could make up to her for the loss of himself—which, perhaps, was not untrue). "He needed a 'little mother' more than most boys. And, besides, Mamma told me to take care of him."

"Mamma said that"—"Mamma wished that," seemed, even after all these years, to be the invisible law of right to the orphans, evidently as completely orphans as if they had been left without either father or mother. And Dorcas, with her silentness and somewhat careworn face, much older-looking than that of her twin, seemed to have taken upon herself all the duties and anxieties of a mother.

Altogether, Miss Waldershare quitted the little household—where Miss Moffat, its nominal head, had never once appeared (she was an invalid, and Miss Hall managed everything)—with a somewhat heavy heart. The brightest bit, however—she being of a rather "sentimental" turn—was in the fancy she took for Mr. Moffat's honest countenance, and the pleasure she had in watching how he seemed to do everything he could think of for quaint, plain, gentle Dorcas Hall.

She saw a good deal of both him and the twins during the next two days, and after Cyprian had started for Oxford in the highest spirits, and without a doubt concerning his "exam.," she and his sister had much talk together. But Dorcas was not very confidential, not even on the subject of Cyprian. In all she said there seemed to be some arrière pensée, a sense of past disappointment and future doubt, almost amounting to fear, which, putting together fragments which she rather betrayed than told, gave a still deeper uneasiness to the older and more experienced woman.

Cyprian "did not much care for reading;" found study difficult; his sister had taught herself Latin, a bit of Greek, and even something of mathematics, in order to teach him. He had never had any systematic education of any kind—well, that was not his fault, but Miss Waldershare knew that real students, true workers, who mean to make their way in the world, whether boy or girl, will, when they get into their teens, begin to educate themselves. And self-education is perhaps the soundest of all.

But Cyprian was twenty, and had not began earnestly to study yet. If he passed even the preliminary examination for Oxford it would be, Dorcas was forced to own, chiefly owing to the excellent and gratuitous "coaching" for the last eight weeks, of Mr. Moffat.

"But oh! Miss Waldershare, you see how much my poor boy has had to fight against!" pleaded the sister, in fond deprecation. "Even his good looks and his winning ways have been dangerous to him—because everybody is always admiring him, and inviting him out. Yet he is as steady as a rock—never gets into late hours or any ill ways, and he is always so easily led, and so good and affectionate. To part from him will be dreadful, but then if I know he is all right, and if I can sometimes go and see him—Oxford men like to have their sisters visiting them, Mr. Moffat said. Only it must be pretty sisters—not such as me."

Miss Waldershare asked gravely if it were Mr. Moffat who said that? because she herself thought the little, dark-eyed face and dainty figure made up a sister quite well-looking enough for any College "man."

"Well, then," said Dorcas, laughing, "I really will go up next Commemoration. It will be so grand to take a walk with Cyprian in his cap and gown. How handsome he will look—how proud Mamma would have been! Mamma always said Cyprian must go to Oxford."

So talked they, the elder and the younger woman, in the dim evening light—waiting for the letter—there were no telegraphs then—which was to bring the important news.

At last it came. Two letters arrived—the second being from Mr. Moffat. Dorcas laid it aside, and opened Cyprian's.

Only one line—Miss Waldershare could see. She saw also that Dorcas's poor little hands fell helplessly on her lap—she had instinctively sat down—and then were clasped together in a mute acceptance of the inevitable.

"I always expected it. He could not help it. He says he did his best. My poor boy!"

"Poor girl!" Miss Waldershare felt inclined to say, but she said nothing—only kissed her silently. Then Dorcas leaned her head on her friend's shoulder, and wept bitterly.

"Tears won't do," she said at last, drying them. "He will be here to-night, no doubt—or to-morrow morning—for he will have to go out to India at once. Papa said he must, if he failed in his matriculation. He has lost only too much time already. And we are wholly dependent upon Papa! O my poor boy!"

She wrung her hands, oblivious of everything—even of the second letter—which Miss Waldershare proposed to open and read.

"DEAR MISS HALL,—

"'Plucked' is a hard word—but Cyprian must not let his courage sink. Many a man has succeeded in the world after being plucked. Perhaps, after all, he is scarcely fit for University life, and this may be for the best in the end. Try to believe so—though I know it is hard. We shall be with you almost as soon as this letter.

"Yours sincerely,
"JAMES MOFFAT."

"How kind he is!" said Miss Waldershare.

"Yes, very kind."

And so he was—as kind as Miss Waldershare herself—for the two took counsel together over the helpless sister many a time during the melancholy days which ensued, when it was necessary to arrange everything for Cyprian's departure, and for the parting of the twins, literally for the first time in their lives—except that brief attempt at tutoring of which everybody had said as little as possible.

So great was the despair of both at first, that Miss Waldershare suggested Dorcas's going out with him to India.

The girl shook her head. "No; it would be too expensive. It would vex Papa. He only sent home money for one. Besides," with a sad casting down of the eyes, "Papa does not want me. He never did want us, you know."

Miss Waldershare asked no explanations of what was evidently some family difficulty. She saw that Cyprian must go, and Dorcas stay behind—at least for the present. It was very sad—so sad, that being more accustomed to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting, she put off a grand London visit, and remained still a few days more in the dull little town, where she knew not a creature but these, her sorrowful friends.

It was a terrible time. Most people nowadays know it—have witnessed or gone through it—when some young member of the family has to be sent away abroad;—an agony sharp as death—even under the best of circumstances—coming nearer and nearer each day to the fatal day—almost—as Cyprian declared, "like a man who is going to be hanged."

He felt it very much at first, poor boy! grew quite thin and white, and could never look at Dorcas without the tears coming into his eyes. But by and bye the excitement of preparation comforted him a little. He became such an important person in his little circle, and even in the town, where seldom such a thing was heard of as a young man "going out to India." Even his outfit created a secondary interest, and also his trunks—which the shopkeeper exhibited at the door, marked in white letters "Cyprian Hall, Esq., Calcutta." There was a pleasant and consolatory side even to this cruel parting.

"But it shall not be for long, that I am determined on," said Cyprian, with great energy. "As soon as ever I am settled, I will send out for Dor, and we will live together, bachelor brother and maiden sister, and be as happy as the day is long—won't we 'little mother?'"

She half-smiled, half-sobbed at the word. "Cyprian always sees the bright side of things; and he is right. Don't you think so, Miss Waldershare?"

"Yes," answered she, but thought also how little he thought who it was that had invariably made life turn its sunny side to him, if possible, even though somebody else had to walk in the shade.

So much so that even the last day was not such a very dreary day at the Terrace, where Miss Waldershare paid her final call, at least forty-eight hours before Cyprian's departure. With her constitutional shyness, she thought it best not to stay till the very end, not being a relative, nor exactly a "friend of the family." And, judging by herself, she considered that, after the two were really gone—Mr. Moffat was to see the poor fellow off from Liverpool, and then come back, en route for Oxford, with the latest news—it would be easier for Dorcas to be left quite alone.

Therefore, she bade the twins a cheerful good-bye, reminded them both how young they were, and how the world was all before them, and their lot in their own hands, to do what they liked with it almost; for at twenty, with health, strength, work to do, and the capacity and will to do it, what young man or young woman need feel hopeless or forlorn? She "preached" a little, yet feeling all the while how vain "preaching" is, and how each young soul must buy its own experience in its own way.

And then she kissed and blessed them both—poor young things!—now going through the sharpest experience of their existence, and feeling their anguish with all the passionate intensity of youth, to whom every sorrow appears, at the time, like a sorrow eternal.

She understood this—and them: the solitary woman to whom life was no longer a vista of the future, but a dream of the past. And then she went away, walking rather slowly and sadly, and trying hard to believe all the hopeful things she had been saying a few minutes before to both Cyprian and Dorcas, when she was overtaken by a quick footstep, Mr. Moffat's.

"Allow me to walk home with you. Oh!" seeing she hesitated, "that is no matter. They don't want me."

A fact which Miss Waldershare could not deny—which, indeed, she had noticed, and been almost sorry for:—feeling that the twins did not half appreciate the kindness of a friend so much older than themselves, and so familiar that they both took his devotion for granted. But she, who knew the world better, respected it as a thing only too rare.

He walked on beside her, talking a good deal about them both, or rather about Cyprian. He did not seem to consider Dorcas as a person to be discussed at all—not even her sorrow, which she bore so silently that her friends instinctively were silent too.

"Do you think there is the making of a man in that boy?" said Miss Waldershare at last, when they stood face to face at the hotel door.

"I hope there is—I think there is—if only he falls into good hands. There are some people, you know, who make themselves and their career; others are made by circumstances or influences. It remains to be seen under what category we may place Cyprian Hall."

"And Dorcas?" said Miss Waldershare, looking fixedly in the eyes of the good, honest man—a curious, penetrating, half-sad, but exceedingly tender look, not unbefitting a kind old woman who had once been young.

Mr. Moffat's sallow face blushed all over, but he unhesitatingly returned the gaze.

"Dorcas cares more for that boy's little finger than for any one alive. I know that. Still, I shall take care of her. I am a poor man—a very poor man—but I shall manage somehow to take care of her."

"I believe that,'" was the cordial answer. "God bless you. Good-bye."

Six months after this, business again called Miss Waldershare to her native town, and of course she went at once to the Terrace to see Dorcas Hall. Only to look at her, having already heard by letter all the news of Cyprian; exceedingly good news, so that she was hardly surprised at the gentle content of his sister's face, and the more than usually hopeful tone in which Dorcas spoke of him and of everything.

"Papa"—that long invisible, seldom-named father, had been quite glad to see his eldest son—he was growing elderly, with a lot of young children. Cyprian might become of the greatest use to him. Cyprian had taken kindly to business, found it rather "amusing" than otherwise, and liked the gay Calcutta life, where, no doubt, he was as great a favourite as he had always been everywhere. He was poor, certainly, for his father only allowed him a clerk's salary, probably all he deserved at first, but he hoped to "make it do," and to earn more by and bye.

"And what does he plan about bringing you out to him? You must have a dull life here with Miss Moffat, and he knows it. What does he say?"

"Nothing," answered the sister, casting down her eyes. Then, suddenly, in the old apologetic way, "I did not expect anything else. Cyprian used to leave me to do all the planning. He is content with the present. He never looks ahead in any way. I know that."

"But, surely, as soon as he can, he will send for you or fetch you?"

A FISHING PORT IN AUTUMN

In that season which Spenser has described as "full of merry glee," there are few sights more picturesque than that of the ancient fishing ports which stud the coast—more especially those on the north-east—for they have usually accomplished their part in the reaping of the chief of the harvests of the sea, and the great shoal of herrings, diminished by millions, has gone on its southward and mysterious track. In the middle of an autumnal day, when the sun attempers with warmth the breeze that blows fresh and cold from over the moors, coming down from the uplands, through the fields of stubble given up to the geese, through the long lanes in which the hedgerows are tinted with brown, amber, and scarlet, and whereon bunches of brambles show bronze and black, under the green of trees dashed with streaks of yellow, of ruddy brown, and here and there marked with the red of the berries of the mountain ash, the path winds slowly; whilst below, fringed by a yellow strip of sand, there "glooms the dark broad sea," much as Ulysses saw it when he purposed to sail beyond the baths of all the western stars. And struggling up from the seashore, half-hidden in a cove, in the quiet and the solitude, lies the little fishing port, sunning itself in the pleasaunce of the day, enjoying its rest after the toils of months, and preparing for the storms of the coming winter. There is still animation in it, but it is solitude in comparison with the throng and the bustle of the fishing season it has just passed through; there is yet in early morning a bringing in of cargoes which leave, as they are hurried to distant stations, an ancient and fish-like smell; but the chief work of the year on the seas is over here, and the boats have either gone to distant fishing-grounds—or waters, rather—with the herring shoal, or they have been for the most part laid up high and dry for the winter; mute mementoes of the toils of the past. The village sets its house in order, counts and apportions its gains, and prepares for what is to it the seed-time of the coming season of the fishermen.

Drawing near to it, we appreciate better its extent, its signs of poverty and wealth, and its quaintness and that of its surroundings. Straggling in apologies for streets on the steep banks of little hills, divided by a stream that brawls noisily seaward, swollen with the late October showers, hemmed in on the east by the sea, and shut off from the table-land by the high hills and moorlands that stretch out towards the west in barren grandeur, relieved by the well-wooded and fertile little dales that wind around them. Odd and irregular little houses range up the hill-sides, and in front of some of the highest, in dingy little gardens, stunted trees are shedding a few of their thin leaves, and leaving the black-brown boughs clearly defined against the bluish-grey of the sky, whilst every puff of wind bears with it downwards rustling heaps of dead leaves. Where the gardens bear no such load of dull remembrances of forest, they are decorated with mementoes of the prowess of the sea in the shape of gaily-painted figure-heads of long-stranded vessels. Below these dwellings of the aristocracy of the place trade makes its presence known in miniature in the shops which display, through their small windows, goods making up in variety what they lack in quantity. Still nearer the sea, where its beat at its highest tide should shake the dwellings from their dingy-white bases to the green-specked thatch of their roofs, are the houses of those whose industry gives to the little place its special character. Around these small houses there are here and there tokens of that industry. On the higher ground above, the purple nets are spread on the sward to dry; a lane leading inland has a gay fringe of fishing-cobles, turned with their bright streaked timbers and keel uppermost; and nearer the dwellings there are to be seen at times the "trunks" which, in their season, are used for crab-catching purposes. You may tell that the men are fishermen by their dress of woollen guernsey and coarse pilot coat; and if the gear of the females does not betray them in like manner, their kinship to the fisherfolk is proved by their inveterate habit of carrying on the head pails of water from the spring, loaves from the baker's, or other household requisites, in a manner suggestive of the "tubbers" whose musical voice is known in distant towns. There are signs of the character of the place in the names of the public-houses, which affect marine combinations, in the less savoury remains that litter the sands from the time of the arrival of the few boats that venture out for the white-fishing till the sea came up and swept them away, becoming scavenger of the fishermen, as it was cemetery to the dwellers in the Château d'If; and in the boats that lazily toss on the waves in the little bay, showing, as they move on the waves of the ocean, the piles of bladders and cork-floats, the heaps of dark netting, and the other preparations for the followers of the ancient craft.

Days come and go in the autumn in lazy fashion; some in golden haze, dropping down on an amber sky and an empurpled sea; and others tossing and troubled with storm-winds, till the waves become turbid masses of greyish-yellow water, and the far ocean becomes a rolling canvas of deep blue caverns and white-capped hills. Though the shoal of herrings is now far off—in the earlier days—the village is deserted by its men almost entirely, for a few of the boats have not yet returned from distant seas of labour, and others are outward in the bay acting as pilots, or fishing, or they are in their own homes recruiting nature after a night on the dark deep. But when the early breezes of winter begin to blow, the boats are moored, the nets and floats are put aside, and at the lookout there is a daily congregation which is no longer one of women screening their heads with apron or shawl, but one in which the "sou'-wester," the pipe, and the rough oilskin coat are frequent, whilst the raging of the sea is the signal for the lighting of the fire in the lifeboat-house, and the making ready of the boat for any service that may be called for from it and its brave crew. Autumn passes on these coasting places watching their dwellers, as those on whom the lotos-eaters looked, having

And to many the mellow days of the month are as those in which they dwelt in Elysian valleys, "resting weary limbs at the last on beds of asphodel." The sea has not as yet gathered its forces for these wild assaults on the land it makes in winter; its song is as yet soft and low as that excellent voice in woman, and it has no trace of the fierce wail it will raise when the "storm-wind of the equinox" shall scourge in wrath the toiling surges. Shifting shadows of drifting clouds fall on the waters, now plunging them in golden haze, now purpling them, and now bathing them in emerald, in swift succession, till the eye falls on the distant horizon as it follows the track of the rays of passing light. Day dies away, and night shrouds the hills in a fleecy fog that folds itself along their sides and lies low in the valleys, till elevations rise like islands from a sea of mist, drifting with the puff of wind; whilst on the sea the faint phosphorescence of the waves is lost a little from the shore, where parting day died like "a dolphin whom each pang imbues" with new beauty as it gasps its last; and when darkness veils it, and the presence of the Infinite is known only by its weird solo through the night, there is mysterious beauty, which the golden-tipped morning shall discover to the eyes of the watchers by the shore, as it has been discovered since the distant date when the Creative Spirit "moved on the face of the waters."

"The Primrose Path," by Mrs. Oliphant (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—There is passage upon passage in this tale which is in Mrs. Oliphant's very best manner, and which hardly any one but herself could have written; but we have had occasion to review so many of her novels of late that we need not linger long over a book that, in all essential literary and artistic characteristics, shows her on no fresh path. We note again that Mrs. Oliphant's novels are ceasing to be what can properly be styled "love-stories." Margaret Leslie, the heroine here, never is in truth the least "in love" with the cleverish, plausible young fellow, of very inferior rank, with whom she becomes entangled, only half-conscious, in her innocence and inexperience of life, what it is she is doing. She has grown up, at her own sweet will, a genuine Scotch lassie, without training and almost without education, in the half-ruined mansion of Earl's Hall, in "the kingdom of Fife," with the old father who likes his "little Peggy" best as she is, and in whose eyes, indeed, she is almost as much a child at seventeen as she was at seven. So when Rob Glen, the old playfellow of her childhood, whom chance has again thrown in her way, seeks to console her in her sorrow for her father's death after a lover-like fashion, she is only aware that he is meaning to be "very kind" to her, and accepts his wooing with but a dim consciousness that anything is to come of it. Rob, though shallow and somewhat vulgar, is not bad-hearted, and is genuinely in love with Margaret after his lights; but he is too thorough a Scotchman not to have an eye to the main chance, and knows that in winning a young lady of position, who inherits a fortune of her own from her mother, he has done a very good stroke of business for himself. How Margaret fares in the toils wich are thus woven around her, and whether she is extricated or not in the end are matters which we leave to the reader. We have here and there a few well-nigh perfect "bits" in the way of description both of the old house of Earl's Hall, and the Fife scenery round it, and of the Grange, Margaret's own house in a southern county of England; and there is hardly a single character in the tale that does not seem individual, well-marked, and thoroughly alive. Old Sir Ludovic Leslie, with his courtly grace, his quaint humour, and secret enjoyment of his "little Peggy's" misplaced pronouns and frequent "Scotticisms" of phrase, his faithful old servitors, John and Bell, Margaret's aunt-like elder sisters, the children of a former marriage of Sir Ludovic's, Rob Glen and his worldly-minded mother—not to speak of the heroine herself—are all drawn with admirable force and finish. It is wonderful that one who has written and writes so much as Mrs. Oliphant should still write with such unfailing strength and freshness, and acknowledging this, we must not complain too much that her story is somewhat unduly spun out, and yet wound up a little over-hastily at the last.

"The Cheveley Novels: A Modern Minister" (2 vols.: Blackwood).—The statement sounds rash, we are aware; but it really seems to us that in its unfortunate combination of extreme pretentiousness with almost total incapacity this portentous story—which, if published in the usual way, would be considerably over 2,000 pages in length—is about the very worst novel it has ever fallen to our lot to read. That it is among the worst we can entertain no doubt whatever. The absurd preface, which the author with characteristic eccentricity has appended to Part XIII. instead of prefixing to Part I., would be of itself almost fatal to the success of the book in the eyes of readers of taste. That the author of "The Cheveley Novels" "fancies himself," as the phrase is, very much, and regards his own performance with the most intense complacency, is quite amusingly evident; difficult as it is to understand how he can have come to regard himself as possessed of gifts that should delight and instruct the world. He seems to us to rely for success on mere "bigness." His story, as we have said, is as long as three ordinary novels; we are introduced to some hundred characters, all tabulated under several heads upon a couple of fly-leaves at the beginning of the first number, with an appropriate descriptive label affixed to each; and we are overwhelmed with mysteries and seeming mysteries, "tall talk," overdone sentimentality, rhodomontade, and gorgeous upholstery. In upholstery, indeed, the author shows himself a connoisseur of the first water, and his description of the boudoirs of Helen, Lady Lindon, or Lady Helen Lindon—for the lady is indifferently spoken of by either title—at Brighton and Sleperton Manor, may be commended to the attention of the curious in such matters. Of course anything in the nature of detailed criticism of a work of this nature would be labour thrown away. It does not take long to see that the book has attained its monstrous dimensions simply because the materials for some three or four stories have been clumsily rolled together into one, so that even if we could for a moment feel any interest in the various groups of actors presented to us we should soon be wearied and confused by the incessant scene-shifting. But, in truth, it is impossible to feel a spark of interest in any of the dramatis personæ, who are, one and all, saints and sinners, adults and those "engaging little ones" of whom the author is so fond, alike the most inanimate of puppets, wooden, stagey, and conventional to the finger-tips. That the author is not without some idea of the qualities that should be shown in a good novel the language which (Vol. I., p. 210) he puts into the mouth of one of the personages of his story affords some proof, but there is a most glaring and painful discordance between his theory and his practice.

"A Latter-Day Novel," by Lieut.-Colonel Edward Mansfield, H.M.'s Agent and Consul-General at Bucharest (2 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—There is merit enough in this story to lead us to think that should Colonel Mansfield get tired of diplomacy, or fall into difficulties with the Foreign Office, he might find another career open to him as a writer of fiction. Many of the sketches of character we have here, notably those of old Mrs. Chetwynd and Mr. Fredericks, only want filling out to become highly successful pictures. The hero is one Count Valery Krapski, a young Anglo-Pole; and perhaps the best chapters in the book are those that describe his life at Warsaw. His family estates having been confiscated by the Russian Government he has to find the means of support by becoming apprentice to a cabinet-maker, and afterwards bears a part in the Polish insurrection of 1863, of which we have a very graphic account. It seems to us that Colonel Mansfield does not think much of Poles, or of the cause of Poland; at any rate, the tone of "A Latter-Day Novel" is in marked contrast to that of "Blue Roses." The episodes that follow in England, whither Valery is summoned by the death of his aunt, Mrs. Chetwynd, are hardly so good. They are entertaining enough; but the main situation is too far-fetched to be artistic. It is quite beyond all reasonable probability that Valery should continue to take Lucy Mears for Mary Robertson, and vice versâ, when he is in constant intercourse with both cousins and their friends for many weeks together. Still, the book is a very good one; and Colonel Mansfield writes throughout like a man who knows his world.

"Wood Anemone," by Mrs. Randolph, author of "Wild Hyacinth," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—Here, as usual, Mrs. Randolph takes us into some very good society, and informs us how that section of society which it is customary in some quarters to style the "Upper Ten Thousand" contrives to divert itself and get rid of its time. The tale is no great things; indeed, it strikes us as rather a case of "much ado about nothing;" but, at any rate, there is no harm in it; and it is told not without a certain cleverness, and much of that quiet cynicism as regards the masculine half of the human race which is, perhaps, the author's most marked characteristic.

Of "County versus Counter," by Theodore Russell Munro, author of "The Vandeleurs of Red Tor," &c. (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall), it may be enough to say that it is a lively story, with some fairly-well executed rough sketches of character, but somewhat too over-flooded with vulgarity to be altogether pleasant reading.

A SPRIG OF HEATHER

Far, far away,
On a Scottish brae,
Where the north winds wake and roar,
I bloomed in the light
Of the noonday bright,
When summer was almost o'er;
Though the southern breeze
From the sunlit seas
Yet kissed the wild northern shore.

A maiden fair,
With dark shining hair,
Came wandering near one day,
When the sunset's glow
Lit the wave below
With many a golden ray.
She gazed on the sea,
Saying, "Woe is me!
Why went my true love away?"

Then, stooping low,
She said to me, "Go
To my love far over the sea,
And tell him I mourn
All the day forlorn
And sad on the lonely lea;
While the waves' deep roar
On the distant shore
Keeps murmuring his name to me."

And so I come
From my distant home,
Where the polestar shines above,
On the northern gale
That filled the white sail,
To the wild land where you rove,
From your Scottish maid
With the words she said,
And a message of deathless love!

In the Contemporary Review Mr. Gladstone, to whose indefatigable activity the magazines for this month bear marked testimony, answers the Abbé Martin's inquiry, "What Hinders the Ritualists from becoming Roman Catholics?" after a somewhat roundabout fashion by explaining why the bulk of members of the Church of England, who, like himself, have no pretensions to the name of Ritualists, "are either unable to recognise the paramount claims of the actual Roman Church, or resolutely determined to repel them." The article, then, is in the main only another chapter in "the great Roman controversy;" but Mr. Gladstone makes one point of some novelty in insisting that religion in Protestant England has dealt and is dealing more hopefully with the great movement of reaction against Christian faith and practice which, taking its rise in the earliest beginnings of Mediæval culture, gained so much in force and volume in the days of the Renaissance, than in the lands of the Papal Church. But even if Mr. Gladstone had proved this point more completely than he does, it would be open to the Abbé Martin, or any other controversialist on his side, to argue that the two principles in Christianity most obnoxious to the Pagan or Naturalistic movement being those of dogma and of asceticism, the comparative absence of those principles in the teaching of the Church of England would have naturally blunted the edge of the mutual antipathy between faith and unbelief.—The gem of the number we should say was Miss Wedgwood's paper on "Sir Walter Scott and the Romantic Reaction," which well deserves a far fuller notice than we can bestow upon it here. It would be impossible, for instance, to characterise the most prominent qualities of Scott's work more justly or happily than Miss Wedgwood does when she says that "That broad objective painting, that clear representation of simple feelings, that rapid movement, that sense of life and stir, which we find everywhere in the best writing of Scott, we find almost nowhere in the literature of our own day." Her remarks, too, on Scott's pathos, and on the general treatment of pathos in literature, are of high excellence.—From Dr. Elam we have an interesting exposition of the attitudes of the great German naturalists, Professors Haeckel and Virchow, towards the doctrine of Evolution, and the farther consequences—such as the Descent of Man from an ape-like ancestor—which may possibly be deduced from it. There can hardly be a question that Professor Virchow is in the right in maintaining that, though the doctrine of Evolution may be a highly probable hypothesis, it still remains a hypothesis, and is not to be taught as an established truth; we could wish, however, that Dr. Elam had set out Virchow's views with somewhat more fulness.—Professor F. W. Newman's article on "The Atheistic Controversy" may have an interest for readers of a metaphysical turn, and Mr. Stanley Jevons insists on the necessity of providing healthy amusements for the people as a condition of social reform and, in particular of replacing the music-hall by some better style of musical entertainment,—an object certainly most desirable if only it is practicable, for unfortunately people will only be "entertained" by what they like, not by what they are told is good for them.

The most striking article in the Nineteenth Century is, no doubt, Mr. Hyndman's on "The Bankruptcy of India." The people of India, it is contended, are growing poorer and poorer under our rule, and are all the time being ground down under an increasing load of taxation which they are quite unable to bear. General collapse and national bankruptcy must follow from this state of things unless the system is changed without delay. We are glad to find, however, that experts have put forward valid reasons for thinking Mr. Hyndman's apprehensions unduly pessimistic. He underrates, it is said, the resources of India, and overrates the burden of taxation, which, though heavy, is still far from crushing; and is, indeed, no heavier than what has been customary in Asiatic countries through all history.—Mr. Archibald Forbes's article, "The 'Fiasco' of Cyprus," is an ably written and energetic protest against the retention of that island by Great Britain. It produces nothing, says Mr. Forbes, and is permanently and incurably unhealthy, on which points, it will be noted, that Mr. Forbes' testimony is directly at issue with that of Mr. Hamilton Lang. Cyprus, we are told, would be useless as a basis of operations against Russian aggression upon Asia Minor, and a Russian menace to India must be answered from Herat and Cabul, "not from a miserable island in a dead angle of the Mediterranean."—Mr. Romanes publishes his lecture on "Animal Intelligence," originally delivered before the British Association at Dublin. His argument, as our readers may remember, is that, enormous as is the difference which now obtains between the mind of man and the mind of the lower animals, this difference is due solely to the power of abstraction rendered possible to man by the faculty of speech.—Mr. E. D. J. Wilson draws a gloomy, but we do not think an exaggerated, picture of the evils likely to be introduced into English politics by the adoption of a system of party organisation indistinguishable from the American "caucus;" and Mr. Mallock gives us an essay on "Faith and Verification," able and suggestive, as his writings always are, but one which we must leave to the appreciation of the reader, as we have not room even to state Mr. Mallock's case, much less to criticise it.

In Blackwood the recent policy of the Government is defended in a couple of papers, "New Routes to India" and "Eastern Prospects," which are sensible and moderate in tone, but hardly striking.—We have the commencement of "The New Ordeal," another tale of the military life of the future, in which we feel little doubt we recognise the well-known hand of the author of "The Battle of Dorking" and "A True Reformer;" and a readable summary of the adventures in Europe, Asia, and Africa of William Lithgow, a Scotch traveller of the seventeenth century.—Graceful translations from Heine, by Mr. Theodore Martin, continue to form a welcome feature in the magazine.

Macmillan is an exceptionally good number, but we can only find space to mention two of the contributions to it. One of these is a paper by Mr. Arthur Evans on the Austrian occupation of Bosnia, a point on which he, of course, rightly speaks as one having authority. He insists that the Austrian "occupation" is, put in plain terms, simply annexation, an annexation which had been resolved on by the Court and Military Party at Vienna, at least as far back as 1875, before the troubles in Bosnia and the Herzegovina had attracted the attention of Europe. That one of the results of the annexation will be ere long the break-up of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy Mr. Evans considers to be beyond a doubt.—The other leading feature in the number is a poem of rare beauty by Mr. George Meredith, entitled "Love in the Valley." Mr. Meredith's literary gifts to us are so few and far between that any one of them would demand a welcome, if it were of less intrinsic worth than this.

The Theatre, of which the third number is now before us, seems a new magazine of some merit. The biographies, accompanied by portraits, of Mr. Byron and Miss Litton, are very creditably executed, and we have an interesting study of the character of "Lord Dundreary" by the late John Oxenford. The brief paper on the question whether theatres should be opened on Sundays strikes us as very fair and sensible. The writer, we are glad to see, decides that, no matter what there may be to urge from an abstract point of view, to open the theatre on Sunday would in England be nothing but a deplorable mistake.

In Temple Bar we have an account of that John, Lord Hervey, of George the Second's time, celebrated as the author of Memoirs of somewhat evil repute, and another of General Oglethorpe, the friend of Johnson and "the Club," and a personage of some mark in the last century. There are also some theatrical reminiscences concerning Macready and Miss O'Neill.

There is little that calls for notice in All the Year Round. Its most readable pages are, perhaps, those occupied by further instalments of the series of papers entitled "Personally Conducted," a title which sufficiently indicates their character. Mrs. Cashel Hoey's novel, "All or Nothing," continues to form the pièce de resistance in the way of fiction.

THE NEW BELLS, ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL

A good deal has been done within the last few years towards the completion of the great metropolitan cathedral; the latest addition is a noble peal of bells.

It must be many years since anything resembling the tones of a peal of bells has been heard from St. Paul's Cathedral; the present church has certainly never possessed more than the ordinary service bell, and the great one which is rung at the death of the Sovereign or the Bishop of London. Dugdale informs us that a "clochier," or bell-tower, stood at the angle of the east end of the churchyard of Old St. Paul's Cathedral, which contained "four very great bells, called 'Jesus bells,' in regard they specially belonged to Jesus Chapel, situate at the east end of the Undercroft (crypt) of Paul's." He also relates that these bells were in existence until the time of Henry VIII., when a certain Sir Miles Partridge, "having won them from the King at one cast of the dice, pulled them down." Evidently Church property was considered game by this Partridge! It is consoling to know that Sir Miles did not long enjoy the fruits of this act of sacrilege, as he was put to death by Edward VI. for high treason. Whether these were the only bells possessed by Old St. Paul's Cathedral may be doubted. If a peal ever existed in the central tower of the church, it must have been destroyed by the fires which burnt the tower in 1444 or in 1561, and as no mention is made by Dugdale of bells being placed in the tower after the restoration of the structure by Queen Elizabeth, it is probable that the Cathedral has not been furnished with a peal of bells from the year 1561 to the present time.

The new peal consists of twelve bells, which are hung in the upper storey of the north-west tower, in the same position as that occupied by the clock in the opposite tower. The chamber is rather confined in space for such a large peal, and great ingenuity has been displayed in hanging the bells, so as to give each one space to swing in. The tenor weighs 63 cwt., and was presented by the Corporation; the other bells were presented by the Fishmongers', Clothworkers', Drapers', Merchant Taylors', Salters', and Turners' Companies, and Lady Burdett Coutts. The cost is said to have been about 2,500*l.*, exclusive of the supporting beams, floor, &c. These bells were cast by Messrs. Taylor of Loughborough, and together weigh rather more than 260 cwt., of which the tenor weighs 63 cwt. The finest peal of bells previously existing in London was that of St. Saviour's, Southwark, which also consists of twelve bells, and weighs 215 cwt. 1 qr. 9 lbs., of which the tenor weighs 51 cwt. 2 qr. The views from the great circular windows which light the belfry are remarkably interesting, especially that from the eastern window which is represented in our sketch; from here the dome is seen rising from the roof of the nave of the church, and forming a grand and magnificent architectural composition. One can from here also see the singular method to which Wren had recourse to hide the flying buttresses which support the vaultings of the nave, transepts, and choir. This consisted of a vast wall standing upon the walls of the aisle, about 40 feet high, and forming an upper "order" to the exterior of the church, concealing flying buttresses, clerestories, roofs, upper windows, supports to the dome. Pugin used to be very severe upon this wall, and in his "True Principles of Gothic Architecture" he says that "one half of St. Paul's Cathedral was built to conceal the other." There may be some exaggeration in this, but it is really difficult to conceive why such a great architect as Wren should have had recourse to this clumsy, undignified, and totally unnecessary contrivance. One cannot help feeling that the building would have looked far better without these great masking walls, and if roof, clerestory, and buttresses had been left to tell their own story. Another great defect of this plan adopted by Wren is that it renders the interior of the cathedral dark and gloomy, as the clerestory windows, instead of receiving a direct light, are only lighted from a narrow area. It is singular, too, how very much better the dome looks, when one sees the way in which it sets down upon the building, than it does when seen over these great masking walls, which from most near points of view conceal half the drum, and give a flat and uninteresting appearance to the flanks of the building. It is, however, an ungracious task to find fault with the masterpiece of a great architect, if, at least, St. Paul's Cathedral is Wren's masterpiece. It may be doubted whether St. Stephen's, Walbrook, does not rather deserve that distinction: at least many eminent architects have been of that opinion.

Looking through the great circular windows upon the west and north sides of the belfry, beautiful views of the city are gained, rendered interesting by the many graceful spires of Wren's churches, and it is hard to believe that amongst other City "improvements" the destruction of most of these is contemplated. Surely the most opulent city in the world might preserve them if only on account of the ornaments which they are to what will be without them a singularly hideous town.

A thousand shoemakers have struck, the manufacturers refuse to accord higher wages, and propose to call in Chinese cheap labour, so the Chicago Crispins menace the city with a riot if the Celestials appear, and the militia leaders are said to have secretly promised the strikers their assistance.

THE READER

While the curious in black letter lore will delight in the faithful reproduction of the antique type and quaint woodcuts of "Caxton's Golden Legend: Holbein Society's Fac-simile Reprints" (Wyman and Sons), readers less deeply antiquarian in their taste will be no less pleased with Mr. Alfred Aspland's introductory chapters on Caxton and Caxtoniana, including the catalogue of Caxton's publications from the Memorial Exhibition of 1877, particulars of prices fetched at famous Caxton sales, and lists of all the printers that had established themselves on the Continent up to the year of Caxton's death. The Golden Legend of Saints and Martyrs—the most popular, if we may judge from the number of copies in more or less mutilated condition still in existence, of all the publications of the father of English printing, although undertaken by him with a timid reluctance which was only overcome by the promise from William, Earl of Arundel, of "a bucke in sommer and a doo in wynter" as a yearly fee—was probably the most widely-read book in the world between the thirteenth and the fifteenth centuries, just as later on it became the germ of the ponderous "Acta Sanctorum" of Bollandus, and of that still more ponderous "revision and continuation" which, after weathering the troubles of the French Revolution and the difficulties of compressing into 230 pages the stories of the 11,000 Virgins to whom the Church allots October 21st, will be brought down, it is thought at last, to the end of the Calendar by the Belgian Jesuits in about another century. It was utilised by Caxton in his adaptation from the French version of Jehan de Vignay to spread, so far as might be done with safety, a knowledge of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue, by copious extracts from the Pentateuch and the Gospels, and was even in last year's Exhibition included in the general list of Bibles. No perfect copy is known to exist, a fact easily explained by the spoliation of the monasteries under Henry VIII., and the special proscription of all documents containing mention of Thomas A'Becket as a saint. The Society's Reprint is a partial reproduction of the imperfect copy in the Manchester Free Library, with the curious woodcuts from the Dutch edition by Eckert von Homperch, Antwerp, 1505. As a literary, no less than a typographical curiosity, it will quite repay attentive inspection.

Under the title of "Chips from Many Blocks" (S. Low and Co.), we have from the pen of the veteran Elihu Burritt a collection of short essays for old and young—essays on national and international politics for the old, "talks" upon language lessons or on the "law of kindness" for the young—all fragrant with the shrewd simplicity and hopeful spirit of good-will to man which have of late become a little strange to our ears. For Dr. Burritt moves as of old on the serene table-lands to which national prejudice and national interests (of the selfish type) can never mount. He can dream, though an American, of "the integration of the British Empire" by a closer legislative union between the mother country and the colonies, and deplore, though a warm admirer of Great Britain, the suspiciousness which keeps England back from hailing Russia as a sister, not a rival, in the predestined work of civilising the East. But he has a keen eye, too, for presumed defects at home, for the waste of millions on a navy and an army which have no enemies save a few Indians to apprehend, for the increasing severance, even in America, of the labourer from the land, the transformation of the old "down-east" yeomen into town-clerks and artisans, and the consequent appearance at every financial crisis of a dangerous multitude of "unemployed." Best of all, from a literary point of view, are the tales illustrating the law of kindness—tales so naturally and prettily told, it is only on looking back we become aware that we have been through a series of reading lessons in words of one syllable. Essays these which few, whether young or old, can read without being in some degree the wiser and the better.

Greatly as the sanitary condition of large towns has been improved in recent years, it still leaves something to desire. It is still a fact—of potent, though unacknowledged, influence on the labour market—that the rustic who comes even from not too healthy Rutlandshire to better himself in Manchester doubles thereby his risk of death and sickness; that insanitary dwellings add so largely to our death-rate that in towns where men are more employed indoors than women, the mortality among the former exceeds that of the latter precisely as it falls below it where the conditions are reversed. More knowledge, as well as better sanitary appliances, is needed under these circumstances, knowledge of air and of its influence on health, of clothing in its relation to health and disease, of what makes dwelling-rooms unwholesome, or why so many little children die. It is this which "Manchester Health Lectures for the People" (Vol. I J. Heywood, Manchester)—clear, simple addresses on these and similar topics, well fitted, too, for distribution singly as tracts—are especially intended to teach. We cannot praise the series more highly than by saying it gives promise of taking rank with the "Science Lectures for the People" for which Manchester is already famous.

In "The House of Life" (Chatto and Windus) Mrs. Flor. Fenwick Miller has most successfully laboured to combine a sufficient text-book of the physiology of the human frame with the practical health-lessons which suggest themselves as we pass through each division of the subject. It is a volume well suited for lecture-rooms and classes—above all for students of that gentler sex whose power in the household should qualify them to take the lead in every work of domestic hygiene.
